logians call conviction is only the ploughshare turning up the sins that have been rooted and matted in the soul. A farmer said to his indolent son: "There are a hundred dollars buried deep in that field." The son went to work and plowed the field from fence to fence, and he plowed it very deep, and then complained that he had not found the money; but when the crop had been gathered and sold for a hundred dollars more than any previous year, then the young man took the hint as to what his father meant when he said there were a hundred dollars buried down in that field. Deep plowing for a crop. Deep plowing for a soul. He makes light of sin will never amount to anything in the church or in the world. If a man speaks of sin as though it were an inaccuracy or a mistake, instead of a loathsome, abominable, consuming, and damning thing that God hates, the man will never yield harvest of usefulness.

When I was a boy plowed a field with a team of spirited horses, plowed it very quick.

Once in a while I passed over some of the soil without turning it, but I did not jerk back the plough with its rattling clevises. I thought it made no difference. After awhile my father came along and said: "Why, this will never do; it isn't plowed deep enough; there you have missed this and you have missed that." And he plowed it over again. The difficulty with great many people is that they are only scratched with conviction when the subsoil plow God's truth ought to be put in up to the beam.

My word is to all Sabbath-school teachers, all parents, to all Christian workers—Plow deep. And if in your own personal experience you are apt to take a lenient view of the sinful side of your nature, put down into your soul the ten commandments which reveal the holiness of God, and that sharp and glittering coulter will turn up your soul to the deepest depths. If a man preaches to you that you are only a little out of order by reason of sin and that you need only a little fixing-up, he deceives! You have suffered an appalling injury by reason of sin. There are quick poisons and slow poisons, but the druggist could give you one drop that would kill the body. And sin is like that drug; virulent, so poisonous, so fatal that one drop

Deep plowing for a crop. Deep plowing for a soul. Broken heart or no religion. Broken soul or no harvest. Why was it that David the jailer and the publican and Paul made so much ado about their sins? Had they lost their senses? No. The ploughshare struck the Conviction turned up a great many things that were forgotten. As a farmer plowing sometimes turns up the skeleton of a man or the arm of a monster long ago buried, so ploughshare of conviction turns up the ghastly skeletons of sin long ago entombed. Geologists never brought up from the depths of mountain mightier ichthyosaurus or megaterium.

But what means all this crooked plow these crooked furrows, the repentance amounts to nothing, the repentance ends in nothing? Men groan over their sins but get no better. They weep, but their tears are not counted. They get convicted, but are not converted. What is the reason? I remember that on the farm we set a standard with a flag at the other end of the field. We kept eye on that. We aimed at that. We plowed up to that. Losing sight of that we made a crooked furrow. Keeping our eyes on that made a straight furrow. Now in this matter of conviction we must have some standard to guide us. It is a red standard that God has at the other end of the field. It is the cross. Keeping your eye on that you will make a straight furrow. Losing sight of it you will make a crooked furrow. Plow up to the cross. Aim not at either end of the horizontal piece cross but at the upright piece, at the centre of the heart of the Son of God who bore your and made satisfaction. Crying and weeping will not bring you through. "Him hath exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour to give nance." Oh, plow up to the cross! I remark, in grace as in the field there be a sowing. In the autumnal weather find the farmer going across the field at a of about twenty-three inches, and at every e he puts his hand into the sack of grain he sprinkles the seed-corn over the field. It is silly to a man who does not know what he ing. He is doing a very important work. scattering the winter grain, and though now may come, the next year there will be at crop. Now, that is what we are doing

we are preaching the Gospel—we are scattering the seed. It is the richness of preaching, it is the winter grain; though the snow of illness may come upon it, it will yield a while glorious rest. Let us be we sow the right kind of seed. Sow on stalk and mullen stalk will come up. Canada thistles and Canada thistles will up. Sow wheat and wheat will come up. distinguish between truth and error. Let now the difference between wheat and helleboats and henbane.

The largest denomination is this country is denomination of Nothingarians. Their religion is a system of negations. You say to one of them, "What do you believe?" "Well, I believe in infant baptism." "What do you believe?" "Well, I don't believe in the verance of the saints." "Well, now tell me what you do believe?" "Well, I don't believe in the eternal punishment of the wicked." Their religion is a row of cyphers. Believe nothing and teach it; or, to resume the figure of my text, scatter abroad

The Right Kind of Seed.
A minister in New York preached a sermon intended to set the denominations of Christian preaching. He was sowing nettles. A minister in Boston advertised that he would preach a sermon on the superiority of transcendental organized forces to untranscendental and organized forces. What was he sowing? Lord Jesus Christ nineteen centuries ago sowed the divine seed of doctrine. It sprang from one side of the stalk are all the churches of Christendom. On the other side of the stalk are all the free governments of the earth, and on the top there shall be a flowering millennium after awhile. All from the Gospel seed of doctrine. Every word that a parent, or Sabbath school teacher, or city missionary, or other Christian worker speaks for Christ comes up. It comes up with compound interest—you sow one soul, that one saving ten, the ten a hundred, the hundred a thousand, the thousand a hundred thousand, the ten thousand a hundred thousand—on, on forever.

Again, I remark, in grace as in the farm there be a harrowing. I refer now not to a harrow that goes over the field in order to prepare ground for the seed, but a harrow which comes over after the seed is sown, lest the birds pick up the seeds, sinking it down into the soil so that it can take root. There are new harrows of harrow, but the harrow as I remember made of bars of wood nailed across each other and the underside of each bar was furnished with sharp teeth, and when the horses were harnessed to it, it went tearing and leaping across the field, driving the seed down into the earth and sprung up in the harvest. Bereavement and persecution are

The Lord's Harrows
The Gospel truth into your heart. There are truths that you heard thirty years ago, that were not affected by you until recently. Some trouble came over you, and the truth was revealed in, and it has come up. What did God mean in this country in 1857? For a century there was the Gospel preached, but a great deal of it produced no result. Then God harnessed a wild panic to a harrow of commercial disaster, and that harrow went down Wall Street and up Wall Street, down Third Street and up Third Street, down State Street and up State Street until the whole land was torn to pieces as it had never been before. What followed the harrow? A great awakening in which there were 500,000 souls brought into the kingdom of our Lord. No harrow, no crop.

Again, I remark, in grace as in the farm there must be a reaping. Many Christians speak of religion as though it were a matter of economics or insurance. They expect to reap in the next world. Oh, no!

Now is the Time to Reap.
Gather up the joy of the Christian religion this morning, this afternoon, this night. If you have not as much grace as you would like to have, thank God for what you have, and pray for more. You are no worse enslaved than Joseph, no worse troubled than was David, no worse scourged than was Paul. Yet, amid the rattling of fetters, and amid the gloom of dungeons, and amid the horror of shipwreck, they triumphed in the grace of God. The weakest man here has 500 acres of spiritual joy all ripe. Why do you not go and reap it? You have been groaning over your infirmities for thirty years. Now give one round shout over your emancipation. You say you have it so hard; you might have it worse. You wonder why this great cold trouble keeps revolving through your soul, turning and turning, with a black hand on the crank. Ah, that trouble is the grindstone on which you are to sharpen your sickle. To the fields! Wake up! Take off your green spectacles, your blue spectacles, your black spectacles. Pull up the corners of your mouth as far as you pull them down. To the fields! Reap! reap!

Again, I remark, in grace as in farming there is a time for threshing. I tell you bluntly that is death. Just as a farmer beats the wheat out of the straw, so death beats the soul out of the body. Every sickness is and the sick-bed is the threshing-floor. What, say you, is death to a good man only taking the wheat out of the straw? That is all. An aged man has fallen asleep. Only yesterday you saw him in the sunny porch playing with his grandchildren. Calmly he received the message to leave this world. He bade a pleasant good-by to his old friends. The telegraph carries the tidings, and on swift rail-trains the kindred come, wanting once more to look on the face of dear old grandfather. Brush back the gray hairs from his brow; it will never ache again. Put him away in the slumber of the tomb. He will not be afraid of that night. Grandfather was never afraid of anything. He will rise in the morning of the resurrection. Grandfather was always the first to rise. His voice has already mingled in the doxology of heaven. Grandfather always did sing in church. Anything ghastly in that? No. The threshing of the wheat out of the straw. That is all.

The Saviour folds a lamb in His bosom. The little child filled all the house with her music, and her toys are scattered all up and down the stairs just as she left them. What if the hand that plucked four-o'clocks out of the meadow is still? It will wave the eternal triumph. What if the voice that made music in the home is still? It will sing the eternal hosanna. Put a white rose in one hand, and a red rose in the other hand, and a wreath of orange blossoms on the brow; the white flower for the red flower for the Saviour's sacrifice, the orange blossoms for her marriage day. Anything ghastly about that? Oh, no. The sun went down and the flower shut. The wheat threshed out of the straw. "Dear Lord, give me sleep," said a dying boy; the son of one of my elders, "Dear Lord, give me sleep." And he closed his eyes and awoke in glory. Henry W. Longfellow, writing a letter of condolence to those parents, said: "Those last words were beautifully poetic. "Dear Lord, give me sleep."

"'Twas not in cruelty, not in wrath
That the reaper came that day:
'Twas an angel that visited the earth
And took the flower away."

So it may be with us when our work is all done. "Dear Lord, give me sleep."

I have one more thought to present. I have spoken of the plowing, of the sowing, of the harrowing, of the reaping, of the threshing. I must now speak a moment of the garnering.

Where is the garner? Need I tell you? Oh, no. So many have gone out from your own circles—yea, from your own family, that you have had your eyes on that garner for many a year. What a hard time some of them had! In Gethsemanes of suffering, they sweat great drops of blood. They took the "cup of trembling" and they put it to their hot lips and they cried: "if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." With tongues of burning agony they cried: "O Lord, deliver my soul!" But they got over it. They all got over it. Garnered! Their tears wiped away; their battles all ended; their burdens lifted. Garnered! Some of us remember, on the farm, that the sheaves were put on the top of the rack, which surmounted the wagon, and after a while the horses started for the barn; and these sheaves swayed to and fro in the wind, and the old wagon creaked, and the horses made a struggle, and pulled so hard the harness came up in loops of leather on their back, and when the front wheel struck the elevated floor of the barn, it seemed as if the load would go no farther, until the workmen gave a great shout, and then with one last tremendous strain, the horses pulled in the load: then they were unharnessed, and forkful after forkful of grain fell into the mow. O my friends, our getting into heaven may be a pull, a hard pull, a very hard pull; but these sheaves are bound to go in. The Lord of the harvest has promised it. I see the load at last coming in the door of the heavenly garner. The sheaves of the Christian soul sway to and fro in the wind of death, and the old body creaks under the load, and as the load strikes the floor of the celestial garner, it seems as if it can go no farther. It is the last struggle, until the voices of angels and the voices of our departed kindred and the welcoming voice of God shall send the harvest rolling into the eternal triumph, while all up and down the sky the cry is heard: "Harvest home! Harvest home!"

A BUSINESS MAN'S OPINION.

IN the common room of a hotel in Sydney, Australia, two merchants were talking recently. They were well-known Jews of large wealth and business experience. Near them sat a Christian traveller writing. Fragments of the conversation of the others reached his ears, as they were speaking distinctly and the room was quiet. He says that they were discussing business opportunities and the most promising foreign spheres to open up. One of them, who was German by birth, urged Madagascar, saying that he had once lived there and knew the island well. He spoke in glowing terms of the advancing civilization of the people and the condition they were attaining. Their probity, their intelligence and enterprise, were all the subjects of encomium. The other merchant asked him how he accounted for the remarkable change in the people. "I attribute it," he said, "to the missionaries. Wherever the missionaries go they always have the sense to give the people the Bible; the Madagascar people have had it long, and you may depend upon it that, whatever you or I may choose to think about the Bible, there is no book in the world like it for lifting up a nation. I have seen it myself in that island, and seen it for myself elsewhere."

Rev. C. H. Yatman and the Evangelistic Movement at Ocean Grove—A Life Devoted to Christ—His Great Work in Spreading the Gospel by Novel Methods—The "Soul-Winners' League on Wheels"—Rearing a Temple to Truth on the Site of Ingersoll's Old Home—Personal Workers.

PUSH, piety, and power, are the three marked characteristics of the Rev. C. H. Yatman, the evangelist, whose portrait appears in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, and whose wonderful work in disseminating the Gospel of Grace has made him widely known among evangelists throughout the Christian world. This summer, as in former years, he has been an indefatigable worker at Ocean Grove, where his eloquence, and his absolute dependence on the presence and power of the Holy Spirit are attracting large and earnest audiences.

Charles Henry Yatman was born in the little hamlet of Fredon, N. J., in 1853. His parents, full of piety, and strict members of the Presbyterian Church, brought him up in their own faith. He inherits largely the characteristics of his mother, who was the daughter of Judge Hunt, a man of culture as well as physical strength. In his early days, he paid his own school bills by making the fires in the school house during the winter season, and laid by hard work the foundation for that rugged physical health which he now enjoys. In 1865 his family moved to Newark, N. J., where he was sent to school. In due time he entered the High School, but soon left this for a clerkship in a stationery and printing establishment. He went in here for $3.00 per week, and in nine years rose to be the head clerk. During his connection with this house, in 1875, through the influence of Mr. Plum, young Yatman became a Christian. It was during a very busy day in the office when his employer asked him the mighty question,

Will You be a Christian?

"I will." Thus was converted this prodigal boy, for whom a mother had long prayed. Immediately he did what he believed to be a necessary part of the important step he had taken,—to publicly confess Christ. He says "it was months after this when the light broke in." Without doubt this experience has helped him to understand what in later years he so successfully explains for the comfort of others,—the difference between conversion and assurance. He united with the Central Methodist Church at Newark, N. J., and immediately went to work. Soon after this his business relations changed, and he was called to the ministry. He sorely felt his want of fitness for the great work. This call to preach came when he was twenty-seven years of age, married, with three children, with only a common school education heavily in debt, and no wealthy friends to assist. How could he ever reach the place where a clergyman was expected to stand? It was just here that he adopted what he happily calls the "win or die" principle. He tells his own story about securing an education: "Many a day I rose at three or four o'clock in the morning and walked five or ten miles, studying as I went, for my habits of life precluded work as a student. Many a slip I made in talking, but I kept on; many a blunder I made in doing personal work, but I gave not up; many a clean, flat failure I made in preaching, but, I longed for another opportunity, and if it did not come, I made one. Time and time again have I been so vexed at my own efforts that but I would not let this hinder me. I cared not then—do not care now. I desire but one thing in this world, to know how to win men to the Lord Jesus. I am going to keep at it until I know how it is done or die in the learning." These same disadvantages proved in later years, to be advantages, under the guiding grace of God. The element of character to which is due all culture that is worth the getting, comes better out of hardship than ease. Mr Yatman's acquaintance with men, his adaptability to their needs, his knowledge of their difficulties, his directness of method, his self-command and power to govern others, his large sympathy with them are born of his work.

"I Cried for Shame."

He was admitted to the Newark conference in 1881, and stationed in the Houston Street Mission, Newark, N. J., which subsequently under his care, became the Dashiell Memorial Church. From here he was urged to the wider work of the secretaryship of the Young Men's Christian Association of that city. There could hardly have been a more discouraging task, for he had to build upon the ruins of a work where strong men had failed; but it was the place for which God had raised him up. His success was phenomenal. In less than six years, he secured over $100,000 for that work, and left them with two well equipped buildings and a small endowment.

From this field Mr. Yatman entered the yet wider one of the evangelist where his work has four sides clearly marked—Soul-Winning Work; Summer Work at Ocean Grove; Money Raising Work and Literary Work. To this ought to be added another—his Missionary enterprises. His great ambition, which swallows up every other thought and purpose, is soul-winning. His success has been remarkable in cities like Wilkes-barre, Pa.; Youngstown and Lima, O.; Charleston and Atlanta in the south, and scores of others, where under God's blessing and thousands brought to Christ. Among these converts, now hard at work for the cause of the Gospel, are lawyers, doctors, merchants, professors, noted infidels and pugilists. In his meetings at Peoria, Ill., among the converts were represented nine different nationalities.

It was in this town, by the by, where Mr. Yatman's meetings had such great power that at the closing service held in the Opera House over $20,000 was raised for the Young Men's Christian Association. With this fund they are now erecting a $125,000 building for the young men in that city on the very lot where the noted infidel, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, used to live, and where it is said he wrote some of his lectures.

It is a beautiful structure, 72 x 171 feet, and five stories high, besides a high basement. It contains more than one hundred rooms. One corner of the building has a tower which rises about forty feet higher than the main building, and affords a splendid view of the city of Peoria. The front of the building is of red sandstone and pressed brick; the basement is devoted to bath-rooms, swimming pool, etc., and the rear half of the first and second stories is used for a gymnasium. Above these rooms, occupying the third and fourth stories, is the auditorium with a seating capacity of about seven hundred. The building when finished next winter, will be one of the greatest boons Peoria has ever known, and will stand a temple to the Truth above

The Ruins of Infidelity.

The officers are: O. J. Bailey, President; C. A. Jamison, Vice-President; C. W. Johnson, Recording Secretary; F. E. Avery, Treasurer.

For eight years Mr. Yatman has been conducting summer meetings at Ocean Grove. A history of this wonderful Gospel resort, its leading evangelists, its phenomenal development, and the great religious movement it represents, was recently published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Four times the building in which Mr. Yatman held his services has had to be enlarged, and the present one, though holding two thousand people, is entirely too small for the crowds. He not only conducts the Young People's meeting daily, but on Sunday a business men's meeting, and twilight services in August, and for the past three years has had a training class for workers which numbered 1,500. Here he meets yearly over 50,000 people. Incidental to this work has been the securing of money for various benevolent enterprises and Christian work. He can count up about half a million dollars raised during his career. His plans for work of this nature cannot be imitated. They are never of a questionable character and seem to delight the giver even more than the getter.

Mr. Yatman's style of oratory is entreatingly familiar, and affectionate; he Captures the Hearts of the Young People and succeeds in winning their confidence and love. At his meetings cards are passed around containing pledges to abstain from questionable habits and amusements; to turn from sin to God, trust Jesus and confess Him before men, and to devote twenty-five minutes daily to meditation and prayer. These are signed by hundreds. At the great meeting in progress at Ocean Grove, when the picture on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was photographed specially for this issue, there were twenty-eight souls, who under the eloquent pleadings of Mr. Yatman were drawn to the foot of the Cross, and found peace in conversion before the service closed. This is a familiar experience.

He is fond of illustrating his discourses with frequent anecdotes, and never tires of discussing missionary work for which he has the strongest predilection. By dint of hard work he has been the means of equipping twenty-five evangelists in Japan, China and India. Henry Nehne, a native white missionary on the southwestern coast of Africa, is his special protégé. But all this does not satisfy the tireless and energetic evangelist who believes that he is bound personally to enter the mission field. His unique scheme for spreading the Gospel is devised by Mr. Yatman, which he calls, Training College for

It is nothing more nor less than a train Pullman cars which will serve as college hall, library and dining-room. Each section contains its men, and to the fifty selected students whom he proposes to take with him in his evangelistic tour he will teach the English Bible in the morning, and in the afternoon how to practically conduct meetings and win souls for Christ.

The League of Personal Workers pledge soul-winning has a membership that girds the globe, and has already been instrumental in the Divine blessing in receiving pledges from over 260,000 souls who have come in to work for the advancement of Christ's kingdom.

OCEAN GROVE BIBLE CONFERENCE.

THE fourth annual Bible conference under the leadership of Dr. L. W. Munhall has just closed its sessions. The audiences were as large as on previous occasions, while a greater variety of teachers and preachers shared in the exercises.

Several of the widely known Bible Expositors who have been identified with the original institution of this kind, now known as the Niagara Bible Conference, were present at Ocean Grove. These were Drs. Brookes of St. Louis and of St. Paul, Revs. W. J. Erdman of Ashland and Geo. C. Needham of Manchester, Mass. Ocean Grove was also honored by the presence of Gordon and Brodbeck, of Boston, and E. Thoburn, of India. The subjects presented in special relation to the Person and Ministry of the Spirit, the Priesthood and Kingship of Christ, the verbal inspiration and infallibility of Scriptures, besides the presentation of Evangelistic and Missionary work. Rev. Geo. C. Needham gave three special expository lectures on the Jewish Tabernacle, which he illustrated with a new and beautiful model. These lectures were calculated to do vast good in showing the harmony of teaching between the Old and New Testament Scriptures.

The ability with which all the expositions and addresses were given by the various speakers surprised the vast congregations who have accustomed to eloquent sermons, rather than to Biblical teaching. It was also a very interesting fact to the visiting teachers that the presentation of our Lord's second personal coming, as imminent, was received so enthusiastically and joyfully. But it is ever so, when Blessed Hope is clearly and lovingly presented. The saints everywhere love to hear of the Lord's future glory, and lovingly pray, "Thy will be done, Lord Jesus."

Munhall may indeed be congratulated. He has been directed to inaugurate this important conference, and also that he has been to bring it to such successful issue.

very heart of the Mormon influence and population an event that calls for more than passing attention among Christian workers. In the present month, the corner stone of the first University in Ogden was laid with appropriate ceremonies, Bishop John Hoyt of the M. E. Church presiding, the principal address being made by

Among the well-known speakers present and taking an active part in the dedication of this great work were President Samuel J. May, the noted evangelist, and to be the principal of the University, Governor James B. Hays and a number of prominent clergymen. The large money endowment of the University are large and will be quite sufficient to cover the cost of construction, which will be about half a million dollars. It is proposed to push forward the work of building as rapidly as possible. The architect's plans include provision for a main hall, men's studies' hall, library, laboratory, gymnasium, observatory and residences of faculty. The location selected is one of the finest in Utah and contrasts favorably with that of the University of California, which, although a splendid building with a large and expensive corps of professors, is managed in a lukewarm manner and has prevented it from becoming, as its founders had hoped, a great influence for the propagation of Mormon principles. In able hands under God's blessing, the new University will prove a boon not only to the younger generation of Mormons, but to the entire country by bringing Christianity into a region where it has been largely obscured by fanaticism.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A lady has been Killed by a Spider at Danbury, Conn. One day during July, last, the wife of a wealthy citizen living in the suburbs of that town was in her flower-garden when she took great pride. She stooped to weed from the root of a handsome dahlia, when a large spider dropped upon her bare shoulder. She brushed it off roughly with a shuddering gasp as she did so she experienced a stinging sensation in the flesh where the spider had bitten. The pain soon passed, and she thought little of it at the time. A day or two later, however, the arm began to swell and throb and poultices were applied but they did not relieve the pain. Then the family physician was called in, and he at once pronounced it a case of blood poisoning. He tried all the remedies known to medical science but without success. The pain increased as the poisoned blood circulated through the body, and on Aug. 5th she died in an excruciating agony. It was an insignificant cause for so terrible a result; but in the physical and spiritual world there are cases of more disastrous results coming from apparently slight causes. One prolific source of mischief is, by a curious coincidence, connected with the spider, which belongs to the genus that naturalists call Arachnis. The Greeks called the enchantresses who lured men to their destruction Arachnides, and their descendants are in all our cities. The wise king urged men to beware of them for, "she hath cast down many wounded: yea many strong men have been slain by her." (Prov. 7: 26.)

A Wedding Ring With a History was Used at a marriage in Boston, Mass., on August 14. The bridegroom was a Southerner who had served with distinction in the Confederate army in the

A Shrewd Attempt to Evade the Law is Being made by a citizen of New Jersey. He owns a two story wooden shanty, in Jersey City, and he wants to erect a four story frame house in its place. But an ordinance has been enacted, prohibiting the erection of any more frame houses in that part of the city. Owners are, however, allowed to repair existing structures, providing no work is done above the roof. The owner of this shanty has availed himself of this clause in the ordinance. He has raised the wretched structure by jackscrews, thirty feet above the street, and is building the new house underneath it. The owner contends that as he has not builded above the roof, he has not broken the law. There are many men, who are trying an analogous expedient as to their character. They are retaining as much of their old nature and way of life as will keep them right with the world, while adding to it as much of the Christian profession as will give them a standing in the church. The composite structure lacks homogeneity, but it often stands the tests of this world. In the next world, however, it must fail; for "except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God." (John 3: 3.)

war. Afterwards he turned his attention to mining, working chiefly in the Black Hills. He did not go to a jeweller's and buy the wedding ring in the conventional way, but took some of the gold, which he had himself mined in the quartz, and panned with his own hands and which had been smelted under his own eyes, and he had it made into the heavy gold band which on Thursday he placed on his bride's finger. There was a dash of romance in this arrangement which the bride is the right kind of lady to appreciate. The symbol will, as she looks at it, remind her, not only of her union with her husband, but of his exertions, which rendered the union possible. It is so with the Church, the bride of Christ. The emblems used in the ceremony in which she celebrates her union with Him are those that remind her of the cost at which that union was purchased. (Luke 22: 19.)

A Long Search for a Treasured Bible has been prosecuted by a gentleman named Lucas, of Society Hill, S. C. During the war he fell into the hands of the Northern Army, and lost all his personal property. Among his treasures was a pocket Bible which he carried around with him. It had a silver clasp, on which his name was engraved, and the inscription, "Given him by James Ray, 1815." It had therefore been in his possession fifty years when he lost it. He has searched at Washington among the relics of the war, and has made inquiries after the book in other places, but has failed to find it. He is now eighty-six years old, and is still searching for it, hoping that he may recover it before he dies. On the fly-leaf between the Old and New Testaments is written the family record of births, marriages and deaths, and it is on that account chiefly, that he values the book. Though that leaf is to Major Lucas the most important of all the leaves in the book, to the present possessor it has no value because he has no personal or family interest in the record. But it may be hoped that, whoever he may be, he has read the other pages, on which there is matter of most momentous concern to him

Whittier's Latest Poem.*

OUR COUNTRY.

OUR thought of thee is glad with hope,
Dear country of our love and prayers;
Thy way is down no fatal slope,
But up to freer sun and airs.

Tried as by furnace fires, and yet
By God's grace only stronger made;
In future tasks before thee set Thou shalt not lack the old-time aid.

The fathers sleep, but men remain
As true, and wise, and brave as they.
Why count the loss without the gain?
The best is that we have to-day.

No lack was in thy primal stock,
No weakling founders builded here,
Thine were the men of Plymouth Rock,
The Puritan and Cavalier.

And they whose firm endurance gained
The freedom of the souls of men,
Whose hands unstained in peace maintained,
The swordless Commonwealth of Penn.

And time shall be the power of all
To do the work that duty bids,
And make the people's council hall
As lasting as the Pyramids.

Thy lesson all the world shall learn,
The nations at thy feet shall sit,
Earth's farthest mountain-tops shall burn
With watchfires from thine own uplift.

Great without seeking to be great
By fraud or conquest, rich in gold,
But richer in the large estate
Of virtue which thy children hold.

With peace that comes of purity,
And strength to simple justice due,
So owns our loyal dream of Thee;
God of our fathers, make it true.

Oh, Land of Lands, to thee we give
Our love, our trust, our service free;
For thee thy sons shall nobly live,
And at thy need shall die for thee.

ENTERING THE KINGDOM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 31; Luke 18: 15-30; Golden Text, Luke 18: 17.

Jesus Royal in Birth and Death—His Territory—His Dominion Over the Soul—Infants the Type of His Subjects—In Obedience and Simplicity—Entrance by Sacrifice—The Ruler's Question—The Thing He Lacked—The Mystery of the Kingdom—Death and Resurrection.

WHOSOEVER shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child shall in no case enter therein." The thought of the Kingdom pervaded all the teaching of Jesus; He was "born King of the Jews." He died with the accusation written over Him, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." But few knew or understood that His kingdom was "not of this world" (John 18: 36), or perceived how completely "the Gospel of the Kingdom" (Matt. 4: 23), and the laws of His kingdom were calculated to "break in pieces and consume" (Dan. 2: 44), those of other kingdoms. The kingdoms of this world are set up by the strength and wisdom of man, while in the kingdom of God it is found that "the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men," (1. Cor. 1: 25.) "The kingdom of God is Within You."

(Luke 17: 21.) God loves to reign over heart and will, conscience and affection. The territory which He covets is "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible." (1. Pet. 3: 4.) Thus it comes to pass that while "that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God" (Luke 16: 15), it is equally true that that which is little esteemed among men has honor in the sight of God. "They brought unto Him infants that He should touch them." (R. V.) What had infants to do with the kingdom He was come to establish? Everything. The child spirit was an essential; the child weakness, which cannot act for itself, the child ignorance, the child trustfulness, were all a preparation, and a necessary one, for the kingdom of God in the heart. The disciples were not imbued with the spirit of their Lord, and "they rebuked" those who brought the children, and the spirit which prompted them was not the child spirit. How often have disciples discouraged those who would come to Jesus? They interpose their own ideas and views of things between Jesus and those who would fain come to him. Oh, how it behooves those of us who are disciples to have first from Jesus authority for what we do and say to others, lest we should hinder instead of help them! Happily, Jesus interfered, "He called them unto Him and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," and added, "Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God shall in no wise enter therein." God's word is full of paradoxes. The entrance to the kingdom of heaven demands not only the childlike spirit, but also righteousness exceeding that of the most apparently righteous of the day. Jesus said: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. 5: 20.) To some it must seem a contradiction that the little child should enter in, and yet that a righteousness exceeding that of the scribes and Pharisees was an essential to enter in; but the very reality of the child was a witness against the hypocrisy and outwardness of the Pharisee's life. He did all his works "to be seen of men;" his very prayers were for the ears of men; his very attitude, his very garments were bordered for the eyes of men, to make an impression on them while there was nothing in all his religion to appeal to the heart of a heavenly Father in whom he trusted, or a heavenly King whose laws he obeyed. The outward righteousness of the Pharisees was exactitude itself; but the heart was wanting. In a little child there is very frequently great want of exactitude, but his heart looks out of his eyes to his father in love, and obedience, and fear.

As a Little Child,

The obedience as well as the simplicity of the child is a necessity for the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. 5: 19.) But here again the obedience must be heart-deep, for Jesus says: "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." (Matt. 7: 21.) It is

Worth Sacrifice

To enter into the kingdom of God. If thy hand offend thee, cut it off, it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands, to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched, "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" (Matt. 9: 43, 44)—better to lose a foot, an eye, or an ear, or any other member, than to fail of that entering into life, or entering into the kingdom which God holds out before us. None really enter into the kingdom except at a cost. In the solemn light of eternity, in the wondrous light of an indwelling God, it is for us to weigh how much of earthly advantage stands in our way. If the reign of God in our hearts, or in our family, or in our little world—whatsoever that may be—is hindered by anything that is an advantage to us, let that thing be cut off.

After Jesus had given His welcome to the little children, "a certain ruler asked Him, saying: 'Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?'" Jesus referred him to the commandments of the second table, and the ruler thought within himself, "If this is all, I have nothing to fear. All these," he said, "Have I kept from my youth up." But how startled he must have been when Jesus declared:

"Yet Lackest Thou One Thing."

There are hundreds of people who live up to the light of their own conscience; they are satisfied with themselves; they know they have a good name amongst other men; they try themselves in their own balances and find no lack; but the first real dealing of the Spirit of God brings them down from their pedestal, and they discover "Yet lackest thou one thing," and that may be the "one thing needful."

But what was this "one thing," which was the real impediment to entering into the kingdom of heaven? Jesus says: "Sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me." What! Must he deprive himself of the possibility of doing good as far as he understood it? Should he put it out of his power to be God's benefactor, or man's? should he instead of being a generous giver with the reputation which belonged to it, become a beggar, a man of no account whatever, and a follower of this poor carpenter of Nazareth? His pride could not brook this; he turned away, the tears in his eyes and a load upon his heart. He would, perhaps, have given thousands, but he could not give himself. Money, houses, lands, he would part with; but his all? No; it was too much.

"And when Jesus saw that he was very sorrowful, He said, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! For it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." We must be poor, we must be childlike, we must be obedient to enter into the kingdom of God. We must be nothing, to enter the kingdom of God.

The question was raised among the disciples: "Who then can be saved?" and Jesus reminded them that that which was impossible with man was possible with God. That which was not indigenous in the soil of human nature could, nevertheless, be created by the master-hand of God. But Peter remarked; "Lord, we have left all and followed Thee," and he added (Matt 19: 27,) "what shall we have therefore?"

and Jesus declared: "There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting." But that "manifold more" is the "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," which Paul understands as "the kingdom of God." (Rom. 14: 17.) "The mystery of the kingdom of God" is always, in one form or other, death and resurrection; it is dying, in order to live—"If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him" (1. Tim. 2: 11.)

Suffering in Order to Glory

(Rom. 8: 17), leaving all in order to gain all. And in this, the Master Himself led the way. "He took unto Him the twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished. For He shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on, and they shall scourge Him, and put Him to death, and the third day He shall rise again." Jesus Himself lost all and left all to gain all. But the disciples "understood none of these things: and this saying" told them for the fourth time—"was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." Man loves to carry all before him, and, no doubt, this was the idea of the disciples, and they could not accept that of which they as yet had no experience—that the conquests of Christ's kingdom come about by submission, and by yielding, not by opposition and fighting; the kingdom not of this world was still unentered, the way of the cross still unknown.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

With its long-lying snows, Mount Taurus stands, a hoary sentinel, above a city once renowned and prosperous—Taurus of Cilicia. Surrounded by the fertile plains of Eastern Cilicia, and with the clear, cold, navigable Cydnus coursing rapidly through it as if eager to lose itself in the blue expanse of the Mediterranean, this city, now so unheeded in the western march of empire, was, two thousand years ago, influential far and wide, and a centre of life and traffic. The herds that dotted the slopes of Taurus yielded hair in abundance for its famous tent-weavers; the forest around it echoed the laugh of the woodman or the ring of his axe, and the Cydnus was choked with the vast quantities of timber floating down to the Great Sea. In Tarsus the tired camels knelt to be relieved of their loads heavy with the riches of the East, and from Tarsus they retraced their steps, bearing into the interior the treasures of Europe, unladen from the ships of the West.

Cilicia, of which Tarsus was no mean city, was divided into two nearly equal districts known as "rough" and "flat" Cilicia. The western, or rough portion, where the branches of Taurus came tumbling in massy bulks to the coast, was alike the dread of the traveller by sea and land. From its cliff-hidden inlets pirates, in defiant swarms darted out upon the wary merchantman: and ill fared it with the belated wayfarer who fell into the hands of the fierce bandits that in the north found mountain fastnesses without number. Flat Cilicia Pompey made a province. It was a great loamy plain whose surpassing richness repaid the slight toil of the husbandman a hundredfold. Near the western boundary of this prolific plain divided by a stream two hundred feet wide whose waters brought a busy traffic to its door and noted for its many schools of philosophy stood Tarsus, in its zeal for learning the successful rival of Athens and Alexandria.

The Apostle's Father.

It is approaching the twelfth hour. In the rear of his shipping-house, a successful trader in tent-cloths is washing his hands. It is cleansing which will be more thoroughly done to when the merchant reaches his Oh, no. He is a Pharisee. On his way dwelling, it is his purpose to pray, and to with unclean hands would be to commit sin. Though an inhabitant of a heathen his man is not of it. Behind the smooth-tongued, trade-winning merchant is hidden the man who scorns his customer as a Gentile and a Pharisee, and the proud disdainful spirit of one who belongs to that great and closely united Phariseehood, which in affairs political as well as religious, is the ruling power in the only Kingdom of God. Having made an end of his religious washing, the merchant issues forth into the street. Yes, surely, is he a Pharisee. A face which seems two faces, those eyes turned upward upon the ground, that self-centred pride; the phylacteries containing the four commandments from the law, bound, one about the head, and the black leather straps of the phylactery, seven times about the arm and seven times about the hand—these distinguished features of dress and manner can belong to no other than a Pharisee. Soon he pauses on a street corner. He raises his hand toward heaven, says a prayer, and passes on. Not long after he again halts, finishes his petitions, and continues his walk. As he hears his home, a Pharisee, who is not a member of a synagogue, an unclean Am-ha-aretz, brushes past him for alms. "Thou unclean thing! how wilt thou defile me?" he cries, and, turning up his robes, moves haughtily away.

* From Leah of Jerusalem: A story of the time of Paul, by Edward Payson Berry, an interesting narrative in the style which the author of Ben Hur has made so popular. Pp. 388; Price, $1. Published by Anson D. F. Randolph, 38 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

A PRAYER OVERHEARD.

An incident illustrating the keeping power of prayer, related by a commercial traveller in Dr. H. W. H. magazine, Times of Refreshing. He says when he was twenty years of age, and earning his living as a clerk in a store, he stayed during a vacation, at a certain hotel. As he awoke in the morning he heard through a partition separating his room from the next, the voice of a man singing. It was a tune which carried the young man's thoughts back to his boyhood's days, before he had passed into spiritual indifference. Soon the song ceased, and the same voice was engaged in earnest prayer, and the young man began to think of his own condition. A strong desire to pray filled his mind, but it was so long since he had prayed that he could not pray. After a few moments he determined to ask his neighbor to pray for him. He rose, dressed rapidly, and knocked at the door of the adjoining room, and was asked, "What do you want?" asked the occupant, a man with white hair. "I sleep in the next room," the young man replied, "and heard you praying. I wish you would pray for me." "Come in," was the quick response; and, opening the door, he said, "Let us kneel down." Then offered earnest prayer for him. "Many incidents of this interview have passed my remembrance," says the narrator, "but as the turning point of my life. God gave me the help then given me to the salvation of my soul. I presently a fear as to the future troubled me. I said, 'I don't know that it is much to do this, as I do not know anyone in my way; and if I begin, I shall not stand.' 'Oh, you think you will not stand,' was the answer. 'Yes,' I said. 'Then,' he rejoined, 'let us kneel down.' I knelt down again, and my friend prayed the same terms: 'O Lord, this young man says he will not stand; neither will he, Lord, unless thou make him stand. Thou rememberest when, seventeen years ago, I knelt down and gave myself to thee, and thou has kept me the same for this young man, and more for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.'" Two did not meet again for some years. In the meantime the young man had prospered financially, and had maintained his Christian profession. One day an acquaintance mentioned to him an aged commercial traveller who was in need of help, and he went to see him, and to his delight, found it was his old friend who had prayed for him in the hotel. Remembering how much he had been indebted to that interview, he insisted on providing the old man with a sufficient sum regularly to support him as long as he lived. Tears ran down his aged cheeks as he said: "Let us kneel together and praise God." On rising from their knees he said: "I am reminded to-day of our Lord's words: 'The same measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again';—for, when I was a young man like yourself, I allowed an aged Christian exactly the amount you are allowing me."

THE ADVENT OF THE SON OF MAN.

By P. W. E.

The Third Great Event of the Series—The Effect of the Vials and Trumpets—Resistance of the Impenitent Culminating—Open Revolt and Attack on Jerusalem—The Sudden Appearance of the Lord—The Mountain Closen—The Great Catastrophe—The Reign of Peace.

OF the three great events for which the people of God are now waiting, the first two, which are the coming of the Lord for His waiting people, and the great tribulation, have been described in previous articles in these pages. The third, which we have now to deal with, is the coming of the Lord with His saints in judgment.

This is known as the Second Coming or Advent of the Lord; for when He comes for His saints, He does not come on the earth, but meets them in the air (1 Thess. 4: 17). The return of the Lord, with His saints is more frequently spoken of as the "appearing," the "revelation," the "manifestation," or "coming of the Son of Man." This coming is not like that for His saints, the teaching of which is confined specially to the New Testament. On the contrary this theme occupies a most prominent place in the Old Testament teachings; and the New Testament only makes this addition, that when He thus returns He will be accompanied by those who have previously been caught up to meet Him in the air.

In a previous article we found in Rev. 4 and 5 that the Church and all the saints had been caught up into heaven, and were in the presence of God, while the judgments were being poured out upon the earth. The last important act was the overthrow of Babylon, and the gathering of the nations about Jerusalem. Terrible as the successive waves of judgments have been, they have led to no repentance. Man, as the billows have broken over him, has only hardened himself in iniquity, and blasphemed the God from whom these warnings came.

so now, men eat and drink, marry and give in marriage, buy and sell, plant and build, till the very day that the Son of Man appears in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God." Jerusalem is trodden down by the Gentiles; the houses are rifled and the women are ravished.

"An angel . . . cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, 'Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great.'" "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn; and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven"—He was taken up to heaven in a cloud and returns in like manner—"with power and great glory."

"Behold He Cometh"

with clouds and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so, Amen." "And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north and half of it toward the south."

The Son of man now comes as the Stone which Daniel saw in vision, cut out without hands, and falls upon the image, which represents civil governments, and breaks it to pieces, so that it becomes like the chaff of the summer threshing floor; and the stone that smites the image becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth." This is the end of all that which is called civil government on the earth, governments which so many Christians are trying to build up and make better—the Lord utterly destroys them. "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one." This is the end of man's daring machinations when he madly raises his puny hand against God. "And I saw the beast and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war against Him that sat on the horse and against His army." Man dares to defy God now; but how fearful the arrogance to which his pride will reach, when he goes forth to make war against Him that sitteth on the horse! Yet "these are the true sayings of God." This is what men surely will do. But how speedy and terrible will be the end! The armies of the beast are slain and given to the fowls of heaven. The slaughter is to be so great that it will take seven months to bury the dead and cleanse the land.

"And this shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem; their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongues shall consume away in their mouth. And it shall come to pass in that day that a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them; and they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbor, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbor." "The great winepress of the wrath of God was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the winepress."

The Beast and the Prophet.

But a more awful fate awaits the beast and the false prophet. "And the beast was taken and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before Him: with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone." Enoch and Elijah were taken to heaven alive; and these two men will be "cast alive in a lake of fire, burning with brimstone." A thousand years are to pass before the wicked dead are to be judged, and a thousand years before Satan is finally punished; thus the leaders of man's guilt and blasphemy are to be cast alive into the lake of fire. "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years shall be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season."

Satan is "the-god of this world;" "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." He has infused his poisonous corruptions into Christianity, and will at last bring in that iniquity and blasphemy which occasion so dreadful a doom on the beast, false prophet, and all who love not the Lord Jesus Christ. At the establishment of Christ's reign on the earth he is bound and allowed to deceive the nations no more during the thousand years. The enemies of God being all overcome, Christ will establish His kingdom, and He, with His saints, will reign over the earth.

TEPID CHRISTIANS.

THERE is a verse in Revelation that presents a nauseated Christ: "Because thou art luke-warm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth." After we have been taking a long walk on a summer day, or been on a hunting chase, a draught of cold water exhilarates. On the other hand, after standing or walking in the cold air and being chilled, hot water, mingled with some beverage, brings life and comfort to the whole body; but tepid water, neither hot nor cold, is nauseating. Now, Christ says that a Church of that temperature acts on him as an emetic: "I will spew thee out of my mouth." The church that is red with religious emotion, praying, singing, working, Christ having taken full possession of the membership, must be to God satisfactory. On the other hand, a frozen church may have its uses. The minister reads elegant essays, and improves the session or the vestry in rhetorical composition. The music is artistic and improves the ear of the people, so that they can better appreciate the concert hall. The position of such a church is profitable to the book-binder who furnishes the covers to the liturgy, and the dry-goods merchants who supply the silks, and the clothiers who furnish the broad-cloth. Such a church is good for the business world, makes trade lively and increases the demand for fineries of all sorts, for a luxurious religion demands furs and coats, and gaiters to match. Christ says he gets along with a church, cold or hot. But an unmitigated nuisance to God and man is a half-and-half church, with piety tepid. The pulpit in such a church makes more of orthodoxy than it does of Christ. It is immense on definitions. It treats of justification and sanctification as though they were two corpses to be dissected. Its sermons all have a black morocco cover, which some affectionate sister gave the pastor before he was married, to wrap his discourse in, lest it get mussed in the dust of the pulpit. Its gestures are methodical, as though the man were ever conscious that they had been decreed from all eternity, and he were afraid of interfering with the decree by his own free agency.

Such a pulpit never startles the people with the horrors of an undone eternity. No strong meat but only pap, flour and water, mostly water. The church prayer-meeting is attended only by a few gray-heads, who have been in the habit of going there for twenty years, not because they expect any arousing time or rapturous experiences, but because they feel only a few will be there, and they ought to go. The minister is sound. The membership sound. The music sound. If, standing in a city of a hundred thousand people, there are five or ten conversions in a year, everything is thought to be "encouraging." But Christ says that such a church is an emetic. "Because thou art neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth." You had better warm up or freeze over. Better set the kettle outside in the atmosphere at zero, or put it on the altar of God, and stir up the coals into a blaze. If we do not, God will remove us.

Christian men are not always taken to heaven as a reward, but sometimes to get them out of the way on earth. They go to join the tenth-rate saints in glory; for if such persons think they will stand with Paul, and Harlan Page, and Charlotte Elizabeth, they are much mistaken. When God takes them up, the church here is better off. We mourn slightly to have them go, because we have got used to having them around, and at the funeral the minister says all the good things about the man that can well be thought of, because we want to make the funeral as respectable as possible. I never feel so much tempted to lie (although I resist the temptation), as when an inconsistent and useless Christian has died, and I want in my final remarks to make a good case out for the poor fellow. Still, it is an advantage to have such a man get out of the way. He is opposed to all new enterprises. He puts back everything he tries to help. His digestion of religious things is impaired, and his circulation is so poor that no amount of friction can arouse him. Now it is dangerous for any of you to stay in that condition. If you cannot be moved, God will kill you, and he will put in your place those who will do the work you are neglecting.

Let us all arouse! The nearness of our last account, the greatness of the work to be done, and the calls of God's word and providence, ought to stir our souls. After having been in the harvest field so long, it would be a shame in the nightfall of death to go home empty-handed. Gather up a few gleanings from the field, and beat them out, that it may be found that Ruth had at least "one ephah of barley."

LAYMEN TO THE FRONT.

I HAVE a sly suspicion that the layman who has for seven years given the most of his time to the study of the truth, is better prepared to preach the Gospel than a man who has given that length of time in theological seminaries to the study of what other people say about the Bible. In other words, we like water just dipped from the spring, though handed in a gourd, rather than water that has been standing a week in a silver pitcher. After Calvin has twisted us one way, and Arminius has twisted us another, and we get our head full of the old Andover and New Haven theological fights, and the difference between Ante-Nicene Trinitarianism and Post-Nicene Trinitarianism, it is a luxury to meet some evangelist who can tell us in our common mother-tongue of Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. I say let our learned institutions push theological education to its highest excellence, preparing men for spheres which none but the cultured and scholarly are fit for, but somehow let us beat the drum and gather a battalion of lay-workers. We have enough wise men to tell us about fishes, about birds, about rocks, about stars—enough Leyden jars, enough telescopes, enough electric batteries; but we have not more than one man where we ought to have a hundred to tell the story of Christ and the soul. Some cry out, "It is dangerous to have laymen take such prominent positions in the Church." Dangerous to what? Our dignity, our prerogatives, our clerical rights? It is the same old story. If we have a mill on the stream, we do not want some one else to build a mill on the same stream. It will take the water off our wheel. But, blessed be God! the river of salvation is deep and strong enough to grind corn for all nations. If a pulpit is so weak that the wave of religious zeal on the part of the laity submerges it, then let it go under. We cannot expect all other shipping to forsake the sea lest they run down our craft. We want more watchmen on the wall, more sentinels at the gate, more recruits for the field. Forward the whole Christian laity! Throw up no barriers to their advancement. Do not hang the Church until dead by the neck with "red tape."

THERE is nothing more catching than a face with a lantern behind it, shining clear through. We have no admiration for a face with a dream smile, meaning no more than the grin of a false face. But a smile written by the hand of God as an index or table of contents to whole volumes of good feeling within, is a benediction. You say: "My face is hard and lacking in mobility, and my benignant feelings are not observable in the facial proportions." We do not believe you. Freshness and geniality of soul are so subtle and pervading that they will, at some eye or mouth-corner, leak out. Set behind your face a feeling of gratitude to God and kindness toward man, and you will ever day preach a sermon long as the streets you walk, a sermon with as many heads as the number of the people you meet, and differing from other sermons in the fact that the longer it lasts the better.

WHEN the Sabbath goes down, the Republic goes down. Men who are not willing to obey God's law in regard to Sabbath observances are not fit to govern themselves. Sabbath breaking means dissoluteness, and dissoluteness is incompatible with self-government. What is the matter with Republicanism in Italy and in Spain? No Sabbath. For ages they wanted a Republic in France; after awhile they got a Republic but one day, Napoleon III. with his cavalry rode through the streets and down went the Republic under the clattering hoofs. France will never have a permanent Republic until she quits her roystering Sabbaths, and devotes one day in every week to the recognition of God and sacred institutions. Abolish the Sabbath and you abolish your religious privileges. Let the work go on, and you have the "Commune," and you have the "revolution," and you have the sun of national prosperity going down in darkness and blood. From that reign of terror the God of Lexington and Bunker Hill delivers

CURRENT EVENTS.

Not only in the World of Art and Letters, but to Christians everywhere, the news of John Ruskin's approaching death will come with a deep feeling of sadness. In his beautiful settled home at Coniston, among the woods and lakes of Cumberland, the man, who since Carlyle, has been the foremost literary figure of the age in England, lies helpless, his mind a wreck, and his life ebbing away. That life throughout has been one of singular purity and uprightness; bold, honest and fearless in its championship of truth and virtue. Born in London in 1819, he took the highest University honors at Oxford, and in 1833 began his career as an author. His first notable work was "Modern Painters," (1843), a book that instantly attracted the widest attention in the critical world, since by essaying to prove the infinite superiority of modern over ancient methods in landscape painting, it virtually laid the foundation for a new school of criticism. This was followed by "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," (1849), "The Stones of Venice," (1851-53), and a number of others, that served to emphasize the new art departure, and to confirm the impression of Ruskin's brilliant and original genius. But it was a genius with many varieties. Among other notable works on art, geology, and natural science in its relations to philosophy and morals, he wrote "The Ethics of the Dust," "Theesame and Lies," (1865), and probably half a dozen devoted to the discussion of art alone. He is the apostle of the beautiful, the good, the true, the art as well as in morals, and he detested nothing more than deceits and pharisaism, lies and hypocrisies. The best revelation of Ruskin's nature is perhaps furnished in his series of letters to workmen entitled "Fors Clavigera," (Strength the Summer-bearer.) These are helpful to readers, not only extolling the dignity of labor, but placing the sturdy honesty of the worker in its true relation to the human virtues, and above all breathing in every line the strong Christian spirit of the author.

The Splendid Benefaction of John D. Rockefeller, who has just given several million dollars for the purpose of founding a National University, shows that our millionaires are not forgetful of the educational progress of the age and the growing need of more institutions of learning which will be something more than academies. It is understood that the proposed institution will start with an endowment of not less than $20,000,000. A prime mover in the matter has been Rev Dr McArthur pastor of the Calvary Baptist Church of New York City, who has long cherished a dream of a great Baptist University in the metropolis. It is not unlikely that Professor Harper of Yale, may be offered the Presidency, and that its Faculty will be composed, in every department, of the ablest professors that can be secured in this country and Europe.

As was Foreshadowed Last Week, the Federal Election Bill, even in its amended form, does not seem to make material headway, and the probabilities of its passage are exceedingly remote. The Republican Senatorial Caucus, on Aug. 14, went on record against a motion by Senator Hoar to take up the election Bill as a measure to be passed before adjournment. Senators Quay and Cameron both were strongly opposed to the motion, while Aldrich, Plumb and Teller favored it. This action probably relegates the whole subject to the next session in both Houses.

The News That Rev. Charles L. Brace is Dead will cause sorrow in many a home in this and other countries. It came to his daughter on Wednesday in a briefable despatch from Switzerland, where Mr. Brace was travelling for the benefit of his health. He was sixty-four years of age and thirty-eight of those years he had given to disinterested Christ-like and successful labor in the cause of humanity. After studying at Yale and the Union Theological Seminary, and being ordained, he went to Europe in 1850 for an extended tour. He returned with a holy purpose filling his heart, having consecrated his life to the service of the poor and outcast. For about a year he labored among the criminal classes, but at the end of that time he abandoned that field for a more urgent and hopeful one. He tried to rescue their children. With his own money and the gifts of sympathizing friends he took children off the streets and educated and clothed them and started them in life. The work grew so rapidly and the opportunities multiplied so extensively that he organized the Children's Aid Society to meet the call. Through this society, of which he was Secretary from its foundation to his death, the Home for Newsboys was established in New York, and large numbers of homeless boys were taken from the city streets and sent to farmers in the West, by whom they were brought up in decent Christian homes and trained to habits of virtue and industry. Many a man who is to-day a respectable, prosperous farmer would have graduated from the city slums to the penitentiary but for the blessing of God on Mr. Brace's efforts on his behalf.

The Week Saw the Sudden Collapse of the great strike begun by the Knights of Labor against the New York Central, and other railroads, a result which it is believed will go far toward extinguishing what remains of the influence of Master Workman Powderly's once powerful organization among the working classes. Several branches of the organization have disbanded; the strikers have asked to be reinstated and freight and passenger traffic is again in operation over a large part of the roads. All efforts to induce the Brotherhood of Engineers and Firemen to join the strike failed. Meanwhile the Executive Board of the Knights disclaims the responsibility of the strike and is about to investigate.

In the Old World, the Week has been Full of interest. Emperor William started for Russia on the 15th with a hunting chariot as a present for the Czar; ex-President Grevy of France is seriously ill; Chauncey Depew has been visiting Oberammergau; the great Welsh railroad strike has been settled by arbitration; the Ganges is flooded, and many lives have been lost along its banks; the cholera seems to be declining at Mecca and Jeddah, but it has appeared at the Black Sea ports. Rebel Arabs have defeated the army of the Sultan of Morocco, and massacred many prisoners, torturing two sons of the governor of a province to death among others. The natives of Yap, one of the Caroline Islands, belonging to Spain, have revolted and killed 27 soldiers of the Spanish garrison. One of the political signs of the times is the petition of 30 members of the Queensland Parliament to the English Crown for separation from the Home government.

The most Distinguished Arrival on These shores, during the week, was the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M. P., of England, who comes with his young American wife, formerly Miss Endicott, for a brief respite from parliamentary duties at home. Regarding the Behring Sea Fisheries dispute Mr.

Chamberlain expresses himself freely, holding that it cannot be claimed as a "closed sea" under any construction; that England and America have identical interests in preserving the seal fisheries from destruction, and that Canada, in her fisheries question, did not presume to demand as a right, but asked as a favor, the courtesy that was conceded to her. He also added that it was regrettable that while every Englishman feels a kind of family pride in the strength of America, American diplomacy should still be affected with a dislike of England.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, B. A., son of Dr. Talmage, expects shortly to become a student of Union Theological Seminary to prepare for the ministry.

The official board of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pittsfield, Mass., has notified a newspaper proprietor that he must either cease to publish his newspaper on Sunday or withdraw from the church.

Rev. A. B. Simpson pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle New York has received a legacy of $2,500 for use in Foreign Mission work, under the will of the late Rev. Thomas A. Austin of Chapeau, Canada.

A Sunday-school day has been set apart at the camp meetings at Pine Grove, and Willimantic, Conn. The former is for August 25th, and the latter for August 27th. The Connecticut Sunday-school Association has charge of the meetings.

The receipts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for July were $57,174, against $55,875 for the same month last year. The receipts for eleven months amount to $547,801 against $442,382 for the same period last year—showing a gain of $105,419.

Rev. N. B. Randall, LL.B., of Long Island City, N. Y., requests us to state that he is about to resign his pastorate to enter the field as an evangelist. He is strongly recommended to pastors and churches by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, Rev. H. G. DeWitt, D.D., of Rochester, N. Y.; Rev. J. L. Litch, of Norristown, Pa., and others.

A cordial reception was tendered on July 31 to Rev. Jas. Little by the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Va., whose call to the pastorate he has recently accepted. The organization of this church is the result of the labors of Rev. R. P. Kerr, D.D., of the First Presbyterian Church, whose efforts in the west end of the city have borne fruit so abundant that it has become necessary to call a pastor to take charge of it.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, the indefatigable pastor of the Hebrew Christian Church, New York, has had a narrow escape from death in a railroad accident. He was on his way to fill a lecture engagement near Wesley Park when the mail train by which he travelled ran into a milk train ahead. Mr. Freshman was thrown violently to the floor of the car and received two severe cuts on his forehead from the iron support of one of the seats. He lay unconscious for some time, but providentially a physician who was on board stopped the bleeding and bound up the long deep gashes. Mr. Freshman is now again at work in his mission, though he feels somewhat weak from shock and loss of blood.

An excellent work is being done in New Orleans by the Union Gospel Mission in Keller's Row, Felicity Road. Its work is first of all evangelistic, and meetings are held twice a week during the winter and in the open air during the summer. They are crowded nightly with people who cannot be induced to attend the churches, many of whom have been brought to the Saviour through the instrumentality of the mission. It has also a philanthropic side, for many come who have need of food and clothing, and these are supplied through the benevolence of friends of the Mission. The opportunities for work of this kind are greater than the capacity of the funds. Friends in the North who know something of the need of New Orleans for work of this character will do well to assist in supporting the Union Gospel Mission. Contributions of money or clothing will be thankfully received by the Superintendent, Mr. E. A. Vail, 163 Camp Street, New Orleans, La.

THE BEGINNING OF THE MIRACLES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Why Jesus Would have Approved of Total Abstinence—How the Evangelist Knew of the Miracle—

I. The Significance of the Miracle—A Sign of Christ's Self-Denial—Of His Beneficence—Compassion—Condescension—Munificence—A Miracle Prophetic of the Marriage Supper of the Lamb—II. A Special Manifestation—Free From Display—An Unbiased Testimony—III. How the Miracle Confirmed Faith—Showed His Power to Meet Unexpected Difficulties.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory; and His disciples believed on Him." John 2 : 11.

AT this time I shall not consider the relation of this miracle to total abstinence.

The wine which Jesus made was good wine, and it was made of water: we are not likely to meet with anything of the kind in this country, where the wine is seldom made from the pure juice of the grape, and where it is not known who made it, or of what it is made. What is now called wine is a very different liquid from that which our Lord divinely produced. We use our Christian liberty to abstain from wine, and we judge that our Saviour would approve of our avoiding that which, in these days, makes our brother offend. We who quit the intoxicating cup of to-day have our ways of viewing our Master's action in this instance, and we do not find it difficult to see wisdom and holiness in it; but even if we could not so interpret what He did we should not dare to question Him. Where others cavil, we adore. Even this is more than I meant to have said; for my object this morning is far removed from this controversy. I pursue a spiritual theme, and pray for help from on high to treat it aright.

We find this miracle only in John: neither Matthew nor Mark, nor Luke, has a word of it. How did John come to know of it? In part it was because of his being present; but the preface in reference to came in another way, we think. Remember our Lord's words to John from the cross, and how it is written, "From that hour that disciple took her unto his own home." I believe that no one heard the word of Jesus to His mother but Mary herself. It was after the manner of His delicacy to utter a reproof to her alone. But when John and the honored mother conversed together, she, in all probability, told him of her mistake.

Let it never be forgotten that "the mother of Jesus" had a very firm and practical faith in her Son, concerning whom angels and prophets had borne witness to her. May we, like Mary, sing, "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." and may Jesus be to us, as He was to her—a trusted and beloved one upon whom our soul has learned to wait with confidence. With that end in view I have taken this subject for discourse. Oh, that his disciples may trust Him more and more! John said, in another place, concerning the doings of our Lord, "These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His name." Truly I can say, this sermon is preached that my beloved hearers may believe on the Lord Jesus, and be saved.

I. To begin with, let us think upon the significance of this beginning of signs. The first sign-wonder that Christ wrought was the turning of water into wine at the wedding at Cana of Galilee; and as we may often judge of a man's course by its beginning and the beginning is often the key of all that follows, so we may learn the whole tenor of our Lord's miracles from this one. Note, first, that this miracle displayed

His Self denial.

Our Lord had been a few days before in the wilderness, and after forty days' fasting He was an hungered. It was in His power to have commanded the stones to become bread; and had He done so the beginning of signs would have been a miracle wrought for His own necessities. But such a beginning would not have been like His life-course, and especially would it have been wide apart from the conclusion of His life when it was said of Him, "He saved others; Himself He cannot save." He would not make bread for Himself but He will make wine for others; and the fact that it was wine, and not bread, that He made, makes the miracle all the more remarkable. He did not merely make bread for men, which is a necessity; but He even went further, and made wine for them, which is a luxury, though He would not even make bread for Himself. No selfish aim ever tinctured that consecrated life of His. For Himself He reserved no measure or degree of power: for others He used that power without stint. This beginning of miracles is a display of unselfish working.

An Instance of Beneficence.

Next, observe that this miracle was marked with beneficence. The mission of Jesus is a happy one, and so it opens at a marriage feast: it is intended to bring joy and gladness to heavy hearts, and so it begins with a deed of royal bounty. At the coronation of kings the conduit in Cheapside has run with wine, and here the waterpots are filled with it to the brim. The after-miracles were all beneficent. True, He withered a fruitless fig-tree, but it was a beneficent act to wither a tree which drew men out of their way by false promises of fruit, and so caused bitter pangs of disappointment to hungry and fainting wayfarers. All our Lord's actions towards men are full of royal benevolence and grace. There will be a day when the Lamb will be angry, and, as a Judge, He will condemn the ungodly; but while this dispensation lasts, He is to us all mercy, love, kindness, and bounty. If you, my hearer, will come to Him, you will find that His heart will go out to you; and He will freely bless you, with life, and rest, and peace, and joy. The Lord will bless you, and remove the curse far from you.

But, next, it was a miracle most compassionate. Our Lord's miracles were wrought in each case to meet a need. The wine had failed at the wedding-feast, and our Lord had come in at the time of the pinch, when the bridegroom was fearful of being made ashamed. That need was a great blessing. If there had been sufficient wine for the feast, Jesus had not wrought this miracle, and they had never tasted this purest and best of wine. It is a blessed need which makes room for Jesus to come in with miracles of love. It is good to run short, that we may be driven to the Lord by our necessity, for He will more than supply it. My dear hearer, if you have no need, Christ will not come to you; but if you are in dire necessity, His hand shall be stretched out to you.

Further, I cannot help noticing how condescending was this miracle! He wrought the sign, not on a spiritual and sacred occasion, nor before ecclesiastics and scientists. Some seem to fancy that all our Lord does must be done in churches or cathedrals. No, no; this miracle was in a private house, and that not at a prayer-meeting, or a Bible-reading, but at the marriage of a couple of poor peasants, names unknown. See how Jesus condescends to the commonplaces of life, and sheds a blessing upon the secular side of our existence!

Those who gave that feast were people of slender means. The wine would not have been so soon exhausted if they had been rich. They were by no means an aristocratic party, or a set of Israel's notables. Why did not our Lord begin His miracles before the king, or the governor, or at least in the presence of the high priest, and the scribes and doctors of the law? Our Lord chose not to make His first appeal to the great and dignified. I feel much comfort in this fact: that He comes to commonplace individuals is bliss to me. You and I may, in station and in wealth, be low down in the scale; but Jesus stoops to men of mean estate. To common spots like this Newington, on the south side of the Thames, the Lord has come to visit His people; here, also, has He wrought

His transformation, and many a watery life has been made rich and full through His grace. My dear hearer, Jesus can come to you, though you are only a laborer, or a servant, or a poor tradesman, or the wife of an artisan. Our Lord loves the poor. He is a great frequenter of cottages. He stops not for grand occasions; but He makes His abode with the lowly. He is full of condescension.

This first of miracles was most munificent. He did not at the wedding multiply the bread, but He dealt with a luxury, and rejoiced the hearts with that which was as the pure blood of the grape. When our Lord fed the multitudes in the wilderness, He might have given them each a bit of bread to keep them from famishing; but He never does things in a beggarly, workhouse style, and therefore He added fish, to be a relish with their bread. Our Lord not only gives existence, but happy existence, which is truly life. He does not give to men just enough for their necessity, but He gives up to the higher degree which we call enjoyment. Jesus does not measure out grace by the drop, as chemists do their medicines; but He gives liberally, His vessels are filled to the brim. And the quality is as notable as the quantity; He gives the best of the best—joys, raptures, and ecstasies. O my soul, at what a royal table dost thou sit! He daily loadeth thee with benefits.

The Easy Conditions.

To obtain the supply of wine, it is noteworthy that nothing was required from men but what was very simple and easy. Hasten, ye obedient servants, to fetch water; just draw it from the well; pour it into those large waterpots; that is all you have to do! The Lord Jesus does not come to us with hard conditions and exacting terms. Dream not that, to be saved, you have to do or feel some great thing. As you are you may believe in Jesus to eternal life. Have faith enough to draw out at the Lord's bidding, and to your own amazement, there will be wine where aforetime there was only water. The Lord, by His Spirit, can come and change your heart, and renew your spirit, so that where only a little natural thought has been, there will be spiritual life and feeling. He will do this without pressing and persuading. Grace is free. Jesus has a tender heart toward needy sinners; the spear has laid it open, a prayer will touch it.

The first miracle was prophetic. At a wedding our Lord begins His signs; to a marriage-feast He invites us now; at a glorious marriage-supper all will end. The story of our Bible ends like all well-told tales, with—they were married, and lived happy ever afterwards; for proof read the Book of the Revelation. Our Lord will come to celebrate a wedding between Himself and His church, and all the wine they will drink at that high festival will be of His own providing, and all the joy and bliss will be of His own giving. Jesus has come to unsuath the planet of her mists, and to array it in garments of glory and beauty. Soon shall we see new heavens and a new earth. The new Jerusalem will come down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. Jesus has come to elevate, and to fulfil; and He gives the token of this in this beginning of signs.

II. I want you to notice this miracle

As a Manifestation.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory." believe that there is a very clear connection between the first chapter of this Gospel and the passage before us. John in the first chapter said, "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth." Here you have an unvailing of that grace and glory.

And He operated so easily and so majestically, that He therein reminds us of the method and way of the great God. He simply says, "Fill the water-pots," and the servants do His bidding with enthusiasm, for He is Master of all minds. "Draw out now," He says, and in the process of bearing it to the ruler of the feast the water is turned into wine. Here is no effort breathing as of one gathering up his strength to perform a feat. The earth revolves, but the wheel of nature never grinds upon its axle. God acts by His laws in a perfectly natural and unconstrained manner. Creation and providence abide in that majestic silence which speaks of omnipotence. All goes easily where He will. With His own will He can do all things for us, and in a moment turn the waters of our life into joy.

Unostentatious.

Our Lord manifested His glory by operating naturally and without display. I really believe that if you could have worked this wonder, you could have said to the ruler of the feast, "Call on all the guests to remark that the wine has ended, and I am about to create a new supply. This huge waterpot. Mark how I have it filled with water, that you may know there is no wine left. Observe me while I work the transformation." Then you would have spoken aloud, or you would have gone through a series of performances. Jesus did nothing of the kind. He was unostentatious. He will not have His kingdom come with observation. He shuns pomp, noise, and ceremony; but acts like a God whose wonders are too many to be made matters of note to Himself. It was Godlike on our Lord's part to perform so great a work without appearing to be doing anything uncommon.

That He did literally perform the miracle, was testified by impartial witnesses. The servants all bring in the wine, and say nothing at all about whence it came; and the chief witness that what they bring is really wine, and wine of the best quality, shall be the master of the ceremonies—a gentleman not at all spiritually-minded, but one who has been at many such feasts, who knows the custom of them, and has a probability ready to set it forth. He was evidently a man who was a judge of the quality of wine, and who may safely accept his verdict—"Thou hast not the best wine until now." The less spirit—the man in this case, the better.

the reality of the miracle. If he had been a follower of Jesus he might have been suspected of being in the swim with Him and His disciples; but you can see that he is a man of another mold altogether. There was a special reason for this. Oh, my beloved hearers, if you come to Christ He will not deceive you; His teachings are not dreams. If you will come and listen in Jesus, the work He will do for you will be as real as what He did at Cana. Even the godly shall be obliged to see that God has made a change in you. When they see your new life, they will say, "Here is something, like of which we never saw in him before."

say again, the speciality of this manifestation lies in this, that it revealed the Lord Jesus by His own almighty power uplifting everything He touched, transforming men, and things, and facts into nobler ones than they were before, or could ever have become. This is the speciality of the manifestation of Christ: He saith, "Behold I make all things new." He brings forth the best last. He raises the poor man hunger to feasting. He uplifts fallen humanity into something so glorious that it stands, His person, near to the throne of God. In this Christ is revealed, and His name is glorified.

II. And now, lastly, I think we have here a deficiency for the confirming of faith. It is this, "And

His Disciples Believed on Him."

Note, that the guests at that feast all partook of the wine, but the disciples at that feast had something far better; they had an increase of faith. An increase of faith is better far than the dainties of a feast. Others ate and drank; but these men saw God in Christ Jesus manifesting His glory. Our inquiry is, What is there in this miracle which would tend to confirm their faith? Notice that I say to confirm their faith. It did not originate their faith, it established it. Their faith had been originated by the word of the Lord, preached by John the Baptist: they had believed in Jesus as the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. Secondly, they had enjoyed personal intercourse with Jesus, by going to Him, and dwelling with Him. This had strengthened their faith greatly. And now they begin to taste of the benefit of being associated with Jesus, and to see for themselves what Jesus was able to do. Thus their faith grew. His disciples believed on Him already, but this miracle confirmed their confidence.

But, next, it showed their Master's readiness to meet unexpected difficulties. Nobody had foreseen that the wine would fail. Jesus had not gone to the marriage prepared and primed, as we say among men. The demand came all of a sudden, and the supply came too: the wine ran out, and He was ready for the difficulty. Does not this confirm your faith? Christ is always ready for every emergency. Something may happen to-morrow that you have not thought of; Christ will be

Between here and heaven you will probably meet with a great many unlikely events; but they will not be surprises to Him. He has foresight: when the trial comes He will provide: "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen."

Again, their faith was confirmed because He had showed that He would allow nothing to fail with which he was connected. I like to feel sure that Jesus is with me in any business, for then I know that the pleasure of the Lord will prosper in His hand. True, it was not the wedding of one of His relatives or disciples, but still it was a marriage at which He was a guest; and He would not suffer it to be said that they ran short of provisions when He was there. His connection with the feast may seem to have been remote, but it was a connection; and slight connections are observed by our Lord Jesus. O my soul, if I can but touch the hem of His garment, virtue will come from Him to me. I think this must have encouraged the disciples much when, in after days, they began to preach; their confidence would be that Jesus was with them and they must prevail. They were poor, unlearned men, and all the scholarship of the age was arrayed against them; but they said to themselves, "We fear not, for Jesus is in this controversy, and He will see it through."

I have done when I have said to any here who are undecided—see, my dear hearer, Jesus Christ will come and visit such as you are. He is willing to go to plain men's houses, even when they have a feast going on. Ask Him to come to you just as you are. Jesus is able to raise you, beloved friend, from what you now are into something better, fuller, grander, nobler, holier, and more God-like. May He do it now! Believe in Him, believe Him, believe on Him, and it shall be done. Amen.

IN THE CHINK OF THE DOOR.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 31: "Whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child shall in nowise enter therein." Luke 18: 17.

"NOT another week! You've had quite enough time already, and I tell you now, Mrs. Gray, that unless the money is paid by noon on Monday next, out you pack, bag and baggage."

Old John Markham was the richest man in Rubyville. Widow Gray owed him a quarter's rent for the little white cottage she occupied. He had no prompter tenant until this year; but sickness and misfortune had pressed heavily on the widow's home, and her payments had fallen behind. Now that her health was restored, she felt confident in her ability to weather the financial storm; but her stern old landlord would not hear of further waiting.

It was a busy week for Mrs. Gray. She bustled about and succeeded after a day or two in raising fully one-half the amount needed and, moreover, she had the promise of the balance early the following week. So when the widow and her little son Willard went to the church at the foot of the hill, so cool and inviting among its shady elms, her heart and voice were lifted up with a feeling of pure thankfulness to Him who had come to her assistance in her hour of trouble.

But on Monday, when the friend who had promised to help her failed to do so, she was again plunged in grief, yet not despairing. The day was stormy and the rain beat heavily against the walls of the little white cottage. The clock ticked the hours away until it was nearly noon—the time fixed by John Markham for his visit. Would he come?

"Willard," she said, placing her arm about her son, "mamma needs your prayers and her own too, my boy. Ask Our Father to help us"—and the tears coursed down her face till she could say no more.

Ten-year old Willard knelt down by his mother's chair, and clasping his hands between hers, sent up his childish petition—the prayer of perfect truth and confidence. Their voices mingled together in supplication to the throne. They did not hear a step on the porch, or the bustle of an oil-skin overcoat as old John Markham shook out the raindrops and fumbled in the pocket for the dispossession warrant he had brought with him. He never believed in paying a deputy for doing what he could do himself.

Lifting the latch he looked in, half expecting to find the room empty and the household gone. He had had such experiences before. As he looked, he saw the lad's face upturned and heard the petition to the throne. He was drawing back impatiently when the sound of his own name, spoken by the childish lips, arrested his steps.

"Prayin' for me, eh?" he ejaculated. "Well, that's something, anyhow. Never thought there was anybody in Rubyville who cared enough for old Markham."

Tears stood in his eyes; his feet were chained to the door-step; move he could not, while those prattling lips continued to supplicate the Father to "help mamma, and oh, please God, bless Mr. Ma'kham and make him love Jesus."

Love Jesus! Never, since he was a child, could the old man remember that anyone had ever offered up a prayer in his behalf. All the memories of boyhood, and of a mother's earnest face rushed back upon him. As he listened, his heart softened, and he gently withdrew; but so nervous were his fingers that the latch rattled when he tried to close the door.

In a moment, Widow Gray stood before him. "Oh, Mr. Markham, come in," she said, cordially. "I have succeeded in getting more than half the rent. Here it is. I fully expected to have the other half to-day, but I've been disappointed."

"Um—it makes no difference, marm," said the old landlord, who stood awkwardly fumbling his hat while his face was half averted. "I came over to say you can pay me when you're ready. No hurry, pay it all together, you know. That's a fine boy o' yours, Mrs. Gray—a fine little lad, that—what's his name?"

"Willard," replied the widow.

"Well, Willard," said the old man, pleasantly, though his voice still trembled a little, "D'ye like nice, big, sweet pound apples, eh? Got a-plenty up in the orchard there, just a few rods away, and not a one to eat 'em. Won't ye come up to-morrow when it clears and get some?"

The boy was radiant with delight at the invitation. Turning to his mother, he said:

"Mamma, God heard, didn't He?"

* * * * *

Next afternoon, when Job, the old gardener and man-of-all-work, returned from the Markham orchard with Willard, he brought with him to Widow Gray, not only a big basket of pound apples, but a lot of other good things as well. It was all a mystery to Job, who had been in the Markham service a dozen years.

"The old master has taken a wonderful shine to that little chap o' yours," he explained to the widow. "He was under the apple trees with him the hull forenoon."

The glimpse of pure, childish faith in God, which he had seen at the little, white cottage, was the turning-point in John Markham's life. In his youth he had been led to despise religion, and his maturer thoughts had turned in the tortuous channel of scepticism. As age drew on, his heart had hardened and he became distrustful of all men and forgetful even of his Maker. With him it had always been a puzzle how people "got religion," and he had held many a bitter controversy with the village parson on the subject. He doubted everything that he could not understand, and weighed the finite knowledge of man against God's infinite wisdom. Now that his heart had been touched at last by the simple faith of the child, all the barriers were broken down, and he became like the youngest disciple at the Master's feet.

There was no more respected and beloved name in Rubyville than old John Markham's, when, years later, he passed to his reward. The change of heart had gone on unceasingly ever since that memorable stormy day when little Willard's lips had shown the man of the world the folly of his own wisdom and the goodness of a Saviour, who declared that the perfect, unquestioning faith of a child was the purest type of the confidence of Christian life.

THE LATE CARDINAL NEWMAN.

IN the death of Cardinal Newman, who passed away on Monday, August 11, at Birmingham, England, and whose portrait is here given, the world has lost a man of commanding intellect, profound scholarship, and a singularly lovable nature. As a boy, he astonished his teachers by his brilliant abilities; as a student, he inspired the brightest hopes of his future; as a preacher in the Church of England, he was without an equal in power and eloquence; as a tutor in Oxford University, he won the reverence and love of all who came in contact with him; and when he quitted his high place and relinquished all his emoluments to enter the Church of Rome, he was welcomed as the greatest of all the converts, and was ultimately raised to the highest rank, after the papal chair itself. No man in this century has exercised so potent a personal influence over the minds of young men, and none has caused so fierce a struggle in numbers of hearts, in which love for the man, and reverence for him as a teacher, had to contend with reason and religious principle.

John Henry Newman was born on February, 21, 1801; he was therefore in his ninetieth year, when he died. He was the son of a London banker, who sent him for his preparatory studies to the famous school at Ealing, under the charge of Dr. Nicholas. From his early years, he was a hard student, and when he was only sixteen years old, he was able to enter the University of Oxford. He graduated in 1822, and was ordained two years later. University honors were showered on the brilliant young man. He was made Vice-President of St. Alban's Hall, a tutor of Oriel College, and one of the select preachers to the University. In 1828, he became also, Vicar of St. Mary's, the church at Oxford most frequented by the undergraduates, and famous for its long list of great preachers. The sermons he preached in that classic edifice will never be forgotten. A tone of deep spirituality pervaded them; they were full of noble thoughts expressed in beautiful, graceful language, and they told of the intense longing of the preacher after perfect holiness, inspiring the same aspiration in his hearers. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Froude, and many of the men who were to become famous in politics and in literature, were glad to count themselves among his disciples and they acknowledge, their obligations to him.

Newman's personal influence grew. The young men who listened to him in St. Mary's were cordially received when they went to him for spiritual help and advice. They looked to him for guidance, and no man seemed better fitted, by nature and by training, for a spiritual mentor. At that time he was strongly opposed to Romanism, and even refused to vote for Sir Robert Peel as a member of Parliament for the University, on the sole ground that he was in favor of admitting Roman Catholics to Parliament. Nevertheless, his sermons, read now in the light of subsequent events, show that at that time, unknown to his hearers and to himself, he was adopting principles which must logically lead him into the Church of Rome. The drift covered fifteen years of his life. His teachings and practices developed, more and more, a tendency to interpret the thirty-nine articles of the Protestant Episcopal Church and to conduct the services, in the spirit of the Church of Rome. A note of alarm was raised not only in the university, but in the country by men of standing whose sons at Oxford were losing their hold on Protestantism.

The crisis came in 1841 when Newman published a tract which was number ninety in a series called Tracts for the Times. In this tract he defined his theological position; and his critics pronounced it rank Romanism. His colleagues in the University were slow to move against a man so generally revered and beloved and whose purity of life and high Christian character were as evident as his marvellous learning and talents. At length, however, he was condemned and required to withdraw his tract. He declined, and resigned his pastorate of St. Mary's. Such a scene of manly emotion has rarely been witnessed as that in the congregation which listened to his last sermon in that venerable edifice. "Should you know any one," said the preacher, "whose lot it has been, by writing or by word of mouth, in some degree to help you; if he has ever told you what you know about yourselves, or what you did not know; has read to you your wants and feelings, and comforted you by the very reading; has made you feel that there was a higher life than this daily one and a brighter world than that you see; or encouraged you or sobered you, or opened a way to the inquiring, or soothed the perplexed; if what he has said or done has ever made you take interest in him, and feel well inclined towards him; remember such a one in time to come, though you hear him not, and pray for him, that in all things he may know God's will, and at all times he may be ready to fulfil it." With these touching words Newman quitted forever the scene of his triumphs and shortly afterward, in 1843, applied for admission to the Church of Rome.

It was his intention to become a lay member of the church and to work in some educational capacity, but the heads of the church knew too well the value of his pulpit powers to permit that. He studied for a short time in Rome and then returned to England to establish an oratory at Birmingham. There he spent the remainder of his life with a brief interval during which at the Pope's request he acted as rector of a Roman Catholic University in Dublin. There he preached and wrote some of his famous works. One of the most recent was "an apology for his life" in which he defended himself against some harsh criticisms and showed how his convictions had led him irresistibly into the Romish Church. His work was widely read, as were his other works that were written both before and after his quitting the Protestant Church, and his famous hymn, "Lead Kindly Light," is still sung in churches of every communion. One of the present pope's earliest acts after ascending the papal chair was to make the kind, gentle, retiring old man a cardinal and even his opponents rejoiced that his many excellences were thus honored.

A BUDDHIST TEMPLE IN INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

MANY magnificent structures still remain in India to attest the former predominance of Buddhism in that land. One of the most imposing of them is the temple at Sravana Belgula, a village in the Hasan district of Mysore, thirty-five miles northwest of Seringapatam, India, picture of which is here given. Like the other Buddhist temples, it is built on the top of a hill which was levelled so as to form a plateau facing the east. It is about one hundred and fifty yards in length and one hundred in width, is surrounded by a terrace reached by a double flight of steps from the south. Its walls consist of a colonnade of tall pillars beautifully carved

Near the hill on which the temple stands is another hill, a vast tor of syenite over four hundred feet high, called Indra-giri. On its summit is the tallest stone statue in the world, a colossal figure of Guatama Buddha, seventy feet three inches in height, cut out of the solid rock. This is the tallest of the three great images of Buddha in India. All three are the work of the Jainas, one of the sects or off-shoots of Buddhism. The sculptor of the image on the Indra-giri, according to an inscription on its base, was Chavunda Raya, who, the Jainas say, lived fifty years before Christ. The statue, like the generality of the statues of Buddha, represents him seated, with his legs crossed in an attitude of contemplation, as contemplative thought is one of the highest duties of the Buddhist system.

Buddha himself is believed to have lived about 543 years before Christ, though the Japanese Buddhists fix the date of his birth 1027 B. C., and the Tibetans and Chinese in 2214 B. C. He is regarded in China, Thibet, Burmah, and Japan as the supreme ruler of the world in this dispensation, and as such receives divine homage. The essence of the system of religion which he taught, in opposition to the Brahmins, is the complete suppression of the passions as the one aim of life, and by love and meekness to win others to the same state of self-deliverance. The number of Buddhists is variously estimated, but there is little doubt that not less than three hundred million persons profess themselves as followers of Buddha.

AN ARAB SHEIK AT PRAYER.

(See Illustration.)

THE accompanying picture, which is reproduced from a photograph obtained by Dr. Talmage during his tour in the Holy Land, represents an Arab sheik engaged in prayer. The designation of sheik has now come to be applied to any kind of leader, social, political, or religious. Dr. Thompson in his travels found a sheik who was the leader of a religious reform in Mohammedanism, who sent out apostles, and whose followers were said to number twenty thousand. He spent some hours in trying to convert Dr. Thompson to his views. Another man, who was also called a sheik, was chief of a band of robbers and did not make any secret of his occupation.

Before the muezzin announces the hour of prayer from the minaret of the mosque, which he does five times a day, the devout sheik goes through a thorough ablution, thoroughly cleansing his hands, and feet, and head, and gargling his throat. Then he spreads his carpet. He raises his open hands till the thumbs touch the ears, exclaiming Allah hu Akbar—"God is great." The next attitude is upon his knees, where with open hands, and thumbs extended to his ears, he offers praise to "God most great." He then prostrates himself, his nose and forehead touching the earth between his out-spread hands. The devout Muslimman will go through this performance wherever he may be, and though it may attract around him crowds of scoffers.

Unhappily these public devotions are not always an indication of practical piety, for, like the Pharisees who loved to pray standing at the corners of the streets that they might be seen of men, and then devoured widows' houses, these men will go from their devotions to rob and murder without compunction.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

PLANS THAT WENT ASTRAY.

NO truer sentiment was ever written than that of Robert Burns when he penned the lines:

"The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men Gang aft a-gley,
An' lea'e us nought but grief and pain,
For promised joy."

And such proved to be the experience of several characters that have been figuring in this narrative.

When Metta Chapman wrote to Robert Heritage, she felt somewhat confident that he would be able to explain satisfactorily his treatment of Dolly Pressley, for she suspected that his part in the unhappy affair had been exaggerated by scandal-loving tongues. She therefore awaited his reply with some little impatience. If he could dispel the cloud of suspicion that hung over him, she saw no reason for rejecting his offer of marriage. When she looked into her own heart, there was no doubt about her love.

Sunday came and passed. She had written on Friday. On Monday she expected a reply, but, strange to say, none came. "He has been busy, perhaps, and wants to take time to explain in full," she said to herself. But when Tuesday passed and no letter arrived, her heart began to sink. "Can it be that he is guilty, after all?" she murmured. Wednesday, Thursday, Friday dragged themselves wearily by, bringing no reply to her missive, and at last she had no shred of hope to cling to.

"He can't explain, he can't explain," she repeated to herself, bitterly. "If he could, he would write. If he loved me, he would not let a day pass without trying to exonerate himself. He has been trifling with me as he did with Dolly Pressley."

And she fell on her knees with a heart-broken sob, and tried to pray, but her heart was like lead and the heavens were brass.

Two weeks, passed during which she was so distraught with her grief and humiliation that she had scarcely looked at a book or paper. One evening she picked up a batch of dailies from the library-table and carried them to her own room, intending to look them over. As she glanced listlessly through the columns, reading only the head-lines of most of the articles, for she cared little for the diurnal budget of gossip, social events, crimes and casualties, suddenly her eye fell upon an announcement that made her heart stand still. Here was the explanation of Heritage's mysterious silence. On examining the date of the paper, she found that it went back two weeks, less one day. Metta's face was as white as the walls of her room when she had read through the half-column, devoted to the recital of a sad event, which must now be described.

As has been seen, Robert Heritage performed his duties at the Teachers' Institute in a rather perfunctory way, the reason for which was that his mind was preoccupied with Metta's letter. He felt a little hurt at the mistrust it evinced, and yet when he put himself in Metta's place and looked at the matter from her point of view, he was not disposed to blame her. As he was whirling home on the train, he drew her letter again from his pocket and re-read it. He resolved to answer it that evening, whatever other work had to be laid aside, and explain fully the episode of his college life, that seemed ever and anon to be haunting him like a Nemesis. Then his mind went back over the whole affair in detail, every incident falling into its proper order, just as he intended to describe it to his correspondent.

He recalled his first meeting with Dolly Pressley. It was during the spring session of his Junior year at college. She had just entered the Freshman class, and gave promise of unusual brilliancy, so that her debut created quite a sensation among the students, both male and female, many of the young men vying with one another in their chivalrous attentions to her. There was, indeed, a subtle fascination about her black eyes, and tall, willowy form.

One day, Heritage was rummaging through one of the college libraries, as he often did, when he heard a woman's frightened scream, and running to the door, he saw a carriage horse rearing and plunging wildly, trying to get away from his driver, who, Heritage saw, was a young lady. The animal had evidently gotten frightened at a newspaper that came rolling along the drive before the wind. It took but a moment for the young athlete to rush down the steps and seize the animal by the bridle. Having succeeded in controlling the beast, he found that the driver was the winsome girl who had recently created so great a sensation in the college, Dolly Pressley. He saw, at a glance that she was completely overcome by fright, and would not be able to drive home alone, and so he swung himself into the carriage by her side, took the lines from her trembling hands, and offered to accompany her.

That was the beginning of his acquaintance with the dark-eyed beauty. That he was somewhat impressed by her quaint, whimsical ways, goes without saying; he may have even been in a manner infatuated; but he had never been willing to admit even to himself that he was in love. He was young and thoughtless, and found her company very agreeable, for it could not be denied that she was a vivacious conversationalist; and so he became her "cavalier" to lectures, entertainments, and social gatherings. He meant no harm, he scarcely thought of her heart being won, or of her taking his attentions seriously, but rather looked upon their friendship as a "Platonic affair."

With Dolly, however, it was different. At their first meeting the arrows of Eros, whose missiles, it is said, could pierce the fish at the bottom of the sea, penetrated her heart, and it was evident to others, if not to Heritage himself, that she was violently hopelessly in love with him. That she was fitful in her moods and passionate he soon discovered, but such freaks of human nature in a beautiful woman before marriage (it is different afterward!) often render her a very sorceress in the masculine eye; and so it was for a while in this instance.

The intimacy continued between the young couple after Heritage had entered upon his Senior year. One evening, in October, he conducted her home from a musicale at the college. She had her rooms, when she did not go back to her own home in the country, in a private house which stood quite isolate on the outskirts of the town. It had been a brilliant entertainment, and the young people's hearts were in precisely the right mood for sentiment. He acknowledged afterward that he was somewhat under the spell of her beauty that evening, and so, with the harmony of Rubenstein's oratorio still ringing in his ears, he unguardedly expressed his admiration of the girl in language that was more ardent and direct than he had meant it to be. He felt at the time that he was going too far, but the torrent of sentiment hurried him on.

The love-lorn, impulsive girl took his words literally. In a paroxysm of feeling, which she seemed unable to control, she flung her arms about his neck, and pressing her lips against his, broke out passionately:

"Robert, can it be true, oh! can it be true that you love me? I can scarcely believe that you mean it. My heart has been yours from the first day I met you."

What could he say? The girl's heart would be broken, if he attempted to deceive her. His courage failed him, and instead of manfully telling her the truth, he weakly gave her a caress, called her an endearing name, and then walked away beneath the elms that skirted the street. He was ill at ease, and sat in his room for hours mentally debating what course he should next pursue. Perhaps he could love the girl. She was beautiful and talented, and doubtless would make him a good wife, though he had some misgiving in regard to her freakish, unregulated passions. But he was too young to enter into an engagement, he reasoned. He would not be ready to marry for a number of years, at least not until he had taken a special course of professional training, and he could not help feeling that a betrothal at present would be premature, and might become an encumbrance to him. Then he reasoned that Dolly was young and foolish, and might some time rue her choice. Here, however, as he afterward found, he was mistaken in his estimate of her character.

He was now in a sad predicament. Dolly would regard herself as his fiancée, and would expect him thereafter to pay his court to her.

What might have been the sequel had Dolly herself been more guarded and self-restrained, who can tell?

A month had passed—a month of intense mental anguish for Robert—when one evening, Dolly complained of some slight of which she thought him guilty; her eyes flashed like glowing embers, and she spoke in hot, passionate tones, that stirred Robert's blood.

"Dolly, you are too exacting—more so than you have a right to be," he said, in a constrained voice.

"What do you mean, sir?" she blazed. "When a man is engaged to a girl, hasn't she a right to demand respectful treatment from him? It is shameful for you to neglect me and slight me openly. I won't stand it!"

He was stung into a sharp retort.

"Engaged!" he exclaimed. "Dolly, who said we were engaged?"

"What!" she cried, standing before him, her face distorted with anger, and the muscles of her throat twitching painfully. "Do you mean to say we are not? Didn't you tell me you loved me? And didn't you kiss me and call me an endearing name? If that doesn't mean a betrothal, then I don't know—" But she was too excited to finish.

"I am sorry to say it, Dolly, but you misconstrued my words that evening; and I was too weak to correct your mistake at the time. Forgive me, Dolly. I didn't mean to—"

"Robert Heritage, you are a —"

"Don't say it, Dolly."

"You may go! Never speak to me again!" And she swept haughtily from the room.

However, with a girl of Dolly Pressley's temperament, a tempest of passion soon spends itself and is usually followed by a violent reaction. In a paroxysm of grief and weakness she wrote him a pitiful letter a few days later, saying that she was heart-broken, that she could not live without him, and imploring him to come to her home without fail on an evening she named. He went, for in the kindness of his heart he could not refuse her request. It was a trying ordeal. The poor girl sobbed as if her heart were broken, and seemed to have lost all sense of maidenly pride in the awful tide of anguish that swept her being; but Heritage was firm, telling her as gently as he could that a betrothal at this time was out of the question; it would not be possible in his circumstances and as it would involve a long engagement it would be detrimental to her.

"You don't love me," she interrupted; "You are afraid you can't be true to me through all the years of waiting. You have led me on to love you, and now you play false and break my heart."

"You wrong me, Dolly. I had no thought of leading you to love me."

"But you did speak those words that evening—those words that bewitched my heart," she broke out. "Oh! I can never forgive you. You have humiliated me until I have lost all self-respect. Robert, I love you and I hate you. I shall have revenge some day, sometime. You will suffer yet for your heartlessness."

He was too kind to tell her that one reason for his present course was that he could never marry a girl of so fierce and uncontrollable a temper, and so he left her sobbing upon her chair, and never entered that door again. After this distressing interview he occasionally met her, for she remained in college until the end of her sophomore year, and it made his heart bleed and gave him many a qualm of conscience when he saw how pale and wan her cheeks had become. Once or twice he surprised her looking wistfully at him, while several times her eyes seemed to gleam with a fierce, vindictive lustre.

This was the true story of his dealings with Dolly Pressley. He went over all the incidents in detail as he held Metta's letter in his hand on the home-bound train, telling himself that, as soon as he got home, he would write out the story in full for Metta's enlightenment. At that moment his ruminations were rudely interrupted by the shrill whistle of the locomotive, followed by a violent jerking motion of the train, as if the brakes had been suddenly put on. There were loud cries from a forward car and Heritage sprang up and ran to the door to see what had happened. There he met a woman who had run out of the car ahead to the rear platform shrieking wildly, "My child! my child!" She was too much agitated to explain what had happened, but another woman told him that the child had been leaning from an open window and had overbalanced. Before the train had quite come to a standstill, Heritage jumped from the platform and ran back. It was about half a mile to the place where the child had fallen; but he was soon there with others at his heels. The little one was not dead. Its cries proved that. It had fallen among some bushes on swampy land and was covered with mud, but seemed to have plenty of life left in it. He snatched the little thing up in his arms and as he did so he noticed that one arm hung limp, and he feared it must be broken. He hurried back to relieve the mother's anxiety and placed the child tenderly in her arms. There was a surgeon on the train who was already with the mother. He confirmed Heritage's suspicion about the broken limb, but he at once proceeded to set it with such appliances as could be gathered about the train.

As soon as he had seen that all was done that was possible, Heritage returned to his seat. Where was Metta's letter? He had it in his hand when he started up. He searched his pockets thinking that he might have put it in one of them involuntarily. But it was not there. He must have dropped it when he ran back for the child, or when he stooped to pick up the little one. Only one thing was clear; it was lost. Heritage was vexed, but he knew every word of it, so it was not a serious loss, and of all Metta's letters that was the one he valued least.

It was destined to be a fateful day. Having gotten off the train at Basserine, he was absent-mindedly stepping into the electric street-car, thinking of the letter he intended to write, when the car started unexpectedly, causing him to lose his balance and he plunged headlong into a heap of sharply hewn stones on the street, where, to the dismay of the bystanders, he lay unconscious, with scarcely the tremor of a muscle. He was quickly carried to a doctor's office, where, after an examination, the physician said to the men who had gathered around:

"There is a slight fracture of the skull. An indentation of the cranial bone presses down upon the cerebrum. He must have struck the sharp corner of a stone when he fell."

Heritage lay in the surgeon's office for an hour, when Dr. Hamlyn happened to pass, and requested that he be taken to his own home where he received nursing of the most tender and affectionate kind. The physician at once telegraphed to Heritage's brother, who lived in an Eastern State and who by travelling day and night, reached Basserine by the following Monday evening. He found Robert somewhat better, but his memory was a blank and reason had lost her sway, so that he did not even recognize his brother or the other friends who stood by his bedside. It was pitiful to see the vacant stare of those once clear and intelligent eyes.

As the days passed he recovered bodily strength, but in spite of the most skilful surgical operation and attendance it was found impossible to restore the normal functions of his brain, which, it seemed, had sustained a serious lesion. His brother finally secured the consent of the physician to take Robert to the old home in the East, and in two weeks from the date of the accident they arrived at their destination. But, alas! Robert only stared vacuously at the familiar scenes of his early years without a single sign of recognition. His parents were heart-broken, but could do nothing to re-unite the broken thread of recollection or to rouse him from his mental apathy.

evangelist in Nottingham, England, but among the people who came to meetings at the start was one man who as he explained, "to help along." He sang very heartily and sometimes teared to engage in prayer. The evangelist had a suspicion from the manner of the man that all was not right between him and his soul. He inquired about him, and learned that he was a church-member and advertising agent by occupation. At the close of the first week's meetings a sermon was preached of a very searching character. It was an appeal to Christians to give up their profession in their business. The agent was present; but he did not come to the next service nor to any of the services the next week. The evangelist met him in the street one morning and asked him to his absence. "I do not care to be," he said, "I do not like to be preached at, as you preached at me last night." "Why," said the evangelist, "I was not preaching at you. I was talking to inconsistent Christians. You do not belong to that class, do you?" "No," said the agent, "but you spoke of whom swindlers and frauds use for purposes. Every one there would say you meant me." "Do swindlers and frauds use you?" "Well, not that I know of, but some people have complained they have taken advertisements that did not turn out all right. But I can't be expected to look into every man's business, now." "Well, ask God about it," said the evangelist, "and ask Him to show you your duty." That night the agent was at the meeting, but he was not singing. At the close of the meeting he went forward and asked for prayers. The man was in great distress. He said he had prayed and read the Bible and in his reading he found the passage, "Be not partakers of men's sins; keep yourself pure," (1 Peter 2:22). That passage converted him. He had been negligent, and when offered him a good price for an advertisement he took it, and if he had reason to think it was fraudulent he did not make it. He said he should find his suspicions confirmed. He had blinded his eyes through love of money and he was afraid God would punish him away. The evangelist says he knew a man whom it was so difficult to get into the light. His despair was terrible to witness. He had been trying to get God and mammon and thought he was accomplishing that feat. But now his eyes were opened. He declared himself a sinner because he had been a singing Christian while serving Satan. In a severe struggle, the Holy Spirit brought peace to his soul and he went out of that meeting a new man, resolved in his strength henceforth to serve God and not at any cost.

SNAKE CHARMER'S MISTAKE.

A noted circus man was giving an exhibition of his power over snakes. His action which always thrilled the audience was with an enormous boa-constrictor, which he had possessed since it was only four days old. For twenty-five years he handled it daily, so that it was completely harmless and completely under his control. He had seen it grow a tiny reptile, which he often carried in his pocket, into a fearful monster. On the night as usual, the monster was brought to the end of the performance. The man rose upon an Indian woodland. The weird strains of an oriental melody stole through the trees. A rustling was heard, and a huge serpent is seen winding its way through the undergrowth. Its head is erect. Its bright eyes gleam. Its whole body seems animated. It emerges from the heavy foliage. Its eyes meet. The serpent quails before man—man is victor. The serpent is under the control of a master. Under his glance and direction it performs a series of wonderful feats. At a signal from the man it slowly approaches him, and begins to coil its body folds around him. Higher and higher do they rise, until man and serpent are blended into one. Its hideous head is raised aloft above the mass. The man gives a little scream, and the audience unite in a thunderous burst of applause, but it freezes upon their lips. The trainer's scream turns into a wail of death agony. Those cold, slimy folds had embraced him for the last time. They had crushed the life out of him, and the horror-stricken audience heard bone after bone crack as those powerful folds tightened upon him. Man's plaything had become his master. His slave for twenty-five years had now enslaved him. Many a man has lost his soul in the same way. He has indulged in evil habits until insidiously they have gained power, and when he would have thrown them off he has found himself helpless.

TAMING A SHREW.

AN aged Christian miner gives a vivid account of the trials he endured at the hands of his wife immediately after his conversion, before it pleased God to change her heart, too. It would appear that by acting on Christ's rule of non-resistance he was the means of bringing her to the Saviour. His experience may be useful to other husbands for miners are not the only men who have "trying" wives. The old man says:

"After my conversion I strove to put love into my every look and action toward my wife. When I came down in the morning, there was the fire out. Time back there would have been a row and I am sorry to say I had beaten her for a slighter offence; but now I said, 'Lord, show her what thy grace can do,' and I would kindle the fire. Then I heard her chamber door open, and I slipped out, not to make her feel uncomfortable like.

This went on for six months, when one day I went up to the chapel and stayed to speak to some people about their souls, and when I got home I found my door locked against me, and my wife gone to bed. My first impulse was to kick that door in, but I looked up into the heavens and thought, 'He shall not strive nor cry, neither shall he lift up his voice in the streets!'

I walked over to the churchyard near my house, and there the dear Lord was present to my soul, like a mother comforting her child. At half-past two something white appeared. When it got nearer, I saw it was my wife. She threw herself down at my feet, and said, 'Anthony, can you forgive me?' 'I have nothing to forgive,' I said, lifting her up. 'Oh, kick me, hit me, but do not speak like that.' 'There is nothing but love towards you in my heart. You know I used to have a bad temper, but the Lord Jesus has changed all that.' Then she said, 'Anthony, will you come over to the kitchen and ask the dear Lord to put His grace in my heart?' We went, and there she surrendered her heart to God, and we have been very comfortable ever since."

A LITTLE WIFE'S HEROISM.

"AMONG the children that came to the mission school," says Miss Leitch, in her description of the work in a village in India, was Dasammah, a girl twelve years of age, already married but permitted by her husband to come to school." Miss Leitch says that she was exceedingly quiet and retiring. But she paid close attention to the teaching and seemed deeply interested.

It appears that one day talking with her husband, she told him that their idols were no true Gods and begged him to go to the mission and hear about Jesus. He was very much troubled at this. He did not contemplate this result when he gave his consent to Dasammah going to the mission school. "I must take you away," he said. "You shall live with my mother for a time. Be ready to start in an hour."

She was the only Christian in the village where her mother-in-law lived. There was no missionary or teacher, but day by day she studied her Bible. A short time afterward, news came that her husband had died suddenly and then according to the custom in India the family treated her harshly. They even accused her of causing his death, by deserting their gods. They said: "Now you shall worship our gods and promise not to become a Christian." "I cannot," said the girl simply, "I am a Christian."

Her brothers-in-law were told and they became exasperated. They threatened her, but she remained firm. Then they sent the women into their own apartments and taking the child-widow into the garden, they fastened her hands and feet to four stakes driven into the ground. They gave her one more chance. They said: "Now we will bring fire and burn your feet, unless you promise that you'll not become a Christian." And the girl answered, "I do believe in Christ. I am a Christian." They put the fire to her feet and, said to her, "Now will you promise. The girl answered, 'Oh, I cannot promise, I am, I am a Christian.'"

After a time, she fainted away. They untied her hands and feet, and carried her into a dark room, and left her there. In the middle of the night consciousness returned, and she got up and went to the missionary's house. It took her that night, the next day and all the next night to make the journey. At night she travelled on her knees.

On her arrival she was completely exhausted, but after her feet had been dressed she revived. She is now engaged as a Bible woman in the village and is happy and successful in her work.

What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces unsightly lumps or swellings; which causes painful running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or many other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors." It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the worst possible features of both. Being the most ancient, it is the most general of all diseases or affections, for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished, often when other medicines have failed, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. For all affections of the blood Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some of the cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial.

"YE ARE MY WITNESSES."

TELL me, pilgrim, faint and weary,
Traveling o'er this pathway dim,
Are you shedding light around you,
Are you witnessing for Him?

Do you try to tell the story
Of the precious Saviour's love?
Are you hungering and thirsting Evermore your love to prove?

Are you seeking out the lost ones
Whom the Master died to win?
Are you showing them the fountain
That can wash away their sin?

Are you looking by the wayside
For the weary ones who fall?
Do you take them to the Saviour,
Who has promised rest for all?

Do you love to read the Bible,—
Is it precious to your soul?
Are its treasures growing richer
As you travel toward the goal?

Do you love to talk of Jesus
More than all the world beside?
Does it bring a holy comfort
With His people to abide?

Have you made a consecration
Of your time and earthly store?
If your all is on the altar,
Then the Master asks no more.

Thus, O pilgrim, should we journey,
Showing forth the Master's praise,
With our lamps all trimmed and burning,
That the world may catch their rays.

AN OLD MAN'S ADVICE.

A gentleman, travelling in the east of England, called at the house of a friend, where he met a young minister, just going to preach at a church in the neighborhood. The lady of the house offered him a glass of spirits before setting out, which offer he readily accepted. Upon seeing this, an old man present said, "My young friend, let me offer you a word of advice respecting the use of liquors. There was a time when I was as acceptable a preacher as you now can be, but by too frequently accepting of the well-intended favors of my friends, I contracted the habit of drinking, so that now I never go to bed sober if I can possibly obtain liquor. I am, in truth, just as miserable as a creature can be on this side of hell." Two years after this, the traveler just mentioned had occasion to call again at the same house, and made inquiry about the elderly man who, by his own confession, had fallen a victim to strong drink. He was told that he had died some time ago, killed by strong drink. This sad incident serves to show the fell power possessed by the drink fiend. With his mighty talons he pulls down the minister from his pulpit, the merchant from affluence, the statesman from power, and many from virtue. Who in his own strength can withstand him if once they tamper with him?

A PURCHASED LIFE.

DURING the Reign of Terror in France (between June, 1793, and June, 1794), a young man, of the name of Loizerolles, was brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal and condemned to death. His father, a venerable, white-haired old man, would not allow himself to be separated from his son, but accompanied him to prison. On the day appointed for his execution, the young man, exhausted by the strain upon his nerves, fell asleep in his dungeon, and the father kept watch beside him. Shortly afterwards the jailer, in company with some soldiers, presented himself at the door, holding in his hand a paper containing a list of the unhappy persons who were that day to suffer death. Coming up to the unfortunate condemned ones, he called out the names from his list, ticking them off with a pencil as they answered. But when he came to the name "Loizerolles" no one rose to reply to it. A sudden thought took possession of the breast of the aged father, and he replied to the call when it was made the second time. He joined the ranks of the condemned, who were setting out on the sad journey to the scaffold. He did not dare to embrace his son, for fear of awakening him, and arousing the suspicions of the guards; but in a low voice, addressing his companions in captivity, who were looking at him with tearful eyes, he said, "When he awakes, I conjure you to calm him, and prevent any imprudent despair on his part from rendering my sacrifice useless. I have the right to be obeyed. Tell him that I forbid him to endanger the life which I have a second time given him." He then went out with the crowd of doomed men, and laying his head upon the scaffold, murmured these last words, "Lord, watch over and protect my son." Had he not a claim that the son whose life he had purchased by the sacrifice of his own should make good use of it? That is Christ's claim on every Christian. It is "the reasonable service" incumbent on Him.

A CHINAMAN'S PRODIGAL SON.

A SHOCKING story of an unnatural crime in China is related by Rev. T. R. Stevenson of Shanghai. He says that a wealthy merchant in Canton, had two sons, the elder of whom was a dissipated youth, who consorted with thieves and gamblers, and was driven away from home after wasting his share of the patrimony. He was reduced to beggary, and was in the habit of soliciting alms from his father's servants at the back door of his residence. At last, with a band of companions, he broke into his father's house and stole the money chest. A few weeks later, the son's participation in the robbery having been discovered by the father, the latter sent a trusty servant to him to say that if he would promise to lead a better life he would be forgiven, and might return home. The servant saw the young man, who was again reduced to penury after spending his share of the robbery, and advised him that now or never was the time to reform and better himself. The son agreed to the terms, and accompanied the servant home, where he was received with every appearance of joy and a banquet was prepared to celebrate the reconciliation. But the dish set before him was poisoned with arsenic, and during the night he died in great agony. Nothing has been, or will be, done to call the father guilty of the crime to account, as in Chinese law the son is regarded as the property of the father, and the latter can do as he likes with his sons. It is to such men that the handful of Christian missionaries are trying to teach the more excellent way. (Luke 15: 11, 32.)

SAVED BY A HYMN.

A YOUNG woman, under deep anxiety of mind, had been visiting Dr. Spencer, the author of 'A Pastor's Sketches.' One evening he announced the hymn, without at all thinking of the application it might have to her case. The next day she called upon him. "Sir," said she, "I have made a new discovery." "Well, and what is it that you have discovered?" "Why, sir," said she, "the way of salvation; it all seems to me now perfectly plain. My darkness is all gone. I now see what I never saw before." "Do you see that you have given up sin, and the world, and given your whole heart to Christ?" "I do not know I am a Christian," she replied; "but I have never been so happy before. All is light to me now. I see my way clear; and I am not burdened and troubled as I was." "And how is this? What has brought you to this state of mind? I do not know how it is, or what has brought me to it; but when you were reading that hymn last night, I saw the whole way of salvation for sinners perfectly plain, and wondered that I had never known it before. I saw that all I had to do was to trust Christ.

'A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On Thy kind arms I fall;
Be Thou my strength and righteousness,
My Jesus, and my all.'

I sat all the evening just looking at that hymn. I did not hear your prayer. I did not hear a word of your sermon. I do not know your text. I thought of nothing but that hymn: and I have been thinking of it ever since. It is so full of light, and makes me so contented. Why, sir," said she, in her simplicity never dreaming that she was saying what had been told her a thousand times, "don't you think that the reason we do not get out of darkness sooner is that we don't believe."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

"A soft tongue breaketh the bone." Prov. 25 : 15.

WHEN Solomon said this he drove a whole volume into one phrase. You, of course, will not be so silly as to take the words of the text in a literal sense. They simply mean to set forth the fact that there is a tremendous power in a kind word. Although it may seem to be very insignificant, its force is indescribable and illimitable. Pungent and all-conquering utterance: "A soft tongue breaketh the bone."

If the weather were not so hot, and I had time, I would show you kindness as a means of defence; kindness as a means of usefulness; kindness as a means of domestic harmony; kindness as best employed by governments for the taming and curing of criminals; and kindness as best adapted for the settling and adjusting of international quarrels; but I shall call your attention only to two of these thoughts.

And first, I speak to you of kindness as a means of defence. Almost every man, in the course of his life, is set upon and assaulted. Your motives are misinterpreted or your religious or political principles are bombarded. What to do under such circumstances is the question. The first impulse of the natural heart says: "Strike back. Give as much as he sent. Trip him into the ditch which he dug for your feet. Gash him with as severe a wound as that which he inflicted on your soul. Shot for shot. Sarcasm for sarcasm. An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth." But in the man's soul says: "You ought to reconsider that matter." You look up into the face of Christ and say: "My Master, how ought I to act under these difficult circumstances?" And Christ instantly answers: "Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." Then the old nature rises up again and says: "You had better not forgive him until first you have chastised him. You will never get him in so tight a corner again. You will never have such an opportunity of inflicting the right kind of punishment upon him again. First chastise him and then let him go." "No," says the better nature, "hush, thou foul heart. Try the soft tongue that breaketh the bone." Have you ever in all your life known acerbity and acrimonious dispute to settle a quarrel?

Many years ago there was a great quarrel in the Presbyterian family. Ministers of Christ were thought orthodox in proportion as they had measured lances with other clergymen of the same denomination. The most outrageous personalities were abroad. As, in the autumn, a hunter comes home with a string of game, partridges and wild ducks slung over his shoulder, so there were many ministers who came back from the ecclesiastical courts with long strings of doctors of divinity whom they had shot with their own rifle. The division became wider, the animosity greater, until after a while some good men resolved upon another tack. They began to explain away the difficulties; they began to forgive each other's fault, and, lo! the great Church quarrel was settled, and the new school Presbyterian Church and the old school Presbyterian Church became one. The different parts of the Presbyterian order, welded by a hammer, a little hammer, a Christian hammer that the Scripture calls "a soft tongue."

You have a dispute with your neighbor. You say to him "I despise you." He replies: "I can't bear the sight of you." You say to him: "Never enter my house again." He says: "If you come on my door sill, I'll kick you off." You say to him: "I'll put you down." He says to you: "You are mistaken; I'll put you down." And so the contest rages; and year after year you act the unchristian part, and he acts the unchristian part.

"GIVE ME YOUR HAND."

After a while the better spirit seizes you, and one day you go over to the neighbour, and say: "Give me your hand. We have fought long enough. Time is so short, and eternity is so near, that we cannot afford any longer to quarrel. I feel you have wronged me very much; but let us settle all now in one great handshaking, and be good friends." You have risen to a higher platform than that on which before you stood. You win his admiration, and you get his apology. But if you have not conquered him in that way, at any rate you have won the applause of your own conscience, the high estimation of good men, and the honour of your Lord who died for His armed enemies.

"But," you say, "what are we to do when slanders assault us, and there come acrimonious sayings all around about us, and we are abused and spit upon?" My reply is: Do not go and attempt to chase down the slanders. Lies are prolific, and while you are killing one, fifty are born. All your demonstrations of indignation only exhaust yourself. You might as well, on some summer night when the swarms of insects are coming up from the meadows and disturbing you, and disturbing your family, bring up some great "swamp angel," like that which thundered over Charleston, and try to shoot them down. The game is too small for the gun.

But what, then, are you to do with the abuses that come upon you in life? You are to live them down! I saw a farmer go out to get back a swarm of bees that had wandered off from the hive. As he moved amid them they buzzed around his head, and buzzed around his hands, and buzzed around his feet. If he had killed one of them they would have stung him to death. But he moved in their midst in perfect placidity until he had of wandering bees. And so I have seen men moving amid the annoyances, and the vexations, and the assaults, of life in such calm, Christian deliberation, that all the buzzing around about their soul amounted to nothing. They conquered them, and above all, they conquered themselves. "O," you say, "that's a very good theory to preach on a hot day, but it won't work." It will work. It has worked. I believe it is the last Christian grace we win. You know there are fruits which we gather in June, and others in July, and others in August, and others in September, and still others in October; and I have to admit that this grace of Christian forgiveness is about the last fruit of the Christian soul.

We hear a great deal about the bitter tongue, and the sarcastic tongue, and the quick tongue, and the singing tongue; but we know very little about "the soft tongue that breaketh the bone." We read Hudibras, and Sterne, and Dean Swift, and the other apostles of acrimony, but give little time to studying the example of Him who was reviled, and yet reviled not again. O that the Lord, by His spirit, would endow us all with "the soft tongue that breaketh the bone."

I pass now to the other thought that I desire to present, and that is, kindness as a means of usefulness. In all communities you find sceptical men. Through early education, or through the maltreatment of professed Christian people or through prying curiosity about the future world, there are a great many people who come sceptical in religious things. How do you capture them for God? Sharp argument and sarcastic retort never won a single convert from scepticism to the Christian religion. Wonderful books on the "Evidences of Christianity" have their mission in confirming Christian people in the faith they have already adopted. I have noticed that when sceptical people brought into the kingdom of Christ, through the charm of some genial soul, not by argument at all.

Men are not saved through the head; they are saved through the heart.

A Storm Comes

out of its hiding place. It says: "Now we just rouse up all this sea;" and it makes great bluster; but it does not succeed. Half of the sea is roused up, — perhaps half of it, or one-fourth of it. After while the calm moon, placid and beautiful, looks down, and the ocean begins to subside. It comes up to high-water mark. It embraces the great headlands. It submerges the beach of all the continents. It is the heart-throb of one world against the heart-throb of another world. And I have to tell you that while your storms of ridicule and storms of sarcasm may rouse up the passion of an immortal creature, nothing less than the attractive power of Christian kindness can ever raise the death spirit to happiness and to God. I have no faith in the prayer of a child five years in the way of bringing an infidel back to Christ and to heaven, than I have in all hissing thunderbolts of ecclesiastical controversy.

You cannot overcome men with religious argument.

"HE CAPTURED THE SWARM."

If you come to a sceptical man with an argument on behalf of Christian religion, you put the matter on his mettle. He says: "I see you have a card. I'll use my card. I'll answer his argument with argument." But you come to a man, persuade him that you share his happiness on earth, and his welfare in the world to come, he cannot answer. What I have said, is just as true in reclamation of the openly vicious. Did you ever know a drunkard to be saved through a caricature of a drunkard? Your mimicry, the staggering step, and the thick tongue, and the disgusting hiccup, only worse madden his brain. But if you come to him in kindness and sympathy; if you show him that you appreciate the awful grip of a depraved appetite; if you persuade him of the fact that thousands who had the grappling hooks of evil inclination, clutched in their soul as firmly as in his, have been delivered, then a ray of light will flash across his vision, and it will seem as if a supernatural hand were steadying his staggering gait.

A good many years ago there lay in the streets a man dead drunk, his face exposed to the blistering noonday sun. A Christian woman passed along, looked at him, and said: "Poor fellow." She took her handkerchief and spread it over his face, and passed on. The man reached himself up from his debauch, and begged to look at the handkerchief, and, lo! on it was the name of a highly respectable Christian woman of the city. He went to her, he thanked her for her kindness; and that one little deed saved him for this life, and saved him for the life that is to come. He was afterward Attorney eneral of the United States; but, higher than I, he became the consecrated disciple of Jesus Christ.

Kind words are so cheap, it is a wonder we do not use them oftener. There are tens of thousands of people who are dying for the lack of one kind word. There is a business man who has fought against trouble until he is perfectly exhausted. He has been thinking about robbery, about suicide. Go to at business man. Tell him that better times are coming, and tell him that you yourself were a tight business pass, and

The Lord Delivered You.

Tell him to put his trust in God. Tell him that Jesus Christ stands beside every business man in his perplexities. Tell him of the sweet promises of God's comforting grace. That man dying for the lack of just one kind word. Go tomorrow and utter that one saving, omnipotent, kind word. Here is a soul that has been ramped in sin. He wants to find the light of the Gospel. He feels like a shipwrecked mariner looking out over the beach, watching for a light against the sky. O, bear down on him. Tell him that the Lord waits to be gracious to him, and though he has been a great sinner, there is a great Saviour provided. Tell him that though his sins are as scarlet, they shall be as white as wool. That man is dying for ever for the lack of one kind word.

An Old Song.

There used to be sung at a great many of the banquets all through the country a song that has almost died out. I wish somebody would start again in our social circles. There may not have been very exquisite art in the music, but there was a grand and glorious sentiment:

"Kind words never die, never die; Cherished and blessed."

O, that we might in our families and in our churches try the force of kindness. You can never drive men, women, or children into the kingdom of God. A March north-easter will bring out more honeysuckles than fretfulness and scolding will bring out Christian grace. I wish that in all our religious work we might be saturated with the spirit of kindness. Missing that, we miss a great deal of usefulness. There is no need of coming before men and thundering the law unless you preach to them the Gospel. Do you not know that this simple story of a Saviour's kindness is to redeem all nations? The hard heart of this world's obduracy is to be broken before the story. There is in Antwerp, Belgium, one of the most remarkable pictures I ever saw. It is "The Descent of Christ from the Cross." It is one of Rubens' pictures. No man can stand and look at that "Descent from the Cross," as Rubens pictured it, without having his eyes flooded with tears, if he have any sensibility at all. It is

An Overmastering Picture

One that staggers you, and haunts your dreams. One afternoon, a man stood in that cathedral looking at Rubens' "Descent from the Cross." He was all absorbed in that scene of a Saviour's sufferings when the janitor came in and said: "It is time to close up the cathedral for the night. I wish you would depart." The pilgrim looking at that "Descent from the Cross," turned around to the janitor and said: "No, no; not yet. Wait until they get Him down."

O, it is the story of a Saviour's suffering kindness that is to capture the world. When the ones of that great Behemoth of iniquity which has trampled all nations shall be broken and shattered, it will be found out that the work was not done by the hammer of the iconoclast, or by the sword of the conqueror, or by the torch of persecution, but by the plain, simple, overwhelming force of "the soft tongue that breaketh the bone."

And now I ask the blessing of God to come down upon you in matters of health, in matters of business; that the Lord will deliver you from all your financial perplexities; that He will give you a good livelihood, large salaries, healthful wages, sufficient income. I pray God that He may give you the opportunity of educating your children for this world, and, through the grace of Christ, of seeing them prepared for the world to come. Above all, I look for the mercy of God upon your immortal souls; and lest I stand before some who have not yet attended to the things of their eternal interest, in this, the closing part of my discourse, I implore them here and now to seek after God and be at peace with Him. O, we want to be gathered together at last in the bright and blessed assemblage of the skies, our work all done, our sorrows all ended. God bless you, and your children, and your children's children. And now I commend you to God and to the word of His Grace which is able to build you up, and give you an inheritance among all them that are sanctified.

HOME AT THE END.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for September 7, 1890. "For the Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost." Luke 19: 10.

THERE was to be a wedding in the humble home of the McDermott's at Springdale. Pretty Lillie, the widow's fair-haired, sunny-faced daughter, had made Ned Homans happy by her whispered "Yes," and everything was to be arranged for the coming event which would take place in a week. Ned had furnished a cottage not far away from the McDermott home, and the young couple would begin house-keeping at once.

"It will be so nice," said Lillie, "to be near mother. Poor mother. She will be all alone in the world, now that I'm going. Ah, if only Jess had been with us!"

"If only!" How many sad "if only's" there are in the world, to weigh down people's hearts!

Years ago there was no happier man in Springdale than Tom McDermott. He was a good, kind husband, rather easy in his ways, but well-disposed. Jess, the elder girl, was dark and proud-spirited, the prettiest in all the village, but the most wilful. Smart at everything she undertook, she contrived to acquire many of those little accomplishments that some men, who do not look beneath the surface for character, admire more than anything else in a young woman. She sang nicely and was fond of gay company and a "good time;" yet she held aloof from the village girls. Though her pride offended the neighbors, she was universally liked for her pretty face, and her father, though he often thought of it, made no effort to check her vanity.

Great was the surprise in Springdale when, after an unusually gay summer, during which she had pained her parents repeatedly by her frivolities, Jess mysteriously disappeared. Wise neighbors wagged their heads and declared that they knew no good could come out of "such goings."

The mother was distracted. Poor Phil McDermott, realizing too late, the fatal mistake he had made in his child's training, searched far and near for a clue to the missing Jess. Once only he found a trace of the wanderer, when he learned that, deserted by the smooth spoken villain who had lured her to ruin, she had gone to the big city to live. There the police told him they might possibly find her, but they gave him little hope.

"The cities are full of just such unfortunates," said the sympathising sergeant at headquarters. "They assume other names and hide themselves and their shame in places where it is exceedingly difficult to find them."

A lost child! Living but lost! No deeper, keener sorrow enters a father's heart than when he discovers that his erring yet loved one is lost to him, perhaps forever. Death with innocence is a thousand times preferable to life with shame and guilt.

Two years had passed since this sad event brought gloom to the household. The village had already begun to forget Jess, but all through the years the parent-love had been strong and hopeful. Then Phil McDermott died—his last breath a prayer for his wayward child; and the widow and Lillie fought the battle of life alone. But Mrs. McDermott and her daughter had learned to lay their burdens at the foot of the Cross.

It was a month after the wedding. The widow was very lonely, but patient in her solitary home. Lillie and Ned had fairly settled down in their snug little cottage nest, and they now varied the pleasures of housekeeping by an occasional visit to the old home.

One day, to their surprise, they found Mrs. McDermott packing up as if for a journey. She was bound for the city and she left hurriedly, with hardly a word of explanation, greatly to Lillie's astonishment. And, indeed, the widow could hardly have told any one why she went. Lately her anxiety over the long-missing daughter had unaccountably increased. Never had she omitted her in her prayers; and morning and evening Jess had been in her thoughts.

"Oh, if I could only hear one word from her, to know that it was well with her soul, I could be happy!" she sighed.

Something told her she would hear about Jess in the city. On arriving there, she at once sought out a good clergyman, whom she and her husband had known in other years, and asked his advice.

"Something tells me that Jess needs me," was all she had to say, when he inquired why she had come.

The Rev. Mr. Wendall knew that the workings of God in the human heart are beyond finding out, and he resolved to help Mrs. McDermott. Together they visited several of the institutions where the wandering and homeless find refuge and at last, in an hospital, they learned from one of the officials that a girl, who answered the mother's description of her missing daughter, had been admitted weak and seemingly dying. The widow's heart gave a great leap, when she heard this. She felt that God had brought her there.

A moment later, they were ushered into one of the wards, in which lay a thin and wasted form upon a cot. A nurse stood near, and as the mother approached, the form on the cot turned a wan face toward her. Mrs. McDermott sprang forward, and strained the sick woman to her breast, for she had recognized her long-lost child.

"Jess! My Jess!" she murmured.

The girl's tears fell fast, as her head weakly rested upon that bosom where, when a child, it had often lain. It was a touching scene.

Jess had a sad story to tell, when the first transport of meeting was over. Her cup had been full of bitterness, and she had fallen so low that even friends she had made when she first came to the city, had refused to associate with her. She had hardened her heart against God, and sunk to the lowest depth of depravity, when a hand was stretched out to save her. Walking along the street one day with some boon companions, who with loud talk mingled with oaths, were creating a noisy scene, some one—a stranger—approached, and laid his hand upon the girl's arm. She wheeled about and faced the gentleman, who said:

"My daughter; have you forgotten that you are in the presence of God?"

Long after he had gone, the words rang in her ears and repeated themselves in her heart. "In the presence of God!" And such a life as she had been leading! How would she answer for those misspent days and nights, for the vices she had practised and encouraged, and for the others she had taught to walk in the way that leadeth to destruction?

After that, she went out with her evil companions no more, but rather shunned them. She was under powerful conviction of sin, but her view of the future was hopeless. She was lost, irredeemably lost; her life wasted, her opportunities squandered, and her soul mortgaged to perdition. Surely there was no salvation for so fallen a creature as she.

Finally she became very ill. Long privation and exposure, the result of her irregular life, had done their work and the once blooming girl was marked for a consumptive's fate. Growing weaker and weaker, she became unable to obtain even shelter and food, and was sent by some friends to the hospital. They were probably glad to be rid of her. And now she lay dying, and presently would fill a pauper's coffin.

The arrival of Mrs. McDermott brought a gleam of sunshine into the waning life. It brought more, for the godly widow strove with the now penitent child, and brought her to the Saviour's feet. With the kindness that only a mother knows, she prayed with her and for her, until the peace of pardon and acceptance filled her heart and shone in her eyes. The vital powers were too much exhausted, however, and with the coming of the snow, Jess McDermott left the world of sin for a brighter sphere.

It is summer again, and little ones are playing around the widow McDermott's cottage at Springdale, and calling her "grandma." They are Lillie's children, and as the old woman looks at them lovingly, her eyes fill with tears and her heart wanders off to a nook in the village churchyard where, on a white slab of marble is the simple inscription: "The Son of Man came into the World to seek and to save that which was lost."

TWO GREAT MISSION FIELDS.

Notes of Gospel Progress in East Africa and Madagascar.

How the European Agreement may Affect Future Mission Operations—Mrs. Shaw's Sewing-Class at Rabai—Too Many Pupils All at Once—The French Protectorate of Madagascar and the Missions—Malagasy Martyrs—Blood-thirsty Queen Ranavalona and Her Humane Successors.

THE friends of mission work in this country and Christians all over the world, are watching with deep and prayerful interest the progress of events in East Africa and Madagascar. These two great mission fields are specially affected by the recent agreement entered into by England, Germany, and France, under which the first-named power is confirmed in the Protectorate of Zanzibar, and the last in the Protectorate of Madagascar. The new apportionment, as far as East Africa is concerned, is regarded as a hopeful omen by the missionary societies particularly in this country and England, as it will probably be the means of opening up new and still vaster fields of Gospel labor in the immediate future.

For years past, a centre of missionary activity has been the Galla Country, in Eastern Africa. This is on the borders of Masailand, a country inhabited by the cruelest and craftiest of all the African tribes, and whose warriors have killed many a Christian, and entrapped and speared the whites at every opportunity. It was from Frere Town, on the East Coast, that the eminent pioneer, Bishop Hannington, set out through the savage northern country on his last earthly journey, four years ago. His object was the opening up of Masailand to Gospel influences, and when he left the village of Rabai, fifteen miles distant, on July 23d, 1886 with two hundred porters and several white companions, the entire party were filled with the highest hopes. With what splendid Christian fortitude they met their fate as martyrs, at Mwanga's hands has already been told in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

One of the pictures on the first page of this issue presents an interesting scene of Christianized native life at Rabai, where a colony for freed slaves has been established by the Church Missionary Society. In the colony there are now over eight hundred men, women and children being cared for and instructed by the agents of the Society. The nearest town is Mombasa, on an island of the same name. It has a population of about 25,000 and was at one time under Portuguese control, but the only evidence of this fact is the ruin of an old fort, built during the period of Portuguese dominion, when slave-dealing was at its height, for this whole region was one greatly favored by the man-stealers. The native name of Rabai is Kisulutini, a day's march off is an old Mosai battle-field, strewn with skulls. There is a Protestant Episcopal Mission station at the village.

Sewing Class at Work.

The girls are the children of Frere Town villagers. It was formerly the custom at Rabai for the women to do all the hard work, while the men "tended house" or did pretty much as they pleased. The only exceptions to this inactivity were when the men of Rabai went on a marauding expedition or sallied out to fight their neighbors. Mrs. Shaw, after being a short time in Rabai, set about to remedy this state of affairs. She announced in the village that she would teach the women and girls how to sew. They had already begun to love the gentle missionary and her husband, the Rev. A. D. Shaw, who had brought them to a knowledge of the Gospel; and when told that the lady was to show them the use of the needle, they were wild with unfeigned excitement. They fairly ran over each other in their haste to be present in time on the appointed day when the class was to begin. It seemed to Mrs. Shaw that the whole settlement must have accepted her invitation. At all events they came in such force as to be unmanageable, and she was compelled to send many home and organize small classes, giving two afternoons a week to the bigger girls and women, and taking the juveniles at other times. In this way she taught all how to employ their time skillfully, and the result was a diffusion of patchwork quilts, sewed bags, coats for husbands and brothers, and various other garments and articles never before known or heard of in that part of benighted Africa. Thus as a civilizer, a brightener of homes, and a means of gaining for the women the respect of those who till then had driven them around as so many beasts of burden.

Mrs. Shaw, who was a niece of the late Frances Ridley Havergal, died last April at Mauritius, an island that lies to the east of Madagascar. She used to tell some interesting anecdotes of her early experiences at Rabai. At first the big girls would romp into the sewing class in such number as to cause confusion. On several occasions two hundred of them came at once. Then, when she kindly hinted that they were too numerous, their savage idea of courtesy was offended and they stayed away altogether. The work of organization occupied months, but her efforts were repaid with tenfold interest when she found her classes quiet and orderly, busily plying their needles, while some one read from the Scriptures the story of Jesus' love.

The Gospel in Madagascar.

The news that "The Great African Island," as some tribes call Madagascar, will shortly be placed under a French Protectorate, is ominously regarded by all who have the welfare of Christian Missions at heart. Madagascar is yet only partially civilized, and there is a great field for missionary work still open there. The gold discoveries have helped to increase the white population, but the Hovas, a light complexioned, very intelligent race, who control four-fifths of the island, and are yet far short of being even moderately civilized, in spite of mingling with white people, bitterly resent foreign influence. The Hova customs are a mixture of ancient barbarism, and ideas borrowed from the whites.

It is fully three-quarters of a century since the Gospel was carried to Madagascar by the missionaries of the London Society. They found in King Radama, a monarch who would willingly aid them in return for the advantages he shrewdly foresaw. Good progress was made until the death of Radama in 1828, when Ranavalona, one of his twelve wives, grasped the crown, and began a persecution of the Christian population.

From 1835 to 1845 was a period of severe trial for the Christians of Madagascar. The wicked Queen, after many professions of friendship, adopted bigoted measures to suppress the new religion. She confiscated all books, especially the Scriptures, and the result was that the Malagasy converts were compelled to hide their Bibles and read them secretly. Missionaries were prevented from preaching and many left the field. Finally, in 1836, all Christian worship was prohibited. Then the converts, who included many persons of high rank, were driven to hide in caves and mountains, where they were hunted out and cruelly slain by the soldiers of the heathen Queen.

Hundreds were Massacred,

among the martyrs being young native Christian women who submitted to death with the greatest fortitude. Some were speared; others were thrown from high precipices to be dashed to death upon jagged rocks below; still others were beheaded, while many were stoned to death. There were pits filled with victims who were killed by pouring scalding water upon them. Many were hacked to pieces, and a number were poisoned. It was a fight to utterly exterminate Christianity on the island, and neither young or old was spared. Hunted down and killed like wolves in their hiding-places in the forests, the mountains, the jungle, and the drybeds of rivers, the converts still clung bravely to their faith despite the bitter persecution. Their meeting-places were on the almost inaccessible peaks of lonely mountains, or in sentinel-guarded caves.

At last, to the great surprise of the Queen her only son Rakatond, became Christian, and declared openly for the cause of the Galilean. Maternal love overcame bigotry, and the Queen's bloody hand was stayed. In 1851, there was a great rejoicing in Madagascar, when from caves and rocks, mountains and glens came forth 5000 native Christians back to their homes and children. The missionaries, too, returned and since that happy year, (1851,) Christianity has steadily progressed among the Malagasy. Truly the "blood of the martyrs became the seed of the church." The died in 1860, and with the ascension of her Christian son to the throne, as Radama II complete religious liberty was proclaimed, many barbarous rites and customs were abolished and the Christians were restored to power and favor.

The heathen priesthood made a final effort to regain their lost supremacy two years later. They formed a conspiracy, Radama II. was strangled, and Queen Rasoherina became the reigning monarch. She proved a disappointment to the priests, however, for still greater toleration was extended to the Christians. Queen Ranavalona II., the sister and successor of Rasoherina, openly proclaimed the government of Madagascar to be Christian; destroyed the national idols and with her Premier, Rainilaiarivony, was baptised in public.

The present Queen Ranavalona III., whose portrait is given on the first page, was crowned in 1883, and is a niece of the preceding sovereign. She is a woman of most pleasing manners, and very dignified, a true Christian, and the warm friend and patron of the missionaries. She is married to Andrianaly, a young Malagasy nobleman, who was educated in Great Britain. It is understood that the Queen is opposed to French influence on the island and that the Hovas are in full sympathy with her. The late war between the French and the Hovas showed the latter to be a brave and spirited people, capable of maintaining their independence, and it is just within the range of possibilities that the French protectorate now proposed may be the cause of further serious trouble in the near future. The picture of a Malagasy warrior on the first page, furnishes an idea of the appearance of a Hova soldier equipped for fight.

Much of the good work done in Madagascar under missionary influences may be sacrificed, should a French protectorate attempt to enforce Catholicism upon the Hovas, who love their missionaries and their Malagasy Bible, and are ready if need be as did their fathers before them. The Hovas never considered themselves bound by the French treaty with the Sakalavas, an inferior tribe, and during the war of 1883, which sprang out of the unjustifiable attempt of the French to secure control on the island, and during which Mr. Shaw, one of the English missionaries was seized and imprisoned for exercising "undue political influence" on the Queen, Christian work in Madagascar was brought to a standstill. Should another period of trial be in store for the Malagasy Christians, God's grace will undoubtedly strengthen them to bear it, and He will bring them out of all their troubles triumphantly as He has done in the past.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Congregation was Unavoidably Detained in a church in Iowa, after the conclusion of a service, on a recent Sunday. A press dispatch from Fort Dodge, Ia., describing the opening services of a new Congregational Church in that vicinity, states that, at the conclusion of a lengthy discourse, the preacher dismissed the congregation, but a large number of the men remained in their seats, while the rising of the ladies was attended by a sound of rending and tearing of garments, and the utterance of exclamations unseemly in a place of worship. The cause was soon discovered. The day was exceptionally hot, and the painters, who had been employed in finishing the church, had used a varnish which had not had time to properly dry. It was a peculiarly adhesive kind of varnish, which held like glue. The dispatch states that those persons who were reckless of their garments got away promptly, leaving portions of them adhering to the seats, but it took more than half an hour to liberate those who wanted to keep their clothes intact. This was a very unusual, if not an unprecedented, reason for people remaining in church, when the time came for them to go home. Instances, however, have often occurred of professing Christians being held in church by their own inertia or constitutional laziness, enjoying the services, and getting good to their own souls, when they ought to have been at work for Christ in the world, imparting good to others. (Heb. 5:12).

A Birthmark Promises to Substantiate a birthright and insure a fortune to a woman in Pennsylvania. On August 5th an aged lady died at Sharpsburg, Pa., leaving a fortune of over $50,000 inherited from her deceased husband. It appears that in their younger days a daughter had been born to them, but, as they were poor, they had sent her out West to some friends there and had somehow lost sight of her. When they became prosperous, inquiries were set on foot for the missing daughter, but she could not be found. They heard that she was dead, but neither father nor mother would credit the report. They advertised for her, and at different times no less than four women answered, claiming to be their long sought child. The mother after an interview with them, promptly rejected each one, but she did not disclose her secret test by which she was convinced that they were impostors. A few years ago the father died, leaving his property to his widow, and after her to their child, who, he believed, would eventually appear. The widow continued the search and at length a woman came who was examined as the former claimants had been, and this time the mother pronounced her her daughter. She had found a birthmark on her person by which she knew her. That was the evidence she had vainly sought on the others. They had furnished other proofs of their identity, but they were only such as a clever impostor might manufacture, but as they had not the birthmark they were rejected. We are told that some will, at the last day, similarly claim to be God's children on the ground of a former knowledge of Christ (Luke 13:26), but they will be dismissed with the words, "I never knew you." None will be received but they who have the sign of God, "which no man knoweth save he that receiveth it." (Rev. 2:17).

An Autograph that Proved Permanent was found at Middletown, N. Y., on August 20. It appears that a farmer decided to remove an old beech tree which grew on his farm. The wood-cutter noticed on the bark of the tree some curious marks looking like the letters J. L., roughly cut, and below them some ornamental design. After the tree had been cut down and was being separated into lengths he was startled to find on the hard dry wood at the core of the tree, directly opposite the place on the bark where he had noticed the marks, the clearly cut letters J. L., on a dark background, and below them an anchor. On inquiries being made, it was found that the letters were the initials of a sailor named John Leland, who, in an idle hour had cut them on the beech tree when it was young. There were thirty-seven rings between the letters and the bark of the tree, and the woodsman said that each ring represented one year's growth of the tree. He inferred that the letters must have been cut in the year 1853 and his belief was confirmed when he learned that it was in that year that the sailor had spent some time in that neighborhood. Thus the inscription had not only remained in the place where it was cut at the first, but as each year added to the growth of the tree, the letters still appeared on the surface, scarcely legible there, it is true, but perfectly clear at the core. It is so with human character. Many an old man, in spite of the rough usage of the world and the scars of time and trouble, bears upon his walk and conversation the marks of the handwriting which in his youth God put in his heart. (Heb. 10:16.)

Three Houses Given Away by their Owner, are the subject of litigation in a New York Court. A Harlem police justice was requested last week, by a lady, to protect her personal property, pending a suit about some real estate. She said that three years ago she was very sick, and believed she was going to die. She owned the house in which she lived and two others. Her brother was very anxious to have possession of the three houses before she died, and urged her to give them to him. Feeling convinced that she could not recover, she yielded. A lawyer was summoned, who drew up a deed of gift, which she signed. But she did not die. In fact, from that time she recovered, and gradually regained her health. She asked her brother then to restore the houses, and, if not to cancel the deed of gift, to let it be in abeyance during her life. She thought he would have consented if he had been left to himself, but his wife was opposed to it and, under her influence, he insisted on his rights of ownership. Her position is now still worse, for her brother died recently, leaving the property to his wife, who not only took possession of the two houses but asserted her claim on the other, by a notice to quit on her sister-in-law, the original owner. That lady resisted and has appealed to the courts to have the deed of gift set aside, and to protect her personal property from seizure for rent. She now bitterly regrets, and with good reason, being so precipitate as to give away under fear of death the property she needs for her support. She is not the only person who has found it inconvenient on recovering from sickness, to keep the promises made when death seemed to be at hand. Unhappily the promises most frequently made on a bed of sickness, and those which ought to be kept, are those which are most frequently broken—the vows of repentance and consecration. (Ps. 66:13, 15.)

An Elephant at Large in the Streets of Pittsburg, Pa., caused some alarm on August 20th. A resident of that city hearing a noise in his garden that night, went out to ascertain the cause, and was appalled by seeing a huge elephant there from a circus exhibition in the neighborhood. The elephant charged at the man as soon as it saw him, and he escaped only by a prompt leap over the fence. He ran to the police station, and two policemen returned with him to drive the elephant out of the garden. The big creature was gone when they arrived, but it had strolled through the streets toward the centre of the town, the people fleeing before it in terror. The policemen followed, and tried to drive it back toward the circus by throwing cobble-stones at it. This only enraged the beast, and it turned furiously on its assailants who ran to the nearest houses to escape. In the meantime a messenger had been sent to the circus for the elephant's keeper but he was absent. Several men came from the circus to endeavor to capture the creature, but they were as powerless as the policemen. Finally the elephant went of its own accord into an empty stable, and the door was shut upon it. After waiting about an hour, during which it had broken everything within reach, and had begun trumpeting loudly, the keeper was found and came upon the scene. He spoke kindly to the elephant, and had no difficulty in leading it docilely back to the circus tent. The policemen's mistake is one that is often made by people who are brought in contact with great sinners. Throwing stones aggravates the evil, and leads to more mischief. Words of kindness are the weapons that most frequently subdue the sinner, and lead him to Christ. (Prov. 25:11.)

The Story of a Wronged Woman's Devotion to the man who had injured her is related by the New York Herald. It states that a man was recently arrested at Middletown, for bigamy. The first wife proved his marriage to her, and it was only necessary for the second wife to prove her marriage to insure his conviction. She loved him so well, however, that to screen him, she sacrificed her reputation by pretending that she had lived with him without marriage. Her motive, however, was apparent, and the man was convicted. She was still bent on saving him, and while he was in prison she visited him. On one of her visits she wore a thick veil over her face, and a large loose gossamer waterproof over her dress. Three friends accompanied her, and after staying with the prisoner as long as the rules allowed, the party of four left the jail. When, however, the warden went to the prisoner's cell, he found the woman there; the prisoner had gone out dressed in his wife's gossamer and bonnet, and her thick veil drawn over his face. Search was made for the escaped prisoner and he was captured and brought back, and the woman has also been held on the charge of aiding a prisoner to escape. She must have been aware that the success of her plot would involve suffering to herself; but her love was of that rare kind that forgets self in devotion to another, even though that other is unworthy of it. It is strange that while men are moved to admiration by the act of such a woman, they listen unmoved to the story of infinitely more wonderful love which impelled Christ to take the place of sinful humanity, and lay down His life to save a lost world. (Rom. 5:7, 8.)

JESUS AND ZACCHEUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 7; Luke 19: 1-10; Golden Text, Luke 19: 10.

Jesus the Light of the World—Bartimeus a Type of the Spiritually Blind—Seizing his Opportunity of Christ's Presence—The Lord's Gracious Answer—Another Seeker—The Wealth of Zaccheus an Indication of Character—Christ's Call to Him—What Entertaining Jesus Involves—Salvation Come to the House.

JESUS and His followers were "come nigh unto Jericho." There sat by the wayside a certain blind man begging. St. Mark tells us it was Bartimeus, the son of Timeus. (Mark 10: 46.) He was a well-known character; no one ever dreamt of reproaching him for begging—he could do nothing else. Institutions for the blind are of recent date—there were none in the time of our Lord—and thus the blind, if they happened to be poor, must beg their bread or die. But Jesus the Saviour is God's institution for the blind, both in body and in soul; He is the "Light of the world" for the physically and the spiritually blind.

It is more than probable that Bartimeus had heard of Jesus. Some blind man whose eyes had been opened by Jesus may have told him the good news that a prophet had arisen who could and did give sight and hearing, health and cure, for he himself had been healed. Many a long day did the blind man long for the coming of such an one, and probably a crowd never approached him that some glimmer of hope did not arise within his heart that perhaps Jesus was among them. He heard the multitudes pass by. He knew the sound of the people on market-day; he knew the marriage processions; the tramp of the military and other sounds were familiar to him; but this crowd was unlike them. What was it? He asked the question and the long-desired answer was given, "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by." Without losing a moment, he cried out, not knowing to which part of the crowd to direct his voice, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!" It was his first, it might be

Is there a sinner reading these words who knows that all is not well with his soul, one who has always prayed to God at a distance, and with uncertainty in his prayers? Why not now pray to a Jesus who is passing by, who is within call, the very object of whose intercession in heaven now, as well as that of His life and death on earth, is to seek and to save that which is lost! Bartimeus wanted sight above all other things, and he put all his intense desire and his newly awakened hope into his cry, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me." The multitude were indignant. Why should this useless, blind beggar disturb everybody? Such impertinence was not to be tolerated, and they rebuked him, perhaps in no gentle terms, bidding him hold his peace. Not he; too much was hanging on the issue. He had no sight to guide him. He did not know if he was heard. With renewed energy and desperate earnestness he cried yet more, "Thou Son of David have mercy on me." And Jesus stood, and "commanded him to be brought." "And when he was come near, He asked him, what wilt thou that I shall do unto thee?"

Bartimeus replied without a moment's hesitation, "Lord, that I may receive my sight." And as immediately, Jesus said unto him, "Receive thy sight: thy faith hath saved thee." And immediately he received his sight, and followed Him, glorifying God, and all the people, when they saw it, gave praise unto God. How many there are to whom Jesus says, "Receive," who, instead of taking at His hand the gifts He gives, go on pleading, urging, beseeching. Receive the pardon of thy sins, Jesus has purchased it. Receive the Holy Ghost, Jesus has bestowed Him. Receive the healing of thy body, Jesus has taken thine infirmities, and borne thy sicknesses. Not while he was pleading, but at the moment he received, were the blind man's eyes opened, and he made use of them to follow Jesus.

As the crowd passed through Jericho, a man very unlike Bartimeus—a man who had done much more in sharp dealing than in begging—conceived a great desire to see Jesus. His name was Zaccheus.

He was chief among the publicans, and rich. This was no great credit to him. The business in which he was engaged afforded him a comfortable competency, but to get rich on the commission obtained upon the taxes, he must have carried on his calling in a somewhat questionable way. It was a calling loathed and despised by the Jews in general, who ranked publicans with sinners.

Zaccheus had heard of Jesus—probably the blind man who had just been healed was giving his testimony to the wondrous power of the great Healer, and the multitudes who hung upon His words showed what power there was in His preaching: Zaccheus wanted to see this Man. Being very short of stature, he could not accomplish his purpose by joining in the crowd. So, running on before, he climbed a sycamore tree, thinking to look down from his perch, and get a good view of Jesus from between the foliage. He thought to see Jesus, but perhaps it never struck him that Jesus might want to have something to do with him! O that every one would think, "What does God want of me? What is He willing to do for me? What is He able to do for me just now?"

To his great surprise, Jesus looked up, and called him by name. A seeking Saviour cannot be indifferent to the whereabouts of the sheep He seeks. He may have thought he was hidden, but Jesus saw him; he may have thought himself unknown, but Jesus knew him. "Zaccheus, make haste, and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house." This was bringing things to an unexpected crisis. To have Jesus in his house was equivalent to losing caste among some of his rich friends; to have Jesus in his house meant a thorough reformation. "Behold, I make all things new." (Rev. 21: 5.) He must make his choice, make it publicly, and make it at once. He must begin by humbling himself. It might expose him to no small share of ridicule to have to come down out of the tree, and when it was known that he had done it in order to entertain the despised Jesus, he would have to take his stand altogether on the side of the Nazarene!

But he Did it.

He "came down, and received Him joyfully." The decision once made, his heart was glad. Reader, would you like to have Jesus abide at your house? If He comes, there will be the most thorough house-cleaning you ever witnessed. Where He abides, there laziness and selfishness, worldliness and lightness must go out. The unkind word, the angry look, the giddy conversation, all which is not true and transparent, all which is "of the earth earthy," must go out if Jesus comes in.

Then again, doubts and despondency, anxiety and care flee before His presence. He must have the house for His house, we are but stewards and housekeepers; every room must be His, kept for Him, used for Him, furnished to meet His tastes. But, once the decision made, our hearts are full of joy. Zaccheus "received Him joyfully." Nothing makes a house so sunny as to have the Sun within, the very Sun of righteousness. It is the want of Jesus which makes sadness and gloom.

But while there is joy within, there may be plenty of persecution without. "When they saw it, they all murmured, saying, That He was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner." O thank God, "this man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." (Luke 15: 2;) thank God, He is "a Friend of publicans and sinners." (Matt. 11: 19.)

Zaccheus knew that a mighty change had taken place within him, and he was not afraid to own it before them all. "Zaccheus stood and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." What is this? The man who, up to this time, had lived to accumulate money, now giving the half of that property he doted on to the poor! that man who had probably been "willingly ignorant" of the holy integrity of the law of God now voluntarily submitting to it, even to the restoring fourfold anything which he had unjustly taken. (Ex. 22: 1.) How came this about? "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new; and all things are of God." (11. Cor. 5: 17, 18.) He was renewed in the spirit of his mind, he was "born again" of the Spirit of God. What once absorbed him—the love of riches and earthly honor—was now nothing to him, and he loved now the will of God at whatever cost to himself. He was a new man, "created in Christ Jesus unto good works" which God had before prepared that he "should walk in them." (Eph. 2: 10.) "And Jesus said unto him is salvation come to this house, inasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham." This day! Yes, it was that day when the change took place. Zaccheus up to that day was a sinner, "dead in trespasses and sins," but that day he "passed from death unto life."

Some men read as though it were a fable that prophecy of the resurrection when Christ shall come for His own people who are ready for Him, "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed; in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." (1. Cor. 15: 51, 52.) But this very thing is prefigured every time a soul is converted. Jesus added, "For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

A WHOLE VILLAGE CONVERTED.

ONE of the most remarkable wholesale conversions recently recorded is mentioned by Miss Jane Core, of No. 48 York Street, Portman Square, London, in a recent article describing an episcopy at Monk Orfano a village on one of the hills overlooking the lovely Lake Maggiore, Italy. She writes:

For the last twenty years the villagers have had no priest, and for eight years the priest of a neighboring village who was appointed to say mass there every Sunday has neglected them. Feeling that they could not live without religion they began to make inquiries, and read the Bibles which they had bought some years before from a zealous colporteur of the British and Foreign Bible Society, who has since been called to his rest.

These mountaineers are a sturdy race of quarrymen and stone cutters, who, having made their determination, are resolved to carry out what they consider to be right. Some of them have been in Swiss Protestant cantons and a few have Bibles. The village mayor and the proprietor of the quarry have from time to time had conversations with the Rev. Alberigo Bossi, pastor at Intra and Pallanza; and the schoolmistress, having attended the night-school at Intra, advised these men to come to Signor Bossi. In consequence of this, an unexpected députation called upon him, asking him to become their pastor, and to take the service at Monte Orfano as frequently as he could.

Accordingly on Sunday, July 13th, after the services and Sunday-school at Intra, Signor Bossi, with family and friends, drove to the foot of Monte Orfano, where they were met by five of the principal men of the place, with the son of the owner of the quarry. They led us up the steep mountain path, and, when nearing the village, guns were fired off to hail our approach. Then the Mayor met us with the village band and conducted us with all due formality to the room where they have been accustomed to receive the priest. Here they offered us refreshment, and then conducted us to the church where the installation took place. A lecture with a Bible upon it was placed within the "altar rails," and the pastor read and preached.

om it. The Mayor was in a place of honor a tie behind the Pastor; and the choir, led by e Pastor's energetic wife, was composed of embers of the congregation at Intra, and the lagers from Quarna, who have suffered much rsecution for Christ's sake; they had walked r seven hours over the mountains in order to ow their sympathy. The old church was owded, and many stood outside, hundreds iving come from neighboring villages to hear e Evangelical service.

Signor Bossi gave an earnest sermon, taking r his text John 9:27, "Will ye also be His sciples?" He told his hearers what disciples Christ should be; and, without entering into ntroversy, explained the Evangelical belief, id closed the services with heartfelt prayer at God would bless and guide these moun- ineers in this decisive step. He asked the ads of families to unite and amongst them ect a Church council.

It is interesting that the church should thus urn to its original use, as it was built for the rly Christians, who fled for refuge to Monte rano in the time of the persecutions of Dio- ctian in the fourth century.

It was touching to hear the fathers say, "We ould not bear to see our little ones growing up ithout religion."

THE GOSPEL IN SIBERIAN PRISONS.

DR. BAEDÉCKER, who is now making an ex- nded tour of the Siberian penal colonies, rites from Krasnojarsk, concerning the on- tion of the great prisons at Tomsk and Tobolsk, id adds: "I am allowed great liberty in speak- g to the prisoners, both in their wards and in e open air, and I find amongst them many ger listeners, and not a few whose expressed sire is to turn to the Lord with all their arts. The New Testaments I gave them are eatly prized, and some men who had received e Book last year showed it to me again with y and gratitude. One man at Tomsk had re- ived last year the four Gospels, he begged ow to have it exchanged for a whole New estament. He had learnt to read more per- ctly since last year, when he could only spell ew words.

"One meets with with many sad and heart- eaking cases of sin and sorrow. The suffer- gs of women and children following their isbands into exile are beyond description.

"My route lines from Krasnojarsk via Kansk id Nijney Tdinsk to Irkutsk and thence to urchney Udinsk, Chita, Nertschinsk, Kara, &c. od willing, as far as Saghalien. 'Hitherto the ord has helped us.' Praise Him! There are en doors in Siberia for speaking the glorious ospel. Pray for us, and pray the Lord of the rvest that He may send labourers into this rvest field. The hour-glass of my time is nning out, and younger men should press rward into the work, while the days are go- g by."

A BUDDHIST GRANDMOTHER.

In a letter to the Church at Home and Abroad, iss Ella McGuire, who is laboring in Japan, escribes the conversion of an aged woman hose very precautions to prevent the spread Christianity resulted, by the blessing of God, her being herself brought to Jesus. It ap- ears that she was anxious to have her little and-daughter taught in the American school id probably thought that she was too young imbibe religious teaching with the secular owledge which she wanted her to obtain. It as necessary, however, that some adult should ccompany the child. A servant was sent at rst, but the old lady, who was a bigoted Bud- hist, seemed to have become fearful that the rvant might receive religious teaching while aiting for the child. So the servant was kept t home and the old lady herself accompanied er grandchild. Miss McGuire says: "The randmother lost no opportunity of showing er hatred for Christianity. She would not peak to the teachers when she came, but went raight to the nurses' room, which opens out from the kindergarten department. After a time it was observed that she sat nearer the door and listened to the Bible as it was taught in the next room. Then, occasionally, she would speak to a teacher as she came in the morning. One Saturday she brought the little girl and came to call. In course of time she brought the child to Sabbath-school, and finally she her- self went into a class for women. She is an in- telligent old lady, and is now one of the happi- est Christians I have ever seen."

THE MILLENNIUM AND AFTER.

By P. W. E.

A Reign of Righteousness Inaugurated—All Men to have Knowledge of the Lord—The Wild Beasts Subdued—Life Lengthened—The Keeping of the Feast—The Thousand Years of Peace—The Short Time of Deception Afterward—The Second Resurrection—The Last Judgment.

AFTER the coming of the Son of Man, and the pouring out of the vials as described in these columns last week, all those prom- ises recorded in Isaiah and elsewhere will be fulfilled. It is to be a reign of righteousness. Peace on earth will be again established. "After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." Believers are said to be "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ."

When Christ Reigns,

therefore, He will not be alone, but in company with His fellow-heirs. This is the feature of the reign brought before us: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years."

The ferocity of the wild beasts will be rest- rained and man's supremacy established. Hence "the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den."

A Time of Fertility.

The sterility of the soil shall be removed. "In- stead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myr- tle-tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." So too, "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose," "Then shall the earth yield her in- crease, and God, even our own God, shall bless us." "This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden." And Amos speaks of the days when "the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt."

Again, longevity will be restored; and death, save as the punishment of sin, seems to be abolished, and the age of man prolonged to the full period of Christ's reign. "I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old."

And the Lord Jesus Christ "shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." "And they shall bring all your brethren—the Jews—for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to Jerusalem, saith the Lord."

"And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which come against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the Lord of hosts, and to keep

The Feast of Tabernacles.

And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain. And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain; there shall be the plague, wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses 'Holiness unto the Lord.' (Zechariah 14:20.)

The reign of righteousness is

and still there will be much feigned obedience. "When the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sands of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." So many being deceived by Satan shows that unless a man is born of God he is not safe.

After this a great white throne appears (Rev. 20:11), and the second resurrection, that of the wicked, takes place, and they stand before God to be judged. "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire. Following this, there are to be "a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea." "We, ac- cording to His promise, look for new heavens, and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

The Impending Events.

Such, as in the previous three articles, we have traced out in the Word of the living God, are the prospects and events of the world. All these changes and dreadful judgments are be- fore the world. Amid all the talk of modern progress and civilization, all the straining after improvements and education, all the efforts to christianize the world, all the boast of a bright future in store for the nations of the earth, have unbelievers grasped the truth that God's judgments are even now hovering over the whole scene? Are they conscious that "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire taking ven- geance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ?" In the intoxication of this world's banquet do they discern the fingers of the hand tracing on the wall the fateful words, "in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh"?

Soon, we know not how soon, the trumpet will sound, the shout will be heard by all true believers, and they shall be caught up together in the air and be "forever with the Lord." The world, bereft of believers, will be nothing save a mere profession, given up to "strong de- lusion, that they should believe a lie;" and to be destroyed "with the brightness of His com- ing." The coming of Christ to the child of God is his present hope. He longs to go and to be with Him who loves him and died for him and has washed him in His own blood. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come." And the Lord says, "Surely, I come quicky." Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

CONSOLATORY.

MANY of the families of the earth sit at this time in dumb amazement at the afflictive providences of God. Why is the husband taken in mid-life before the children are educated and reared? Why does the mother go away into eternity at the time she is most needed here? Why must the young man die at the close of a collegiate course that was intended to fit him for great usefulness? Why not let us all die of old age after our work is fully done and life has no more attractions? A few years ago there were united in the bonds of marriage two of my friends. Amid a great throng of congratulating people they started life. A bright home was set up. God was in the dwelling. Business prospects opened. Friends without number gathered around him in the world and in the church. But on the way home from the store his foot slips, and without consciousness enough to grasp in farewell the hand that he had on the 20th of June taken in pledge, he goes away from the earth for ever. Men of the world, explain that by human philosophy, solve this riddle; analyse, dissect, philosophize, a thousand years, and you cannot by any human device open one shutter. But in the Gospel the sun rises. Light gradually breaks in as the morning looks through the cracks of the door and the lattice—not full days, but a promise of high noon.

Heaven must be populated. There is not so much room on the Western prairies and tablelands for more settlers as there is room in the upper country for more people. Heaven has only one want, and that is of greater population. It is sparsely inhabited yet, as compared with its future citizenship. The crowns are not half taken, nor the robes half worn. Heaven is like a house in which a levee is to be held at ten o'clock. At nine o'clock the rooms are all ablaze with lights, and the servants, gloved and vested, are waiting to open the doors. The rooms of our Father's house are illumined, and the chamberlains are ready, and the table is spread. A few have entered, but heaven is not yet fully begun. They have only sung the opening piece. Now, how shall God fill up His house except by subtracting from this world? The continent of heaven is to be peopled from the surrounding islands.

Why in almost all cases is it the loveliest one of the family that is transported! Heaven wants the best. Why should not the great capital of the universe have the pick of everything? The half-and-half Christians will get into glory, but they need be kept here a good while yet for polishing. Those who are ready God takes. The earlier inhabitants of a place make the greatest impression upon its future character, and so heaven ought to have the best first. Beside that, if there were a shipwreck, and you went out with a life-boat, and you find some of your friends clinging to the hulk, you would be apt to take them ashore first. God seems to set His especial love on some; and when He finds them shivering amid this world's temptations and sorrows, He first lifts them out of the breakers. Oh, weep not for the Christian dead! If they go through long sickness, in which there is opportunity for parting admonition, thank God for that. But if by sudden transition, and they have not a moment of consciousness, thank God that they escape the exhaustion of sickness, and that from the health of earth they stepped into the health of heaven. Long not for the last words that were not spoken. If the life has been right, the death cannot be wrong. If the banquet has been rich, it matters not how the lights are turned out at the close. So many of our friends have gone over the stream, we shall all want to go there too. Heaven is getting to be to some of us a very matter-of-fact heaven. Our friends going in forget to shut the door after them. From the cold snow-bank of the grave, I pluck this crocus: "Those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

THINGS THAT STING.

THE Christian world has long been guessing what Paul's thorn in the flesh was. I have a book that in ten pages tries to show what Paul's thorn was not, and in another ten pages tries to show what it was. Many of the theological doctors have felt Paul's pulse to see what was the matter with him. I suppose that the reason he did not tell us what it was may have been because he did not want us to know. He knew that if he stated what it was, there would have been a great many people from Corinth bothering him with prescriptions as to how he might cure it.

Some say that it was diseased eyes, some that it was a humped back. It may have been the neuralgia; perhaps it was gout, although his active habits and a spare diet throw doubt on the supposition. Suffice it to say, it was a thorn—that is it stuck him. It was sharp.

It was probably of not much account in the eyes of the world. It was not a trouble that could be compared to a lion or a boisterous sea. It was like a thorn that you may have in your hand or foot and no one know it. Thus we see that it becomes a type of those little nettlesome worries of life that exasperate the spirit.

Every one has a thorn sticking in him. The house-keeper finds it in unfaithful domestics; or an inmate who keeps things disordered; or a house too small for convenience or too large to be kept cleanly. The professional man finds it in perpetual interruptions or calls for "more copy." The Sabbath-school teacher finds it in inattentive scholars, or neighboring teachers that talk loud and make a great noise in giving a little instruction. One man has a rheumatoid joint which, when the wind is northeast, lifts the storm signal. Another a business partner who takes full half the profits, but does not he earn them. These trials are all the more nettlesome because, like Paul's thorn, they are not to be mentioned. Men get sympathy for broken bones and mashed feet, but not for the end of sharp thorns that may have been broken off the fingers. Let us start out with the idea that we must have annoyances. It seems to take a certain number of them to keep us humble, wakeful and prayerful. To Paul the thorn was as disciplinary as the shipwreck. If it is not one thing it is another. If the stove does not smoke the boiler must leak. If the pen is good the ink must be poor. If the editorial column be able, there must be a typographic blunder. If the thorn does not pierce the knee, it must take you in the back. Life must have sharp things in it. We cannot make our robe of Christian character without pin and needles. We want what Paul got—grace to bear these things. Without it we become cross, censorious and irascible. We get in the habit of sticking our thorns in other people's fingers. But God helping us, we place these annoyances in the category of the "all things that work together for good." We see how much shorter these thorns are than the spikes that stuck through the palms of Christ's hands; and remembering that He had on his head a whole crown of thorns, we take to ourselves the consolation that if we suffer with Him on earth we shall be glorified with Him in heaven. But how could Paul positively rejoice in these infirmities? I answer that the school of Christ has three classes of scholars. In the first class we learn how to be stuck with thorns without losing our patience. In the second class we learn how to make the sting positively advantageous. In the third class of this school we learn how even to rejoice in being pierced and wounded; but this is the senior class; and when we get to that, we are near graduation into glory.

THE only limitation to the work of the Bible in the inadequate faith and work of the Church and its disciples. It is itself "quick and powerful," and if every Christian was filled with the zeal, constrained by the love, and fortified by the faith of its first missionaries, the world would soon be filled with its life. The cloud of sin would be smitten by the sunlight of truth, and the golden day would break.

LET it be understood once for all that the Protestant pulpit has not any revelation made to the Protestant pew. Ministers of religion have no right to lord it over God's heritage. When we preach we do not utter edicts, but only offer opinions. In this day, when the Bible is in almost every house and in almost every land, let every man understand that he has an equal right with others to interpret the Word of God, asking only divine illumination. As you sometimes gather the family in the evening stand to hear some interesting book, so a congregation is merely a great Christian family gathering around some text, and the light of the same lamp falls upon all faces.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Wilkesbarre was Visited in the Afternoon of the 19th, by a tornado more violent than any that has occurred since the famous Louisville storm, several months ago. There had been rain during the early afternoon and some wind, which ceased about 10 o'clock. Then, with a rush and a roar, the tornado descended and swept through the town, lifting a swath a quarter of a mile wide and fully three miles long, and taking in its track the finest business part of Wilkesbarre. Great warehouses, frame and brick buildings and tall chimneys were levelled with the ground; trees were snapped like pipe-stems and clouds of dust, rising timbers and masonry darkened the air. Men and women were dashed around like raws in the blast. Railroad and telegraph offices were demolished, churches unroofed and in some cases the organs laid bare, walls and windows being torn asunder. Heavy machinery and boilers destroyed and pulleys and shafts were found where they had been blown by the tremendous force of the gale into fields far by. Over 300 buildings were wrecked, twenty persons were killed outright and over a hundred injured, many of them mortally it is feared. It is estimated that the damage will not be less than a million dollars.

The Great Strike which began on the New York Central Railroad twelve days ago, and was believed to have been practically settled, assumed a new and threatening phase during the week. Grand Master Powderly, of the Knights

Labor, with a Committee, waited upon the railroad officials, and requested that the strike be submitted to arbitration, which was refused. The Knights then set about securing the cooperation of the affiliated organizations, including the Firemen's Brotherhood, and the United Orders

Railway Employees, with the view of inaugurating a general strike that would involve from half to three-fourths of a million operatives, (not including the engineers) and a majority of the railroads in the north and east. In view of this possibility, the N. Y. Central R. R. and its allies have prepared themselves for what may prove to be the biggest labor struggle in twenty years. On August 21, the Knights issued an address to the people of the United States, setting forth their grievances at length, declaring the pending struggle to be more momentous than the War of the Revolution, and asking the cooperation of all classes of workers in the strike. This was followed by a reminder from the railroad company, again declining to submit to arbitration its right to deal with employees. Everything now points to general strike, which must seriously interfere with transportation in all directions.

The Danger of Sudden Death was never more forcibly illustrated than in the terrible accident at the Old Colony Railroad which took place on the 19th inst, by the derailing of an express train at Quincy, not far from the scene of the great Wood's Hole disaster in 1878. A jack, left on the track by a careless workman, who was hurriedly crossing just at the very moment the train was approaching, threw the engine off the track, and it rushed up an embankment while the smoking, the baggage and drawing-room cars dumped over the ties, and fell on their sides. Clouds of scalding steam instantly began to pour over the wrecked cars, and the twenty-five or more imprisoned human beings were slowly roasted. In one car eleven died from suffocation, while forty were taken from the debris, more or less injured. In another car five died from the same cause.

James Ryan, the fireman fell beneath his engine and was crushed out of human semblance. Many of the victims were blistered and blackened beyond recognition. There were 400 people on the train, and many had narrow escapes. Among the passengers were an excursion party of 100, belonging to New York, Ohio, and Kentucky, several of whom were among the killed and injured.

The United States will Arbitrate Between Salvador and Guatemala, the good offices of our government having been accepted by both the belligerent Republics. The basis of peace was submitted on the 20th inst, and it is now believed that the treaty will be effected within the next thirty days. Under the new regime inaugurated by the presidency of Dr. Carlos Pelligrini, affairs in the Argentine Republic are gradually settling down, and business confidence is returning. Dr. Pelligrini, the successor of Celman, is making a strong effort to check the reckless methods that characterized the former administration, and has surrounded himself with a conservative cabinet which has the support of the people. His administration grows in public favor steadily. Pelligrini is a nephew of the late John Bright, the English statesman, and the son of an Italian father by an English mother.

A Very Significant Sign of the Times is Reported from Mississippi. The Constitutional Convention has been in session at Jackson, during the week. When the contests for seats came up, one of the contestants was a full-blooded negro, named Montgomery, formally a slave of Jefferson Davis, ex-President of the Confederacy. Although the Committee reported in favor of his opponent, there was a minority report in his favor, and it was so ably presented, and so convincingly did the negro advocate his own claim that the convention found itself compelled to decide in his favor. He took his seat, the only colored member of the convention. Montgomery is a strong advocate of the Australian ballot system. Ten years ago, his election under similar circumstances would have been impossible.

One of the Most Romantic Figures in Indian history is Dhuleep Singh, the Maharajah of Lahore and the former possessor of the famous Kohinoor diamond, who has just accepted a pardon at the hands of England, after a long lifetime of implacable enmity. When Dhuleep was a boy, and the last monarch of the great Sikh dynasty, his throne was captured by the British, his capital sacked and the Rajah taken a captive. He was educated in England and on reaching manhood, one day desired to see the great jewel, called by Orientals "The Mountain of Light," that had been taken from him as a child. It was placed in his hands and he generously handed it to Queen Victoria with the air of a monarch conferring a gift. Afterwards he quarrelled with England and placed himself under the protection of Russia. He is getting old now and evidently prefers peace and a liberal allowance to prolonged enmity. He has a son in the British army, with a command now stationed in Canada, but it is not probable that he will ever be prominent in Indian affairs.

Three more American Missionaries have fallen martyrs to the deadly African fever, which has slain more of God's workers than the spears and arrows of the savages. News comes from Sierra Leone, through the Bishop of the diocese, who is now in Switzerland, concerning the fate of the Rev. F. M. Gates and Rev. W. J. Harris and Mrs. Kingman, who, nine months ago, sailed from this country full of enthusiasm to preach in the Soudan. All three died at Sierra Leone of the fever. Mr. Kingman was also reported very sick. Messrs. Gates and Harris were at one time engaged in the service of the Young Men's Christian Association of Topeka, Kansas. The former was a son of Rev. C. H. Gates, of West Newfield, Me., and the latter of Gen. B. F. Harris, of Augusta, Me. They went out to Africa as volunteer missionaries last spring, from Maine, having, together with other members of the Kingman party, been attracted to the Soudan as a field of Christian activity through the eloquent addresses of Dr. H. Grattan Guinness. They undertook the work unaided by any societies, and their death removes from the ranks three workers of great zeal and promise.

Emperor William's Visit to the Czar, the London Cholera scare and the funeral of Cardinal Newman at Rednall, Worcestershire, were among the notable Old World events of the week. The London scare proved unfounded, although in Southern Europe, the cholera is making headway. The town of Arges in Spain, has been depopulated by the plague, the citizens fleeing in alarm and leaving the sick to perish. Even the Mayor of Arges was compelled to turn grave-digger, and bury his son.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Arthur T. Pearson has consented to undertake a brief tour among the churches in behalf of the work of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

The late Miss Dunn, who went out as a missionary in connection with the China Inland Mission last year, was the daughter of Mr. J. T. Dunn, one of the elders of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's Church.

The following statistics of the "Christian" Church have been furnished by J. J. Summerbell to the census office: Ordained ministers, 1,417; number of churches, 1,831; church members, 129,353.

Mrs. Elizabeth Sands, whose death at the age of 101 years, occurred recently in Baltimore, Md., was a nurse in the war of 1812, an honorary member of the Old Defenders' Association, and survived all those veterans. She was a member of the First Baptist Church.

Dr. Moulton, who has been elected President of the English Wesleyan Conference, is a distinguished scholar. At Dr. Ellicott's invitation, he contributed to his great work the article on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He was a member of the Committee on the Revision of the New Testament.

The Deaconess' Home and Training School of the Methodist Episcopal Church has made its first annual report. It proves the value and wisdom of the movement. Seventeen of these ladies are engaged in the work, and their usefulness is abundantly proved. The income for the year was $4,576.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding services at Block Island, R. I. During his recent meetings at Lockport, several men and women gave testimony that they were converted during Mr. Hammond's services there, when they were children, many years ago, and that since that time they had been working for Christ.

Rev. John Hanaloo, a Hawaiian Protestant minister, went to the leper settlement at Molekai twelve years ago. His wife was stricken with leprosy and he accompanied her to the island. He is just dead after ministering to the lepers in spiritual and temporal matters for twelve years without contracting the disease.

Arrangements are being made for a National Missionary Conference to be held early in September at Indianapolis, Ind. Bishop William Taylor, Dr. A. T. Pierson and other missionaries and friends of missions are expected to meet deputations from all the States. Full particulars may be obtained from Mr. George S. Fisher, Y. M. C. A., Topeka, Kan.

A missionary, Mr. Appenzeller, writing to the Independent, tells that when mission work began in Korea, the missionaries presented a Bible to the King. The prime minister took the Bible to the palace, showed it to the King, and then, with the King's approval, tore it to pieces. Years afterwards, an American citizen in Washington, presented the Korean Minister with a bottle of Bourbon whisky for the King. This was accepted.

Desirable Converts—Jacob's Explanation of Joseph's Fruitfulness—I. Joseph's Character—His Fellowship with God—Had Gracious Principles—Showed his Character Throughout his Life—Was Independent of External—Was Careless of Personal Interest—Conscious of Dependence on God—II. The Blessing of the Character—The Root and Essence of Religion—The Well Inexhaustible—Its Supplies Pure—III. The Blessings it Brings—Fruitfulness—Unselfishness—Enrichment.

"Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall." Gen. 49: 22.

"And of Joseph he said, blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath." Deut. 33: 13.

DEAR friends, we long to have many converts; we count that church happy to which God adds daily of such as are being saved. But we are very much concerned about the quality of our converts. We do not wish to make up a church with a number of shallow professors, whose religion lies upon the surface, and is of a doubtful character. We are very anxious that we should have those in our fellowship who are thoroughly converted, richly experienced, and fully instructed in the deep things of God. We would have as our associates people who are established by principle rather than moved by passion. We would earnestly pray to have a company of believers added to the church who shall be like Joseph in character—fruitful trees growing by the well, whose branches run over the wall.

and he explains his fruitfulness by his position: he is fruitful "by a well." When a vine grows near a well which is always full, and when it is able to send its roots down to drink of the unfailing spring, it may very well be fruitful, and send forth many branches. The point is, to get by the well; or, to use our second text, to tap "the deep that coucheth beneath." If we can reach the secret fountains, and say to God, with the Psalmist, "All my fresh springs are in thee," then shall we find nourishment for our branches, and our fruit and leaf will never fail. "Dwell deep" is a prophetic word of much value to Christians. To live upon land-drainage and casual rains may suffice for ordinary plants; but the trees of the Lord which bring forth much fruit need to penetrate below the topsoil and reach the secret fountains of grace. Upon that subject I am going to talk this morning.

I. First, this describesJoseph's Character.

He flourished near to God. He was an offshoot of the old tree, and he was rooted deep by a well which always watered him. From his childhood until he died, the main point in Joseph's character was that he was in clear and constant fellowship with God, and therefore God blessed him greatly. He lived to God, and was God's servant; he lived with God, and was God's child. He looked up to heaven for daily teaching and comfort; and God was with him so as not only to bless him, but to bless others for his sake; as, for instance, the house of Potiphar first, and afterwards Pharaoh and all the land of Egypt, and all the famishing nations. In this respect his branches ran over the wall in scattering blessings far and wide, and all this was the result of living in intercourse with God.

Because Joseph lived near to God he received and retained gracious principles. There is a great difference between religious principle and religious passion. Many persons are religious by starts and fits—according to their company, their feelings, or their whims. According to the influences under which they come, certain people become good, bad, or indifferent. But when a man lives in the presence of the Lord, he has fixed principles, which rule his heart, and guide his life.

Joseph showed his character throughout the whole of his life. As a youth he dwelt very near to God, and hence he was forced to enter his protest against the evil conduct of his brothers. "Joseph brought unto his father their evil report." Soon he became a marked young man; his brothers felt he was not one of themselves, and they hated him, called him a dreamer, and took the first occasion to get rid of him. Jacob's household was in a very sad condition—even the grossest vice was found among his sons—and young Joseph was a speckled bird among them. By their malice he was sold for a slave into Egypt; but no sooner is he there, than we read, "And the Lord was with Joseph." Potiphar bought him, but the Lord made all that he did to prosper. It is difficult for a slave to become the steward of a great man; but Joseph did so, and his master took no account of anything, but left it all absolutely in Joseph's hands, and God blessed the house for Joseph's sake. And then there came in his way that great temptation; and you remember his gracious answer, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" God was evidently with him, keeping him in the way of innocence: he could not grieve his God, for his God was his delight.

In Adversity.

By false accusation he was cast into prison; but we read that "the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, and gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison." Soon he became the under-jailer, and was helpful to the prisoners. His branches were always running over the wall in the form of usefulness to others. The prison was brightened by his presence; and as soon as he was prepared for the position, a straight path was opened for him from the prison to the court of Pharaoh. In the hour of his elevation he did not forget God. When about to interpret the royal dreams, he said, "God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." He is a young man greatly gifted, and he may miss preferment if he mentions his religion; but this does not daunt him; again and again he says, "God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do."

On the throne his God is still with him, and guides him in all things, and he exclaims, "God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction." When he sees his aged father, their talk is concerning the Lord God. When he comes to die, he says to his brethren, "I die, but God will be with you." He gave commandment concerning his bones, that he should not be buried in Egypt, for he was no Egyptian, though he had been lord of the land, but he would be carried away to the land of promise in the day when Israel should quit the stranger's land. Always the Lord his God is the star of Joseph. This is his character; he is in the fear of God all the day long. He was a fruitful bough by a well.

That Well was His God.

This abiding near to God made Joseph independent of externals. His resources were within, and therefore he was not to be injured by things without. His springs were deep, and therefore not affected by circumstances. He was not dependent upon family surroundings. At home, the society of his father would nourish his early piety, but he was just as gracious in the house of Potiphar. The degrading idolatries of Egypt did not make him unfaithful to the unseen God. Some of you young people not only owe your religious impressions to your parents; but I fear that if you were removed from them you would have no religion of your own. Are my fears correct? It is an anxious time when a lad leaves his home to be apprenticed, or to take his first place. If he has nothing but borrowed religion, he will soon yield to ill company; but if he lives in God for himself, he will stand.

Many professing Christians are, I fear, very much dependent upon revival excitement, and the currents of godly society, which are often sufficiently strong to bear with them those who have no living principle. If religion seems to prosper, if many press into the congregation, if large numbers throng the inquiry room, these people are very happy, and very earnest. But after the summer-tide is over, where are they?

This is the great burden which every earnest evangelist has to bear: so many seem born of God in the heat of a revival who, nevertheless, die away when the warmth of zeal is gone. O that you, my brethren, may be planted by well, so that you may

by drought! Bless God for revivals, and never speak against them; but do not live upon them, nor cause your spiritual health to depend upon them. Those who grow upon hotbeds will not be far from dung. There are evil tendencies connected with fanaticism which are to be dreaded. Get down to the well, and let your roots drink up the fresh nourishment, which is essential to the sap of your life, and to the fruit of your usefulness.

Above all, it is a great blessing to be so rooted and watered that you can live graciously and uprightly, despite personal interest. There was a time when it seemed the loss of everything for Joseph to keep close to God. A young man can get on well with elder brothers if he will please them by dropping into their habits, but if he opposes them, he will have a sorry time of it. If you would be happy at home, you must remember the old proverb, that when you are at Rome you must do as Rome does. This is the wisdom of this world; but Joseph scorned it. No, he cannot help it; he and with holiness. What is the result? The Ishmaelites carry him away for a slave. Potiphar encourages him for holy youth! In the house of Potiphar, compliance with his mistress seemed an easy way to honor and pleasure. But he could not yield to her base suggestion; he had rather bear the consequences of her harshly than she falsely charge him; he comes under the master's anger, loses his place and is put in prison; but he cannot help it, he must obey God. Are you of this true kind? Oh, for the godliness which will strengthen you to quit your situation, to lose your wealth, to sacrifice your credit, and to part with your friends soon than grieve your Lord!

I cannot close this first head without saying—while Joseph thus was placed in a position of very high independence of all outward things, he was very conscious of his entire dependence upon God. Take the well away, and where was the fruitful bough? Remove "the deep that lieth under," and then the resources even of a great character as that of the prime-minister of Egypt would have been dried up. Dear young friends, while I would exhort you to think of yourselves, and judge for yourselves, and strive for yourselves with a holy independence of others; yet never forget where your strength lieth, and never rely upon yourselves.

II. This brings me now to notice, under my second head, that this is of itself a great blessing. Moses, in my second text, mentions beneath," as having its own form of blessing. This was for Joseph's race a blessing. It is a blessing to know the deep things of God, and to enjoy the far-down securities, enjoyments, and privileges of the children of heaven. In deep union to God are to be found the very truth and life of godliness. As for outward religion, what is it? You may practise all the ordinances without fault, and yet you will be godless unless your spirit has had converse with the Lord. A godly man is in Scripture said to be a godly man. He is a man of God—God's man: he lives for God, he lives with God, he lives on God. If you do not believe in God, love God, glorify God, or all the outward forms on the earth, nor can that God has given, can make up a religion for you that is worth a single penny. A knowledge of the technicalities of theology is of small use unless you enjoy the truths to which they refer. Do not say, "I have joined the church, sir, and attend the prayer-meetings, and take my share among the workers." Yes, I know; but religion is more than this. It is repentance towards God. It is faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

"The Deep that Coucheth

The man who dwells near to God has supplies which can never be cut off. We have heard of which have been surrounded by armies, were never captured by assault but compelled to surrender because the waters cut off the water-courses, broke down the aqueducts; and so subdued them by thirst. Jerusalem was never thus captured, for there are deep wells within the city itself which ceased to flow. Ah, my brethren! he that has a well of living water within him is beyond the enemy's power. We can go to God when we are not allowed to go to the service. The priest took away the boy's Bible. "Yes," said the boy, "but you cannot take away those twelve verses of John which I have learnt." The power of man may deny us a place of worship, but cannot prevent our worshipping the Lord, wherever we may be. Every means of grace may be denied the believer, but the grace of the Lord will still come to him.

The Water Pure.

The supplies of the believer who dwells deep and pure as well as full. Grace through the Lord is apt to be diluted; but when we receive from God alone it is grace indeed. The best pipes are apt to make the water taste. All non-watercourses mix earth with the water; the deep that lieth under is out of reach of defilement. If you can draw from the pure of gospel undefiled, you will do well. In the Alps how often have I wished to see the guide and the guide has forbidden me, and me to wait a little; and then we have come to a leaping fount, most cool and delicious; better than the streams which, as they ran, had gathered earth, and decay, and evil. Draw your supplies at first hand. Do as the sick man who had been made ill with impure milk: kept a cow of his own. Instead of exposing to read the Bible for yourself. In Bible light the Bible is best seen.

Lastly I would remind you that this goes with it other blessings. If you are by the well, sending your roots into its waters,

You will Obtain Fruitfulness.

A fruitful tree is one which is well sustained at the root. Dear friends, it is by no means wise to cry, "I will work hard, and try to bear fruit." Fruit is not produced by work. No vine can produce grapes. It buds, and blossoms, and bears fruit in the order of its nature. We have a great deal of fruitless working now. Religion is pumped up. Devotion is too mechanical; godliness is supplanted by special excitement; and love to God by personal fussiness. Zeal for God is counted by "much ado about nothing." If the secret life is in good order, precious fruit is brought forth by sun and moon. May the Lord make us bring forth holiness through the force of the new nature! May He put into us immortal principles, and may He sustain us by His own personal power! and then, gladly and joyfully, in its season, we shall bring forth fruit to His praise and glory.

The next blessing that came with this was selfishness. Joseph was a bough whose branches ran over the wall. He extended his influence beyond his own family. We shall have but little fruit if our branches are kept in the narrow space of self and relatives. Private godliness for the sole sake of yourself and you will never be very godly; but send it in for God's sake, and for love of the one whom Jesus has redeemed, and you will be godly indeed.

Live to Love,

to love is to live when it is of God. You go over the walls to your ungodly neighbor, the Christless infidel, to the heathen and the away. You will extend your usefulness where none expected it to grow; you will be a blessing to many who were far off from you and your God.

I heard of one whose last petition was, that God would bury his influence with him. An unusual prayer! It was so far good that it evidenced a recognition of his life's mistake, and some sort of repentance for it. But he was asking that which could not be granted; for not even God Himself ever kills a man's influence.

The world's poet truly says, "The evil that men do lives after them." Most surely the evil lives, even if the good expires. Yet, when we are dead and buried, if we have lived unto God, and lived upon God, our branches will run over the wall of the cemetery, and our voices will be heard from amid the silence of the sepulchre. Is it not written, "He being dead yet speaketh"?

Another privilege comes of personal nearness to God; such men enjoy safety. Hear how Jacob puts it: "The archers have sorely grieved Him, and shot at Him, and hated Him." If you live near to God you will be the target of the ungodly, and the hatred of the world will cause you grief of heart. It cannot be avoided, for the seed of the serpent will nibble at the heel of the seed of the woman. Even to this day is Joseph sold into Egypt, and separated from his brethren. But this shall not harm you; for it is added, "His bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob," receiving his strength from God, Joseph lived above the rage of men.

Besides that, Joseph received enrichment. Many of you religious people know nothing about precious things. Many professors live on the mere skins and husks of divine truth; they have never tasted the sweet kernels yet. A little religion is a mournful thing: they that drink deep get Down to the Sweetness.

Many have religion enough to make them wretched; if they had seven times as much, they would be joyful. The best wines in God's house are in the cellar. Those who never go downstairs have no idea of the secret sweetness. A deep experience is a precious experience. The Lord fills certain of his people with pain and grief, that they may know His choicer consolations. We are too apt to let our roots run along just under the surface, and so we get no firm rootage; but trouble comes, and then we grow downward, rooted in humility; then we pierce the treasures of darkness, and know the deep things of God.

Dear friends, I might add a thousand things, but I will not. I will only say this—do, I pray you dive into the depths. You that are beginning with holy things, begin deep, and take sure root. See how soon buildings fall if they have insufficient foundations! Find your foundation in the rock. You that have long known the Lord, endeavour to know more and more of him. Send out more roots into yet deeper and richer ground. God grant us to get closer to Him than ever, and to keep there; and grant us to use all our opportunities for usefulness.

The Parable of the Caterpillar.*

"LET me hire you as a nurse for my poor children," said a butterfly to a quiet caterpillar, who was strolling along a cabbage leaf in her odd lumbering way. "See these little eggs," continued the butterfly, "I don't know how long it will be before they come to life, and I feel very sick and poorly, and if I should die, who will take care of my baby butterflies when I am gone? Will you, kind, mild, green caterpillar? But you must mind what you give them to eat. They cannot, of course, live on your rough food. You must give them early dew and honey from the flowers; and you must let them fly about only a little way at first; for of course one cannot expect them to use their wings properly all at once. Dear me! it is a sad pity you cannot fly yourself. But I have no time to look for another nurse now, so you will do your best I hope. Oh, how dizzy I am! Caterpillar, you will remember about the food—" And with these words the butterfly dropped her wings and died; and the green caterpillar who had not had the opportunity of saying yes or no to the request, was left standing alone by the side of the butterfly's eggs.

The green caterpillar had a kind heart, so she resolved to do her best. But she got no sleep that night, she was so very anxious. She made her back ache walking all night around her young charges, for fear any harm should happen to them; and in the morning she said to herself: "Two heads are better than one; I will consult some wise animal upon the matter and get advice. How should a poor crawling creature like me know what to do without asking my betters?" Now in the neighboring cornfield there lived a lark, and the caterpillar sent a message to him, to beg him to come and talk to her, and when he came she told him all her difficulties, and asked him what she was to do to feed and rear the little creatures so different from herself. "Perhaps you will be able to inquire and hear something about it next time you go up high," observed the caterpillar timidly.

The lark said, perhaps he should; but he did not satisfy her curiosity any further. Soon afterwards, however, he went singing upwards into the bright blue sky. By degrees his voice died away in the distance, till the green caterpillar could not hear a sound. So she resumed her walk around the butterfly's eggs, nibbling a bit of the cabbage-leaf now and then as she moved along. At last the lark's voice began to be heard again. The caterpillar almost jumped for joy, and it was not long before she saw her friend descend with hushed note to the cabbage-bed.

"News, news, glorious news, friend caterpillar!" sang the lark; "but the worst of it is you won't believe me."

"I believe everything I am told," observed the caterpillar, hastily.

"Well, then, first of all, I will tell you what these little creatures are to eat. What do you think it is to be?"

"Dew and the honey out of flowers, I am afraid," sighed the caterpillar.

"No such thing. Something simpler than that. Something that you can get at quite easily."

"I can get at nothing easily but cabbage-leaves," murmured the caterpillar in distress.

"Excellent! my good friend," cried the lark. "You have found it out. You are to feed them with cabbage-leaves."

"Never!" said the caterpillar, "it was their dying mother's last request that I should do no such thing."

"Their dying mother knew nothing about the matter," persisted the lark; "but why do you ask me and then disbelieve what I say?"

"I believe everything I am told," said the caterpillar.

"Nay, but you do not," replied the lark; "you won't believe me even about the food and yet that is only the beginning of what I have to tell you. What do you think those little eggs will turn out to be?"

"Butterflies, to be sure," said the caterpillar.

"Caterpillars," sang the lark; "and you'll find it out in time. And I'll tell you something else, for the best of my news remains behind, you will one day be a butterfly yourself."

"Wretched bird!" exclaimed the caterpillar, "you jest with my inferiority. You are cruel as well as foolish."

"I told you you would not believe me," said the lark.

"I believe everything I am told," persisted the caterpillar, "that is"—and she hesitated—"everything that is reasonable. But to tell me that butterflies' eggs are caterpillars, and that caterpillars leave off crawling and get wings, and become butterflies! Lark, you are too wise to believe such nonsense yourself, for you know it is impossible."

"I know no such thing," said the lark, "whether I hover over the corn-fields of earth, or go up into the depths of the sky, I see so many wonderful things, I know no reason why there should not be more. Oh, caterpillar! it is because you crawl, because you never get beyond your cabbage-leaf, that you call anything impossible. Fool to attempt to reason about what you cannot understand! Do you not hear how my song swells with rejoicing as I soar upwards to the glorious wonderland above? Oh, caterpillar! what comes to you from thence receive as I do, upon trust."

"That is what you call faith. How am I to learn faith?" asked the caterpillar. At that moment she felt something moving at her side. She looked around—eight or ten little green caterpillars were moving about and had already made a hole in the cabbage-leaf. They had broken from the butterfly's eggs!

Shame and amazement filled our green friend's heart, but joy soon followed; for as the first wonder was possible, the second might be so too. And the caterpillar talked all the rest of her life to her relations of the time when she should be a butterfly. But none of them believed her. She nevertheless had learned the lark's lesson of faith, and when she was going into her chrysalis grave, she said, "I shall be a butterfly some day." And when she was a butterfly and was going to die again, she said: "I have known many wonders, I have faith, I can trust even now for what shall come next."

THE PEORIA Y. M. C. A. BUILDING.

WE give to-day on this page a picture of the handsome new building now being erected in Peoria, Ill., for the Young Men's Christian Association of that progressive western city. For several years before the present enterprise, the Association had been looking forward hopefully to the day when it would have its own home, instead of meeting in temporary quarters. Its managers and members set about raising the money and soon had $27,000 in hand toward the project. This was accomplished before even the building lot was purchased. By a happy inspiration, the ground chosen was the very site of the former home of the infidel, Ingersoll, where many of his earlier atheistic writings were produced. This was the most suitable lot for the Association's purpose, being in an excellent location in the heart of the city. The negotiations were closed in December 1888 and the President, with several other members of the Board of Managers, went out among the business men of Peoria and raised $20,000 in three weeks. A like sum was raised by means of the religious services held in the Opera House, where Rev. C. H. Yatman, the noted Evangelist, preached with great power to very large audiences.

The building is now well under way and will probably be finished sometime next winter. It will cost $125,000, and will be one of the very handsomest in Peoria, being a beautiful structure, 72x171 feet, and five stories high, besides a high basement. It contains more than one hundred rooms. One corner has a tower which rises about forty feet higher than the main building, and affords a splendid view of the city. The front is of red sandstone and pressed brick; the basement is devoted to bath-rooms, swimming pool, etc., and the rear half of the first and second stories is used for a gymnasium. Above these rooms, occupying the third and fourth stories, is the auditorium with a seating capacity of about seven hundred. The officers of the Young Men's Christian Association are: O. J. Bailey, President; C. A. Jamison, Vice-President; C. W. Johnson, Recording Secretary; F. E. Avery, Treasurer.

THE THOUSAND ISLAND PARK FIRE.

AN event which might have proved an appalling calamity, but was fortunately attended by the loss of only a single life, was the destructive fire at Thousand Island Park on Thursday, August 21. The Thousand Island Park Hotel on the St. Lawrence River caught fire before daylight, the flames evidently having started in the kitchen. They spread so rapidly that the great structure—one of the largest summer hotels in the country—was soon a seething mass. The 400 guests, however, providentially escaped, although they saved nothing but their night clothes. It was discovered that although the halls were well supplied with hose and buckets, there was not a drop of water in the pipes, and the conflagration made such headway before this fatal oversight was remedied that it was impossible to save the hotel or its contents.

The heroine of the occasion was Miss Martha Holtman, a modest young waitress in the New England dining-room, situated across the road from the rear of the hotel. She first saw the blaze, and gave the alarm instantly, her prompt action doubtless being the means of saving many lives. The proprietor, seizing the dinner-gong, dashed up and down the halls, ringing it and shouting "fire!" The hundreds of guests poured out of their rooms and down stairs like mad beings.

After completely enveloping the hotel, the greedy flames leaped across the avenue northward and attacked the cottages there. About twenty-five summer residences were destroyed. Those cottagers whose dwellings were luckily uninjured, hospitably accommodated the 500 houseless persons for the night. Only one life is known to have been lost—that of a woman named Julia Morrow, whose charred body was found in the ruins of the hotel. Two women servants were slightly injured, by having fight their way through the flames in escape. Half a dozen other persons were also hurt, none seriously. There were many narrow escapes and many prayers of thankfulness for his mercy. The total loss will be $150,000. It is believed that the fire was work of an incendiary.

THE LATE CHARLES L. BRACE.

THE devoted servant of Christ whose was briefly mentioned in this journal last and whose portrait is here given, has behind him a record worthy of all honor and emulation. Mr. Brace gave all his energies to his life to the service of the poor, and with the highest sense of the title, a Christian anthropologist. With talents and culture that have won for him wealth and popularity, he chose to serve a class from which he could expect no recompense. Not to him, in such occupation, could come ease or luxury, or prizes that worldly-minded preachers forget themselves and his own interest, toiled that others might be better and happy. He has gone from among us unrewarded in his place now is among the great throng of sacrificing workers of whom we shall hear the last, when Christ says to those on His right hand: "I was a hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in; Naked, and ye clothed me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. . . . Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me." Compared with that welcome how insignificant seem the accumulated thousands of dollars behind in the coffers of those Christians despising disinterested labor worked in the world only for themselves!

Charles Loring Brace was born at Litchfield, Conn., in 1826. His father was a noted educator in that place, and his mother was a daughter of Mrs. Lyman Beecher, the mother of Mr. Ward Beecher. After studying at Yale, taking a degree, he entered Union Theological Seminary to prepare for the ministry. A providential fact that the man who was destined to labor so successfully in philanthropy should have had so thorough a theological training. In after years, when he could deal with cases apparently hopeless, he would have lost heart if he had not known the power of the grace of God. After graduating in 1850, Mr. Brace went to Europe for study and exploration. He made a pedestrian tour through Great Britain and Ireland, and then went to spend the winter in study. In the spring

"Yes, Mr. Wescott," Addie was saying. "I will go, and I think we shall enjoy it thoroughly." Corriann turned away disgusted with himself and with all the world. He seemed born to disappointment.

Addie's prediction that the excursion would be a pleasant affair proved true. Everyone—and there was a large company—enjoyed himself in a characteristic manner, some playing croquet, other taking a sail around the lake in the small steamer, while others hired row-boats and glided as fancy moved them over the smooth sheet of water. In the afternoon, Howard and Addie took a boat for a row to the opposite shore, which sloped beautifully back from the lake, and seemed to beckon them.

"We can save time by going directly across the lake," said Howard, as he took the oars and propelled the boat from the shore.

"Do you think it safe? A rather strong breeze seems to be rising," she said.

"Oh! I think there is no danger."

He was not a very dexterous oarsman, and the breeze was quite stiff out in the centre of the lake, so that the waves rolled frightfully high for persons unused to the water, several of the white-caps actually breaking over the side of the boat and splashing the young couple more than they liked. Several times wind and wave combined almost wrenched the boat from Howard's control, and there was danger of capsizing. He struggled manfully, but his face grew pale with a terrible fear.

"I am afraid, we are in danger, Mr. Wescott," said Addie, and Howard saw that her lips were white.

"Addie," he broke out, "I will do the best I can to save you. I am sorry I brought you into this peril. I can never forgive myself."

He bent again to the oars and put forth all his strength. Addie sat still with white, scared face, but the brave girl uttered no cry nor shed a tear.

"Addie," Howard said, and the use of her first name in that moment of danger seemed natural, "it may be that neither of us may live through this. I should like you to know something that I meant to tell you under happier circumstances. I love you dearly. It was my hope to win you for my own. Do you think I might have succeeded? Could you love me?"

It was no time for the pretty shyness and girlish bridling that such a question in other circumstances might have called forth. The blood shot across Addie's pale cheeks, and her eyes shone for a moment as she answered: "I could; I do. I am glad you spoke. It robs death of half its sting. Look, I believe it is coming."

She pointed to a huge breaker rolling toward the boat.

More by instinct than by any application of skill he placed his oars in the right position to save the little bark from being turned over, although it dipped water and trembled for one terrible moment in the balance. An interval of comparative calm between the violent squalls enabled him to hurry the boat into a bay that was somewhat sheltered; and just in time, for the next wave was still higher than its predecessor, and would surely have upset their light craft. The couple now crept along the sheltering shore, and their excited feelings were soon somewhat calmed. No one was in sight, the narrow point of woodland that swung out into the lake cutting off their view of the rest of the party on the other side of the lake, and forming an alcove shut in on three sides. The boat was allowed to drift, while Howard plucked a cluster of fragrant water-lilies for his companion.

Then he drew up to the shore, helped her from the boat, and sat down beside her on the green slope. Placing the cluster of lilies that he had plucked into her hand, he said, in a voice tense with feeling:

"Addie, do you see how pure and white these lilies are? Shall they be a symbol of our love?" She did not answer at once, but the roses bloomed on her cheeks. "Shall they, Addie?" he repeated, eagerly.

"Yes, if you wish it so," she whispered.

"And you will not withdraw the confession I forced from you in that awful moment of danger?"

"No;—I should have said the same under any other circumstances," said the girl, ingenuously.

"Oh! Addie, my dear, dear—one," he said, passionately drawing her to his breast.

Love so sweet, so pure, so hallowed, should be veiled from our intrusive gaze. Such confessions and vows as were that day interchanged are common enough, and yet to lovers they can never become commonplace, nor should they. To the young it is ever the new-old story, just as beautiful as when Adam made love to the mother of brides in the garden. When, from the beginning until now, has not love been made in a garden metaphorically if not literally? It is only those whose lives have become acrid and arid and from whose natures cynicism has excised all sweet sentiment, who sneer at the loves of the young. Clouds may lower sometime over the sky of our happy lovers, but that is no reason why they should refuse to enjoy the sunshine while it lasts.

On their way back to the picnic-grounds, Howard rowed around near the shore, determined to take no further risks. It had been an eventful day, and he lived in a kind of dream-land for a week, and even then could scarcely realize that it was he who had won the hand of the noble girl.

When, a few days later, Corrigan saw a heavy gold band on Addie's finger, he knew instinctively that it meant an engagement with his rival.

The sad calamity that had befallen Robert Heritage a few months prior to these events, had given young Wescott a violent spiritual shock, and seemed for a time to have flung him back again into blank atheism. He was of an inquiring turn of mind, disposed to seek out the moral significance of things; but being unable to trace any useful purpose in the misfortune of his friend, his doubts returned in aggravated form, and he said to himself:

"The world is ruled by caprice. There is no God of providence, no God who cares, and so no God at all."

He and Addie often talked it over, neither of them able to solve the enigma of human suffering. And who is able clearly to elucidate it? Yet Heritage's story which had been concluded a few weeks before, had been read by them with intense interest, and had kept the spirit of religious inquiry and concern alive within them. Besides, Addie's duties in the Sunday-school and choir required her presence at church, and where she went Howard usually found himself drawn; so that every Sabbath they listened to the fervid eloquence of Dr. Hamlyn. Thus they drifted along until the time of their engagement.

A few days later an event occurred which made an important turning-point in Howard's life. It was the receipt of a letter. He was sitting in his brother-in-law's office, looking over some legal documents and comparing them with the Revised Statutes of the State, when the letter was laid upon his desk. The hand-writing was unfamiliar and the post-mark was so blurred that he could not decipher it. His eyes opened wide as he read the following epistle:

"MY DEAR WESCOTT: I am very busy. Per- you are, too, as well as myself. So I will come to the point at once. Do you remember the day at college when I dissuaded you from going to the special meetings, the day I put a certain book into your hands? I fear I did you harm that day. My conscience will give me no rest until I confess my error and try to undo the wrong. Wescott, I was mistaken then. I have had my eyes opened since. Through the influence of a friend I was led to read the Bible more carefully and with less prejudice. I soon saw that I had been blind. My friend told me to go to God in prayer for light. After some delay I took his advice. My doubts were of long standing and rank growth, but God's Spirit uprooted them, and to day I am a fervent believer. He will do the same for all—for you. Go to him, my brother. Heed not the advice I gave you in our college days, but, oh, Wescott, I pray you, heed the advice I give you now.

Will you?—You will scarcely credit it when I tell you that I am now preparing to preach the Gospel I once held in such bitter content. Let me hear from you."

"Your friend always,
B. C. MCDANE."

Howard drew a long breath when he had read the letter, and then said:

"This letter is sui generis, if a piece of composition ever was. That's precisely McDane's style, so quaintly abrupt and sententious. What a strange experience he has had! What if it were elaborated, it would read like the experience of Heritage's hero."

And Howard took down the Weekly Reflector which he kept in the office for convenient reference, and read over the chapter that had few months before, stirred him so powerfully.

"Why should I continue in this dire uncertainty a day longer if, as so many of my friends say, there is a way out of it?" reasoned Howard as he sat musing in the office. "McDane converted! I never saw a more rabid opponent of Christianity than he was at college, and if that could be changed, there is hope for all—for me."

Then he remembered that Heritage had told him to go to Dr. Hamlyn for counsel, and resolved to do so at once. It was a sweltering August afternoon, and he found the doctor in his study, with every window hoisted, letting the breeze be stirring. Dr. Hamlyn greeted his guest kindly. He was not a dry pedant, a mere doctrinaire, although a man of scholarly tastes and habits; there was a practical side to his nature, which brought him into touch with the life of the city in which he lived. Conservative and wholly orthodox in his theology, unwilling for a single moment to temporize with what he regarded as error, he was broadminded and liberal, having none of the elements of the sectary in his nature. On the whole, he was the farthest remove from being a mere dogmatician, stickling for modes of expression or shibboleths of doctrine. The only thing of small concern to him, the spirit of everything. Dr. Hamlyn was one in whom persuasion and belief had ripened into faith, faith become a passionate intuition.

Although a very busy man, he always had time to direct the inquirer, as Howard found when he frankly told the story of his mental difficulties. The kind clergyman explained those problems that would admit of explanation, opened up the Scriptures until, as was the case with the disciples of old, his young friend's life burned within him.

"You have done me much good," said Howard, gratefully. "The Bible seems like a new book to me in many respects. And yet I am not satisfied. My mind is still full of doubts which seems to weigh me down like a nightmare. How shall I get rid of it? How shall I get full assurance?"

"Let us kneel in prayer and take your doubts to God."

It was a solemn scene, one over which the veil shall be sacredly drawn, for it would be most profane to intrude into the Holy of Holies of a religious experience, when for the first time a soul talks with God. When the supplicants rose from their knees, and stood looking into each other's eyes, their hands clasped the old man and the young inquirer, it needed no words to tell that the Dayspring had risen at last in Howard Wescott's heart.

"We have been conversing with God," said the clergyman, in solemn tones.

"Yes, and He has bidden all my doubts depart," answered Howard. "I know it! I know it!"

"Can you say with Paul, 'Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ?'"

"I can."

"And, 'God's Spirit beareth witness within us that we are the children of God?'"

"With all my heart."

"Wescott, my young brother, you have been born from above. May God keep that which He hath entrusted to you. Good night."

AN AFRICAN FEAST.

English missionary in Western Africa a graphic account of the humiliation offered at a recent feast given by the king of the country. He had to witness a feast, the materials for which had been supplied by his own countrymen. He said: "Every Friday the king makes a feast. His Majesty sent for me, and proceeded to the palace. The king, his wives, chiefs, and notable women, the medans, and every one of position in town were gathered together on the palace grounds. All the food was brought before me in large vessels, divided in his company, and carried to the different companies seated on the ground, each company with its own dish, and using Nature's implements—their fingers. At intervals the king treated us to a dance, when special musicians would accompany him with a native trumpet, and the king with an instrument whose melodies reminded me of a Scotch bagpipe. The two men were employed the while shouting the praises of the king. The feasting was, finished, the king, his wives, and chiefs retired to another part of the palace—I supposed to hold a consultation. In a few minutes the king sent for me, then witnessed a scene which stirred my soul. There sat the king, with his hands giving to the people out of bottles, English gin and rum, brought in by native traders. Every day the king drank out this poison to the people, who like it, and get intoxicated the day closes. As I looked on I felt that when I remembered it had come from my own country, but I gave the king to understand I had nothing to do with it, though it was an evil trade. 'The white man sells it to us,' said the king. 'We did not know the fact: before the white man came it. We like it, and must have it.'"

AN UNCONSCIOUS HEIR.

A legend is told in Germany that there is a day a great festival in one of the royal castles on the river Rhine. The day was exceedingly dark and wild, and intensely cold. An ill-clad, half-starved, shivering man toiled along one of the rugged paths. He looked with wistful eye at the light that streamed from the windows of the mansion, and listened to the strains of feasting and the strains of music. He left his home in early youth, been a victim of fortune, and heard nothing in days of deficient communication of news. He knew not that that magnificent dwelling was his father's property, and that the heir. Desperate in his needs, he had to ask for some shelter and food. In the portals he found an old servant. Some little conversation, his heirship was discovered. He passed at once from poverty to abundance, from the wild storm to the bright shelter within. The heir's attire was changed for robes suitable to the heir. Especially he rejoiced in the presence of an affectionate and noble father. A Christian did not know all that he is, and never claims all the privileges God is waiting to bestow. "According to your faith" is the measure given, "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man, nor hath been conceived in the mind, nor hath been prepared for the things which God hath prepared for them who love Him."

A MINER'S SACRIFICES.

of the common devices of Satan, in order to prevent men quitting his service and to keep them under the Prince of Peace is to tempt them of the pleasures they love, but they must renounce, if they become Christians. All too many find it too great a sacrifice to make. But some have found sacrifice at all. One instance is related which the pleasures that were given could never have been enjoyed, and announcing them the man made an ingrain. There had been an evangelist in the village for a few weeks, and many of the miners and their families had embraced the opportunity of accepting Christ. On one day a certain young man seemed to be very constrained to come to the Saviour. His companion had already yielded, but Satan was evidently making a hard fight to retain this captive, by spreading out all the pleasures and amusements he would have to resign if he became a Christian. The evangelist showed plainly by the Word of God that, 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation,' but there was no promise for to-morrow. At length, by God's grace, Satan was vanquished, his temptations put to one side, and the captive soul set free. Next day while the men were at work in the mine, an explosion took place. A few men were killed or injured, among the latter was the young man who, after such a struggle, had given himself to Christ the previous night. He was carried home, but, alas, there was very little hope for him, and as night approached it became evident that he was going fast. His companion of the previous evening was among the anxious watchers gathered around the bed. Turning to him, the dying lad said, 'Thank God, Bob, it was settled last night.' (And in a few minutes he went home to his newly-found Saviour.)

THE SILVER LINING.

THERE's never a day so sunny
But a little cloud appears ;
There's never a life so happy
But has had its time of tears :
Yet the sun shines out the brighter
When the stormy tempest clears.

There's never a garden growing
With roses in every plot ;
There's never a heart so hardened
But it has one tender spot :
We have only to prune the border
To find the forget-me-not.

There's never a cup so pleasant
But has bitter with the sweet ;
There's never a path so rugged
That bears not the prints of feet :
And we have a Helper promised
For the trials we may meet.

There's never a sun that rises
But we know 'twill set at night ;
The tints that gleam in the morning
At evening are just as bright :
And the hour that is the sweetest
Is between the dark and light.

There's never a dream that's happy
But the waking makes us sad :
There's never a dream of sorrow
But the waking makes us glad :
We shall look some day with wonder
At the troubles we have had.

There's never a way so narrow
But the entrance is made straight ;
There's always a Guide to point us
To the "little wicket-gate" :
And the angels will be nearer
To a soul that is desolate.

There's never a heart so haughty
But will some day bow and kneel ;
There's never a heart so wounded
That the Saviour cannot heal.
There's many a lowly forehead
That's bearing the hidden seal.

DANIEL AMONG LIONS.

A SERMON DELIVERED LAST SUNDAY BY DR. TALMAGE.

The Jewish Chancellor of Babylon—His Enemies—Their Wicked Plot Foiled—Their Fate—Good Men of Our Day and Their Detractors—I. Success a Crime in the Eyes of Envious Men—II. The Value of Decision of Character—A Good Rule of Life—III. The Place of Religion in Business—Men Who Think Religion Impertinent—Well to Have Many Irons in the Fire—IV. The Place of Religion in Politics—Religious Men Among Our Patriots—V. Lions Cannot Hurt a Good Man.

"Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel and cast him into the den of lions." Daniel 6: 16.

DARIUS was king of Babylon, and the young man Daniel was so much a favorite with him that he made him Prime Minister, or Secretary of State. But no man could gain such a high position without exciting the envy and jealousy of the people. There were demagogues in Babylon who were so appreciative of their own abilities that they were affronted at the elevation of this young man. Old Babylon was afraid of young Babylon. The taller the cedar, the more apt it is to be riven of the lightning.

These demagogues asked the king to make a decree that anybody that made a petition to any one except the king within thirty days should be put to death. King Darius, not suspecting any foul play, makes that decree. The demagogues have accomplished all they want, because they know that no one can keep Daniel from sending petitions before God for thirty days.

So far from being afraid, Daniel goes on with his supplications three times a day, and is found on his housetop making prayer. He is caught in the act. He is condemned to be devoured by the lions. Rough executioners of the law seize him and hasten him to the cavern. I hear the growl of the wild beasts, and I see them pawing the dust, and as they put their mouths to the ground the solid earth quakes with their bellying. I see their eyes roll, and I almost hear the fiery eyeballs snap in the darkness. These monsters approach Daniel. They have an appetite keen with hunger. With one stroke of their paw or one snatch of their teeth, they may leave him dead at the bottom of the cavern. But what a strange welcome Daniel receives from these hungry monsters. They fawn around him, they lick his hand, they bury his feet in their long mane. That night he has calm sleep with his head pillowed on the warm necks of the tamed lions.

But not so well does Darius the king sleep. He loves Daniel, and hates this stratagem by which he has been condemned. All night long the king walks the floor. He cannot sleep. At the least sound he starts and his flesh creeps with horror. He is impatient for the dawning of the morning. At the first streak of the daylight Darius hastens forth to see the fate of Daniel. The heavy palace doors open and clang shut long before the people of the city waken. Darius goes to the den of lions; he looks in. All is silent. His heart stops. He feels that the very worst has happened; but gathering all his strength he shouts through the rifts of the rock, "O Daniel! is the God whom thou servest continually able to deliver thee?" There comes rolling up from the deep darkness a voice which says: "O king! live forever. My God has sent His angel to shut the lions' mouths that they have not hurt me."

Then Daniel is brought out from the den. The demagogues are hurled into it, and no sooner have they struck the bottom of the den than their flesh was rent, and their bones cracked, and their blood spurted through the rifts of the rock, and as the lions make the rocks tremble with their roar, they announce to all ages that while God will defend His people, the way of the ungodly shall perish.

The Crime of Success.

Learn first from this subject that the greatest crime that you can commit in the eyes of many is the crime of success. What had Daniel done that he should be flung to the lions? He got to be Prime Minister. They could not forgive him for that, and behold in that a touch of unsanctified human nature as seen in all ages of the world. So long as you are pinched in poverty, so long as you are running the gauntlet between landlord and tax-gatherer, so long as you find it hard work to educate your children, there are people who will say, "Poor man, I am sorry for him; he ought to succeed, poor man!"

But after a while the tide turns in your favor. That was a profitable investment you made. You bought at just the right time. Fortune becomes good-humored and smiles upon you. Now you are being in some department successful, your success chills some one. Those men who used to sympathize with you stand along the street, and they scowl at you from under the rim of their hats. You have more money or more influence than they have, and you ought to bescowl at from under the rim of their hats. You catch a word or two as you passed by them. "Stuck up," says one. "Got it dishonestly," says another. "Will burst soon," says a third. Every stone in your new house is laid on their hearts. Your horses' hoofs went over their nerves.

Every item of your success has been to them an item of discomfort and despair. Just as soon as in any respect you rise above your fellows, if you are more virtuous, if you are more wise, if you are more influential, you cast a shadow on the prospect of others. The road to honor and success is within reach of the enemy's guns. Jealousy says: "Stay down, or I'll knock you down." "I do not like you," said the snowflake to the snowbird. "Why don't you like me?" said the snowbird. "Oh!" said the snowflake, "you are going up and I am coming down." Young merchants, young lawyers, young doctors, young mechanics, young artists, young farmers, at certain times there were those to sympathize with you, but now that you are becoming master of your particular occupation or profession, how is it now, young lawyers, young doctors, young artists, young farmers—how is it now? The greatest crime that you can commit is the crime of success.

Decision of Character.

Again: My subject impresses me with the value of decision of character in any department. Daniel knew that if he continued his adherence to the religion of the Lord he would be hurled to the lions, but having set his compass well, he sailed right on.

For the lack of that element of decision of character, so eminent in Daniel, many men are ruined for this world, and ruined for the world to come. A great many at forty years of age are not settled in any respect, because they have not been able to make up their mind. Perhaps they will go West. Perhaps they will go East. Perhaps they will not. Perhaps they will go North. Perhaps they may go South. Perhaps they will not. Perhaps they may make that investment in real estate or in railroads. Perhaps they will not. They are like a steamer that should go out of New York harbor, starting for Glasgow, and the next day she change for Havre de Grace, and the next Charleston, and the next for Boston, and next for Liverpool. These men on the sea life everlastingly tacking ship and making headway. Or they are like a man who start build a house in the Corinthian style, changes it to Doric, and then completes it in Ionic, and is cursed by all styles of architect.

Start Right and Keep On.

Have decision of character. Character is like goldfinch of Tonquin: it is magnificent in standing firm, but loses all its beauty in flight. How much decision of character in order these young men may be Christians! Their associates make sarcastic flings at them. They go on excursions and they do not invite them. They prophesy that he will give out. They wonder if he is not getting wings. As he passes, they grimace, and wink, and chuck and say, "There goes a saint."

O young man! have decision of character. You can afford in this matter of religion to be laughed at. What do you care for the scoff of these men, who are affronted because you do not go to ruin with them? When the ground cracks open under their feet, and grimacing sengers push them into it, and eternity comes down hard upon their spirit, and consciences stings, and hopeless ruin lifts them up to throw them down, will they laugh then?

Religion in Business.

I learn also from my subject that men take religion into their worldly business. Daniel had enough work to do to occupy six days. All the affairs of state were in his hands—questions of finance, questions of war, of peace, all the national questions were for his settlement of adjustment. He must have had a correspondence vast beyond all computation. There was no man in all the earth who had more to do than Daniel, the Secretary of State, and yet we find him three times a day bowing before God in prayer. There are men in our day who are not a hundredth part of Daniel's engagemen who say they are too busy to be religious. They have an idea somehow that religion will interfere with their worldly occupation, that it will trip up the accountant's pen, or dull the carpenter's plane, or confuse the lawyer's brief, or disarrange the merchant's store-shelf.

They think religion is impertinent. They would like to have it very well seated in its place in church on the Sabbath, to find its place in the psalm book, or to nudge them awake when they get sleepy under the dictation of discourse; or they would like to leave it on a pew on Sabbath evening, as they go out closing the door, saying, "Good-night to religion; I'll be next Sunday. But to have religion go right along by the way through life, to have religion shoulder over the shoulder view they are making a bargain, to have religion take a bag of dishonest gold and shake it, and say: 'Ha! where did you get that?' They think that is an impertinent religion. They would like to have a religion to help them when they are sick, and when the shadow of death comes over them they would like to have religion as a sort of night-key with which to open the door of heaven; but religion under other circumstances they take to be an impertinent. Now, my friends, religion never robbed a man of a dollar. Other things being equal, a man will build a better wall, a cabinet-maker will make a better chair, a plumber will make a better pipe, a lawyer will make a better plea, a merchant will sell a better bill of goods.

say other things being equal. Of course religion gives a man a new heart, it does propose to give him a new head, or to intellectualize him, or to change a man's condition when his ordinary state is an overthrow of philosophical theory that a total vacuum is possible; but the more letters you have to te, the more burdens you have to carry, the more miles you have to travel, the more burdens have to lift, the more engagements you have to meet, the more disputes you have to settle, the more opportunity you have of being a Christian.

If you have a thousand irons in the fire, you have a thousand more opportunities of serving than if you had only one iron in the fire. So busy as Christ? And yet who a millionth as holy? The busiest men the best men. The persons converted in Scripture busy at time of their being converted. Matthew tending to his custom-house duties; the prodigal Son feeding swine; Lydia selling purple; Simon Peter hauling in the net from the sea; Saul spurring his horse toward Damascus, running down on his law business. Busy! busy! busy! with all the affairs of state weighing down upon his soul, and yet three times a day shipping the God of heaven.

Religion in Politics.

Again: I learn from this subject that a man may take religion into his politics. Daniel had the affairs of state on hand, yet a Christian. He could not have kept his elevated position unless he had been a thorough politician; and all the thrusts of officials and all the anger of disgrace did not make him yield a iota of his high-toned religious principle. He stood before that age, he stands before all ages, a specimen of a Christian politician.

So there have been in our day and in the days of our fathers men as eminent in the service of God as they have been eminent in the service of the state. Such was Benjamin F. Butler, Attorney-General of New York in the time of your fathers. Such was John McLean, of Ohio. Such was George Briggs, of Massachusetts. Such was Theodore Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey. Faithful to the state, at the same time faithful to God.

It is absurd to expect that men who have been immersed in political wickedness for thirty or forty years shall come to reformation; and our hope is in the young men who are coming up, at they have patriotic principle and Christian principle side by side when they come to the ballot-box and cast their first vote, and that they may bear allegiance to the government of heaven as well as to the government of the United States. We would have Bunker Hill mean less than Calvary, and Lexington mean less than Bethlehem.

The Rescue of the Ballot Box.

But because there are bad men around the ballot-box is no reason why Christian men should retreat from the arena. The last time you ought to give up your child or forsake your child is when it is surrounded by a company of hooters; and the last time to surrender the ballot-box is when it is surrounded by impurity and dishonesty and all sorts of wickedness.

Daniel stood on a most unpopular platform. He stood firmly, though the demagogues of the day hissed at him and tried to overthrow him. We must carry our religion into our politics. But there are a great many men who are in favor of taking religion into national politics who do not see the importance of taking it into city politics; as though a man were intelligent about the welfare of his neighborhood, and had no concern about his own home.

Religion would drive out all base personalities from politics. You have a right to discuss men's politics and denounce their political sentiments, or receive them, as you will; but you have no right to assail their private character, as is done every autumn. That is not carrying religion into politics. Now you can always tell without asking, in any contest, what candidate will vote for. It is always for the man who is most badgered, and most abused, and most spit upon, and most howled at. You have a right to contest a man's political sentiments; you have no right for base political purposes to assail his private moral character.

My subject also impresses me with the fact that lions cannot hurt a good man. No man ever got into worse company than Daniel got into when he was thrown into the den. What a rare morsel that fair young man would have been for the hungry monsters! If they had plunged at him he could not have climbed into a niche beyond the reach of their paw or the snatch of their tooth. They came pleased all around about him, as a hunter's hounds at the well-known whistle come bounding to his feet.

You need not go to Numidia to get among lions. You all have had them after you—the lion of financial distress, the lion of sickness, the lion of persecution. You saw that lion of financial panic putting his mouth down to the earth, and he roared until all the banks and all the insurance companies quaked. With his nostril he scattered the ashes on the domestic hearth. You have had trial after trial, misfortune after misfortune, lion after lion; and yet they have never hurt you if you put your trust in God, and they never will hurt you. They did not hurt Daniel and they cannot hurt you.

The Persians used to think that spring rain falling into sea-shells would turn into pearls; and I have to tell you that the tears of sorrow turn into precious gems when they drop into God's bottle. You need be afraid of nothing, putting your trust in God. Even death, that monster lion whose den is the world's sepulchre, and who puts his paw down amid thousands of millions of the dead, cannot affright you.

When in olden times a man was to get the honors of knighthood, he was compelled to go fully armed the night before, among the tombs of the dead, carrying a sort of spear, and then when the day broke he would come forth, and amid the sound of cornet and great parade, he would get the honors of knighthood. And so it will be with the Christian in the night before heaven, as fully armed with spear and helmet of salvation, he will wait and watch through the darkness until the morning dawns, and then he will take the honors of heaven amid that great throng with snowy robes, streaming over seas of sapphire.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

A PRAYER IN A HOSPITAL.

In the operating room of a large hospital in Glasgow, Scotland, one day last month, lay a little boy waiting to undergo a critical operation which might prolong his life, but would more probably terminate it. Near the operating table, on which he lay, was another table where the surgeon's knives were set out ready to his hand. Around were all the students connected with the hospital, eager to see the famous surgeon perform his difficult task. While they were waiting, the boy spoke.

"Wud one of you gentlemen," he said, looking at the students, "say a prayer for a wee boy that's in pain and fear?"

No one responded, and the child—he was only twelve years old—seemed disappointed. The surgeon patted him on the head, called him a brave boy and told him he hoped the operation would set him up and make a strong boy of him. But the boy wanted a prayer and he asked again for it; but no one answered. He seemed quite distressed and finally, in simple words and clear tone, he prayed himself. Would Jesus, who let wee boys come to Him on earth, have pity on him, help him to go through this time of trial, make him well again, or, if not, take him to heaven? "Thy will be done," said the child simply, and then signed to the attendant, with the chloroform, that he was ready.

The surgeon, who relates the incident, says that when the boy was unconscious, the coolness and calmness and delicacy of touch necessary for the success of an operation so difficult were lacking. The boy's prayer had touched him and there was a lump in his throat and a dew on his eyes. But he began, and it seemed as if the boy's prayer for himself had included some one else; for the operation was performed with unusual ease and dexterity.

On the next morning when the surgeon came to the child's bed, he saw by the placid comfortable look on the little wasted face, that the operation had been a success and the boy would live. He bent over him and whispered "Jesus heard your prayer yesterday." A bright look came over the child's face and, looking up at the surgeon, he said, "I kent He wud." And then he added, "You, doctor, were gude to me, too. But "he continued, evidently longing to show his gratitude, "but I hae naething to gie you." And then a bright thought came into his mind, and with a little cheer in his tone he added, "I will pray to Jesus for you, doctor."

A PERSIAN EVANGELIST.

In a communication to The Church at Home and Abroad a sketch, from which the following is an extract, is given by Rev. S. G. Wilson, a notable convert, from Mohammedanism, who has shown steadfastness in persecution:

A remarkable man, a convert from Islam and an evangelist, has fallen asleep. He died far from the companionship of Christian brethren, and burial was denied his body for several days by the Mohammedans, who regarded him as unclean. He was an open professor of Christ, braving the danger of the death penalty. His baptism was known. His lips made frequent acknowledgment of the Lord Jesus. He was called the "Armenian Sayid," the former pointing him out as a renegade from Islam, the latter having been his title as a descendant of Mohammed. He was also of the line of Sufavean kings. His mind was not at rest in Shiahism nor the doctrines of the Dervishes. One day in the house of an official, he saw a book on a shelf covered with dust. He asked what it was, and learning that it was an "Enjeel" (gospel), borrowed and read it. Afterwards he asked some Armenian artisans from whom he could inquire about this book. They referred him to Pastor Mosha, of Maragha, by whom he was instructed in the truth. He embraced the gospel of Christ, and soon began to proclaim it.

His knowledge of the gospels was remarkable, and his use of the story and words of Jesus very ready. His zeal was great. He would go into the bazaars on Sunday and persuade the Armenians to shut up their shops and come to prayers. He made many journeys in the Mussul-villages, riding on a donkey, with a great coat of sheepskin (with the wool turned inside) for protection from cold or rain, and as a covering at night. Sometimes Nestorian or Armenian evangelists accompanied him, and they bore unanimous testimony to his courage and zeal, and at times they would restrain him lest the fanaticism of the people might impel them to personal violence. Once when he spoke of Rab Esa (the Lord Jesus) his brother slapped him on the face and knocked out two teeth, saying, "You dare call Jesus Lord, do you?"

In his recent death a useful career has been cut short. Though not permitted to gather a full harvest, the influence of his life and words has not been in vain and will yet bear fruit. To us he is an inspiration of faith to believe that hundreds such as he will forsake Islam for the truth.

BELLA COOKE'S LIFE WORK.

HOW A CONFIRMED INVALID, BY GOD'S GRACE, BECAME A SUCCESSFUL CITY MISSIONARY.

Thirty-five Years Confined to Her Bed, Yet an Active Worker in the Lord's Vineyard—Penniless Herself, She Feeds the Poor—A Spiritual Mother to Hundreds—Millionaires' Wives, Clergymen and the Poor of the Tenements Meet at Her Bedside—An Experience that Should Stimulate Christians Everywhere.

GOD in His wisdom, some times chooses the humblest instruments to carry out His purposes. It is not always the man or woman who has been highly educated or delicately reared that is sent to deliver the message of salvation to the world. Very many of the noblest servants of the Master have been those whose position and opportunities in life were of the humblest sort; yet He takes them and filling their hearts with His grace and touching their lips, as He touched those of the prophets of old, they are strengthened to do battle with sin, and made eloquent to draw wandering souls to the foot of the Cross.

One of the richest women in America to-day is Bella Cooke. It is true, she doesn't live in a splendid mansion on Fifth Avenue, nor does she take an outing in a coach, attended by footmen in livery and with richly caparisoned horses to draw her through the streets. She owns neither houses nor lands, and there is probably not a banker in New York who knows her by name. She lives in a very modest, little brick house, in the rear of No. 492 Second Avenue, and indeed, only occupies a part of it. Not a very striking or imposing residence for a rich lady, you will say. Yet there are hundreds of people who count their wealth by the millions, who would gladly exchange possessions with Bella Cooke, the story of whose life, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day, shows how "The poor and needy of earth are rich

In the perfect love of God."

Bella Cooke was born in Hull, England, in 1821, her father being John Beeton and her mother Elizabeth Smawfield. Both parents were devoted followers of Christ, and they were very happy in their married life. Bella at the age of nine began to be troubled about the state of her soul. It was the rule, in her father's house, to have family service regularly on Sunday evenings, and at the household altar, by the example of those godly parents, she and her sister Hannah both experienced the awakening of the spirit. Her first gleams of Christ's free salvation came to her after several weeks of worshipping at a little Methodist Chapel, in Norfolk Street, Sheffield; but it was not till the spring of 1834 that she really saw the light that has since been her Guide and Comforter, amid all her trials and sorrows.

When she was about seventeen years old, Bella began to take an active share in the work of the Master. She still recalls with deep interest those early experiences, when she undertook home missionary work her district being a place known as "The Isle," a vicious quarter, very much like the old Five Points of New York. She continued this work until failing health warned her to seek change of air and she went to Hull, where she became acquainted with a young man who was preparing to go as a missionary to New Zealand. Nothing would have pleased her more than to adopt the work of a foreign missionary; but the plan was frustrated by sickness, for her spine began to trouble her alarmingly, and to give the first symptoms of the disease that afterwards made her a life prisoner.

It was about this time that she met Mr. Cooke, who afterwards became her husband. He visited at her sister's and told the latter that, some time before, he had dreamed that Bella was to be his wife. Now he saw her for the first time, and she was identical with the woman he had seen in his dream. They were married in Sheffield, and one of the first stipulations of her husband, and to which she gladly assented, was that their house should be the "Preachers' Home," whenever the men of God came that way. Their wedded life was an exceedingly happy one, and several children were born to them.

Sometime after this, her husband's property was dissipated by the dishonesty of other men, and misfortunes came rapidly upon the little household. In 1847, on account of repeated losses in business, they came to New York. On the evening of their first day in the New World, the young wife and her husband were found worshipping in the Rose Hill Methodist Church. "We were hungry for God's meat and drink," she said, "and it was as balm to our tempest-tossed souls." They joined the church in full membership the following week. Poverty continued to oppress them, but with added misfortunes came an increase in spirituality. It seemed as though God were pouring out His riches in their hearts in proportion as the world denied its favors.

Fell a Victim to the Plague

after a few hours' illness. The widow, left with several small children, one born shortly after her husband's demise, was now in sore straits, yet her confidence in her heavenly Father never faltered. Her old spinal trouble aggravated by all the sufferings she had undergone, again began to assert itself. She had meanwhile removed to New York, where kind friends helped to care for her little ones, the mother heroically striving not only to attend to her household, but to do what she could to mitigate the sufferings of others. For several hours daily she visited among the poor patients in Bellevue Hospital, and in the tenements along First Avenue from 28th Street, and along Third Avenue and other sections of the populous East side. Charitably disposed persons supplied the means to carry on this voluntary mission among the poor, sending her both clothing and money. Summer and winter she went in and out among the swarming tenements like a ministering angel. At last the burdened body gave way and in 1885 Bella Cooke took to her bed, having been pronounced incurable by the doctors. The spinal disease gave her hardly a moment's freedom from pain. Then began an experience that gave to the world

"A Humble Heroine of the Cross."

Racked day and night by keen physical suffering, she yet determined to persevere in the good work she had begun. In her little room she gathered around her many of the most godly men and women in New York, who found there a ray of God's own sunshine even on the gloomiest day, for Mrs. Cooke is one of the cheeriest of Christians. Many clergymen and laymen have loved to meet there and have declared that the Spirit of the Lord was in that little room, and that they always went forth stronger for the duties of life after calling there. The influence of the association of that upper room went out over the whole of Manhattan Island and proved a blessing to thousands. The imprisoned invalid became not only a missionary and a comforter, but a material benefactor as well. To the 27th Street Methodist Church of which she has been a member 43 years, she has given liberally, on one occasion contributing $100 from her own slender means. Her "poor list" is as large as that of many a successful church and is as faithfully supplied. Among those ladies who loved to help her in this work were Mrs. A. G. Phelps, Mrs. Stokes, Miss Phelps, Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Newman, Mrs. Delamater, Mrs. Onativia, Mrs. Clarkson, Mrs. W. E. Dodge, Mrs. Jaffray, Mrs. Murray, and Mrs. Hunting, and she has been visited at times by Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Sherman, Mrs. Field, Mrs. Stillman, Mrs. Stuyvesant, Miss Hamersly, Mrs. F. W. Vanderbilt, Miss Schiefflin and many others whose names are well known in the world of society, yet who gladly gave a helping hand to the deserving poor and who made the calm-faced, patient woman in the little rear house, the distributor of their secret charities.

Mrs. Cooke, after thirty-five years of confinement, grows old very gracefully, lying in her sick-chamber, surrounded by Christian friends, beautiful pictures and fragrant flowers. Her writing desk is swung from the wall, so that when she sits up in bed she can attend to her correspondence, for she has quite as large a daily mail as many business men. The two the carpets are bright and warm in color, the book cases are full of volumes that tell of the love of a Savior who has done so much for the invalid, the whole apartment has an air of inviting cheerfulness, and its occupant's heart is filled to overflowing with gratitude to God. This feeling frequently finds expression in song, one of her favorites being the following:

"Shut in," did you say, my sisters?
Oh, no; only led away
Out of the dust and turmoil—
The burden and heat of the day—
Into the cool green pastures,
By the waters calm and still,
Where I may lie down in quiet
And yield to my Father's will.

Earth's ministering ones come round me
With faces kind and sweet;
And we sit and learn together
At the loving Savior's feet.
And we talk of life's holy duties,
Of the crosses that lie in the way;
And they must go out and do them,
While I lie still and pray."

Many a time during her long years of illness she has been at death's door, or as she herself expresses it, "very near home." "Ah, sister," remarked her physician, one morning on greeting her after a night which he had not expected her to survive, "those feet have

A Hard Time Getting Over Jordan."

"Yes," came back the cheery reply from the bed, "and I see you try to keep them back as long as you can." "Why, Mother Cooke," cries a young man, on seeing her after long years of absence, "I thought you had gone home long ago." There were times, too, when the life seemed to have fled forever, and when the poor pain-racked frame was very still. Then she would get a glimpse of the Celestial City and the heavenly ecstasy would almost begin, when God, for his own wise purposes, would bring her back to earth again.

Never a moment idle, and amid all so happy and light-hearted that one cannot help thinking some of the sunshine of childhood has remained to gild her later years, Bella Cooke's life is a beautiful illustration of the perfect faith of the true believer and the joy that comes from complete surrender to Christ. When seen by a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few days ago, she was bright and cheerful. The sun shone through her curtained windows and illuminated the room with a soft radiance, touching here and there the mosaic of paintings and making still whiter the spotless drapery.

"Lonely," echoed the patient woman, who sat propped up by pillows, and who had been busily writing as we entered, "oh, no. I have every year, and they keep me busy. Just now in summer, I have my tea-parties at which my guests are all old ladies, over sixty years of age and a few much older. After a nice tea we have singing, experiences and prayer. About twelve or thirteen are present at each of these parties. There is no room here for more, you see. Then there are other summer duties in which I engage. For several years I have sent a number of poor children to the country, some of them for one or two weeks, according to their needs. I send them to places in New Jersey and Connecticut. Besides this, I send during the season quite a number of women with babies on day trips to Rockaway, Bedloe's Island, Glen Island and other places; I suppose I have sent well on to 1,000 this summer. Of course," she added humbly, "this is all done with money that is given to me for these purposes."

3,000 Persons Call Upon Me

"Does the work close with the summer then?"

"Oh, no," replied Mrs. Cooke, "the autumn is even busier for me. Last Thanksgiving I served 210 poor families with turkeys and chickens and bright beads for the little ones. It was the same on the previous Thanksgiving. Each of the children got a necklace, and everybody got a text of Scripture suitable for the occasion. Then, when Christmas comes," she continued, smiling, "my poor are with me in force. Last Christmas eighty of the most needy families got a basket of provisions each, and about 250 children were delighted by receiving toys, oranges and candies. Besides these, 550 garments were distributed."

"Where do your poor live?"
 "All over the city. And when they, as well as the rich who make it possible for me to do these things, are here, they seem to fulfil the words of Scripture, 'the rich and the poor meet together.' And the blessing of it is that many of them assure me that in this room they have met Christ. Many call me their spiritual father, and say that I, through God's blessing, have led them to the Saviour. The Lord has blessed us wonderfully and fed us on the richainties of His love. 'I will extol thee, O God our King, and praise thee forever,'" she exclaimed, rapturously.

"When the physicians have given me up for dead, I have Heard the Master Saying: 'Not Yet,' and I wait His blessed time. This has happened many times. My present physician is a Christian man who has attended me many years without charge. He has been astounded because I have lived after he has many times left me, saying that a few hours would tell the tale. But it is a Higher Power that keeps me alive, and that has done so all these years."

"Always working, always praying, always giving," is the watchword of this daughter of the Lord, who, after thirty-five years of unceasing labor and affliction, still finds so much pleasure in His service. Surely her life is a lesson for Christians everywhere. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has embalmed her memory while she is yet with us, as a fitting example for its readers to emulate, each in his or her own station, and according to the opportunities God has given them.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Right of Eminent Domain is to be Exercised by the United States Government over one land near Baltimore, Md., if the consent of the law courts can be obtained. On a dangerous headland called Hawkins Point, near Baltimore, stands a lighthouse. Between the lighthouse and the water is a strip of land on which grow some very fine trees. It appears that they are now so high that their upper branches wave in front of the lantern in the lighthouse. Complaints of late have been made to the Collector of the Port by sea captains, that, since the summer months have clothed the trees with dense foliage, it is difficult to see the light at all from the sea, and consequently the lighthouse is practically useless. The Captain of the Engineer Corps in charge of the lighthouse district has asked the owner of the land to allow him to cut the tops of the trees, but he declines. He is willing, however, to sell the land for $75,000. This sum is said to be far more than the land is worth, and an effort is, therefore, being made to acquire it by process of law. An application has been made to the courts to have the land condemned, on the ground that this is a case in which the Government may justly exercise the right of eminent domain; that is, the power to take possession, after paying adequate compensation to the owner, of any land needed by the public. The case cannot be tried for two months, and in the meantime, vessels entering the port of Baltimore will not have the full benefit of the warning light from the lighthouse. Voyagers on the ocean of life are similarly deprived of one light which God meant them to have. Many obstructions interpose between them and those to whom Christ said "Ye are the light of the world." Arrogant criticism, sceptical suggestions, and the inconsistencies of Christians themselves obstruct the light now; but the light is coming when He, whose is the supreme right of eminent domain, will come suddenly to remove all that offends, as He drove the money changers from his Father's house when He was on earth. (1. Peter 4: 17.)

A Railroad was Blocked by Bees in Pennsylvania a few days ago. A press dispatch from Phoenixville states that during the run from Perkiomen Junction to Allentown a train stopped at Palm station to take water. The engineer left the cab for a moment and the fireman was attending to the water hose when a swarm of bees from a neighboring farm alighted on the tender behind the engine. The fireman did not observe them and when he returned to the tender a hundred bees set upon him. Half mad with pain he jumped off and rolled wildly in the grass at the roadside. The engineer, the conductor and the other trainmen looked on in dismay. The schedule time for starting the train came and went and still the train stood, for the engineer dare not enter the cab. A consultation was held to discuss the problem, at which some one suggested that a stream of water from the hose should be turned on the bees. This was done and it had the desired effect. The bees flew away and the train started, but considerably behind its time. It is almost ludicrous that creatures so small and weak could cause a block on a great railroad, but other kinds of progress are often blocked by obstacles as insignificant. The little annoyances, little vexations, that are often called, though erroneously, "little sins" are those that hinder the Christian's progress in the divine life." (Cant. 2: 15.)

A Widower's Citation of a Legal Principle is described in the reminiscences of Peleg Johnson by the Hon. A. Payne. It seems that Mr. Johnson soon after the death of his first wife, made an offer of marriage to another lady. She said to him: "Mr. Johnson, my friends think that it is not proper for me to receive your attentions so soon after the death of your wife." To this suggestion he replied: "I have been a constable for more than thirty years, and during that time I have been in constant attendance upon the courts of this State, and I think I ought to know something about law, and I can tell you that when a woman has been dead and buried four months she is just as dead in the eye of the law as if she had been dead a year." The good lady was convinced by the argument though, it affected the question of legality, and not the objection as to propriety, which was the one she had raised. The principle, however, laid down by the suitor was sound, and it has its spiritual application. Christians are often kept from enjoying their full liberty and joy in Christ, by slavish subservency to the law, though the Apostle has declared that we are delivered from the law, that we "should be married to another even to Him who is raised from the dead that we should bring forth fruit unto God." (Rom. 7: 4, 6.)

Nine Years of Unjust Imprisonment have been endured by an innocent man in Germany. An application has been made to the German consul in New York for his assistance in righting a cruel wrong. Three citizens of Syracuse, N. Y., have placed in his hands affidavits of a death-bed confession, which has been made by a deceased acquaintance. They state that in 1885 a young German came to this country, married, and settled down in Syracuse. He was always gloomy and depressed, and finally became ill with a sickness which his physicians declared to have a mental rather than a physical cause. He grew worse, and though the best medical treatment was afforded him, it became clear that he could not recover. Then he unburdened his mind. He said that before coming to America he had murdered his step-brother in order to get possession of his property; that after his flight an innocent man had been arrested, tried for the crime, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for life. Almost immediately after making the confession, he died. Though every man would say that the guilty man's duty was to go back and pay the penalty of his crime, every one must realize that such a course required great moral courage and the temptation to let the innocent man go on suffering was a strong one to a callous mind. Yet how difficult it is to induce men who are under the sentence of eternal death to take advantage of the voluntary sacrifice of the Son of God who died in their place that they might be saved! (1. Peter 2: 24.)

An Inconclusive Proof of the Temperature of a church building was offered by a sexton's wife in Pennsylvania one winter morning. The sexton, who had charge of a little country church was sick and his wife undertook to attend to the fires. He gave her minute and explicit instructions as to the duties and was very particular about her not leaving the building on Sunday morning until the thermometer, hanging on a pillar in the centre of the church, registered seventy degrees. The man evidently distrusted her ability, and his wife was nettled by his want of confidence. However, she was anxious that he should not worry, so after the first heat of the church had reached the required degree she went home, and to relieve his mind, carried with her the thermometer, which she proudly exhibited in proof of her having succeeded in carrying out his instructions. She did not know, or had forgotten, that during her walk of a quarter of a mile in the frosty air the mercury would so fall that her husband could not learn from it the temperature of the church. If the spiritual temperature of the church had been in question the woman's method would not have been so absurd. A more reliable test of godliness of a church is furnished by the conduct of its members when they are outside its walls than when they are inside. (Ezek. 33: 31.)

The Movements of Two Distressed Birds interested a group of laborers on a farm a few days ago. In going over a field with a reaping machine, a young lark was injured. The men did not notice the bird and passed on, but, when they returned on the reaper to that part of the field, they saw it struggling. It was too badly injured to live, so they killed it and one of the men put it in his pocket. After they had passed, two larks, evidently the parents of the dead bird, were seen searching for their offspring and they continued the search for several hours. A curious feature of their quest was that they did not look for the bird where it was injured, but in the swath last mown, which, of course, was a different place after every passage of the reaper. The two birds had evidently identified the place in which they had last seen their offspring by its proximity to the standing grain. Even if it had been possible to make them understand their mistake, the knowledge of the truth could have brought them no comfort. But for human parents who have lost a child there is comfort, if instead of going to the grave, in the track of the reaper, "to weep there," they would look up to God with the confident faith of David when he said, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." (II. Samuel 12: 23.)

A Fatal Enemy of the House Fly is Described in a scientific journal. It states that the flies are subject to the attacks of a species of parasitic fungus which causes their death. The spores of the fungus, which are exceedingly minute, and are present in the air, are carried against the fly's body, and such as strike under its surface become adherent, when each spore sends out a long tubular projection, which penetrates the skin and enters the body. Once here, its host's doom is certain, for it meets with suitable nourishment in the fluids of the fly's body, by aid of which it will speedily propagate itself until its victim, drained of its life support, finally succumbs. Nor does the mischief end there. While the fly so afflicted lives, the threads attached to its body develop a head, containing the germs of other spores, which become detached and are wafted against the bodies of other flies who die in the same way. We see something like this in the moral and spiritual world. The vicious man is not only drained of his strength as his vices grow stronger, but he corrupts his fellows by association. (Prov. 4: 14-16.)

PARABLE OF THE POUNDS.

S. S. LESSON BY MRS. M. BAXTER FOR SEPT. 14.
LUKE 19 : 11-27; GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 19 : 26.

The Mistake of the Apostles—Their Ideas of the Kingdom—Expected a Material Kingdom—The Enlightenment at Pentecost—The King's Servants—Unconverted People Among the Citizens—The Charge to the Servants—The Nobleman's Return—The Judgment—Not the General Judgment—The Three Types.

THE hearts of the twelve apostles were set with determinate expectation on the promises of God that the kingdom and glory should return to the land of Israel, (Jer. 33 : 6-22;) they longed that Jerusalem should be again "a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth;" they yearned for the fulfilment of the prophecy, "they shall take them captive whose captives they were; and they shall rule over their oppressors," (Isa. 14 : 2.) The Lord Jesus had told them plainly and repeatedly of His coming sufferings, (Luke 18 : 31-33,) but "they understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things that were spoken." Even after the resurrection, and immediately before the ascension of our Lord, they asked, "Wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel." (Acts 1 : 6.) Thus, it is not surprising that the occasion of the parable was "because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear."

The Conceptions of the Apostles regarding Christ's mission were more consistent with the old than with the new dispensation; not yet filled with the Holy Ghost, earthly glory was still an object to them. Once filled with the Spirit, they understood "the things of the Spirit of God," (1. Cor. 2 : 12-14,) they could rejoice "that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name," (Acts 5 : 41,) they knew then that "we must, through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God," (Acts. 14 : 22.) Filled with the Spirit, Paul could say of bonds and afflictions, "none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself," (Acts 20 : 24,) and he could say of Jesus, "For whom I have suffered the loss of all things." (Phil. 3 : 8.) The disciples knew then with absolute certainty that there was reserved in heaven for them "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away," (1. Pet. 1 : 4.)

Great Responsibility, must accompany great privilege, and this is the teaching of our parable. Every one of us shall give account of himself to God, says the Bible (Rom. 14 : 12); and God teaches us to walk daily in the sense of our just accountability to Him. Jesus said, therefore, "a certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." We cannot too strongly bear in mind that the kingdom of our Lord "is not of this world," and that He said; "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." (John 18 : 36.) Man can neither set up, nor, with crude weapons defend Christ's kingdom, for it is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." (Rom. 14 : 17.)

"And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come." No man in his senses would trust the management of his money and his business affairs into the hands of people who were unknown to him, still less to those who were in a position of enmity; tried and trusted servants alone could be charged with such a responsibility. Thus, we cannot reckon the "servants" who are in charge with the master's goods, to be unconverted people; the only charge which such have is the message of reconciliation, by which they may some time or other, enter into His service. They are in the position of the citizens who "hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, we will not have this man to reign over us."

What then is our charge as servants? In what have we to occupy till our Lord comes? In everything. As redeemed, as blood-bought, we owe it to the Lord that our existence shall have no meaning but for Him, that our presence shall be His presence, our life His life, our words His words, our works His works. We owe to Him that everything we do shall be in charge for Him, every detail of our life pressed into His service as a means of glorifying Him. We owe it to Him that in every success He shall gain the credit, that in every difficulty He shall extricate us, that in every temptation He shall deliver us, that in every sorrow He shall comfort us, that in every sickness He shall heal us, in every perplexity counsel and guide us—we owe it to Him that our life in every particular shall furnish Him with one opportunity after another of manifesting His glory. Oh! to live every moment in the consciousness that we are in charge for God! This gives both a dignity and a sweetness to life, this makes seeming trifles and little annoyances worth the while :

I Am in Charge For God :

that which I suffer is for Him, that which I do is for Him; I eat, drink, walk, and sleep, not for my own indulgence, but for Him. My business, my house, my family, my society are all in charge for Him; He trusts me with these to occupy for Him, to take His place in these relations till He comes." It is just the losing sight of this responsibility, the having to do with "the things that are seen," instead of "the things which are not seen" (1 Cor. 4 : 18), which makes all the difficulty in the life of a child of God. If we are in charge for the Master, He does not leave us to bear the weight of that charge, but invites us to cast all our care upon Him, for He careth for us. (1. Pet. 5 : 7.)

When the nobleman "was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading." This is "the judgment seat of Christ," mentioned in II. Cor. 5 : 10; Matt. 16 : 27; Heb. 22 : 12, not the same as the judgment of the wicked which takes place after the millennium (Heb. 20 : 5, 11, 15,) where the question is as to whether their names are written in the Lamb's book of life; for these first are the known servants of the Master, and are regarded, not according to their faith, but according to the fruits which their faith has brought forth.

The first servant came, and gave in his account, but he spoke no word of his own faithfulness or energy. "Lord thy pound hath gained ten pounds." This servant had been enabled to the Master's goods which were in his hand. Reader, are there tenfold more living souls in the circle of your influence since you were converted? Is the standard of Christianity in your family or in your church tenfold higher since you knew the Lord, and were put in charge by Him? Is the standard of morality in business among Christians tenfold purer around you since God trusted you to represent Jesus as a man of business? If not, what has your trust produced? The nobleman "said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." Whether this authority over cities will take place in the regenerated earth, during the millennium, remains to be proved when Jesus comes: the redeemed sing in heaven, "We shall reign on earth." (Heb. 5 : 10.) "And the second came, saying, Lord, Thy pound hath gained five pounds." The result was less, no praise for faithfulness is awarded in this instance, but the reward is in just proportion: "Be thou also over five cities."

"And another came, saying, Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept (not lost) laid up in a napkin: for I feared thee, because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layest not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow." This was no stranger, but a servant who had been known and trusted by his master, but he saw that master through the colored glass of his own evil heart. Are there not many among those who have received forgiveness of sins, have been reconciled to God, who nevertheless know Him as a hard Master who think of Him only as exacting an impossible obedience, requiring a faithfulness which is beyond their power, and esteeming that to be a hard duty which to others is a precious charge. These are they who calculate with how little religion a man may get to heaven, who think it denial to give up worldly amusements for the Lord's sake, who hold to the point that they are saved through faith with the greatest tenacity, clinging to their pound, but never make use of it to win others, or to increase the kingdom of God on earth. They receive what they can get from God, but never yield themselves unto Him; these are the souls who try the love, and the patience of more faithful Christians: some are they are not converted at all, and certainly they are not converted from living to themselves; they believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and they claim to have everlasting life—but like Lot, they must in the end suffer loss.

The nobleman never denied that this man was a servant, he said, "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee; thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow, wherefore then, gavest not thou my money into the bank, that, at my coming, I might have required mine own with usury. And he said unto them that stood by, take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds." "Take from him the pound." This is awful, but this is the Word of Jesus. The servants who are not true to their trust must lose at the time of righteous retribution the grace of God which they have received in charge; but the faithful ones will receive that time an additional share. The enemies of Christ, however, who remain unbelieving, will have never come nigh unto Him, nor enter into His service, "Bring hither" He says, "and slay them before me."

A NATURAL LAW.

A Story of the Sunday-school Golden Text for September 14.

"For I say unto you, that unto every one that hath shall be given; and from him that hath not even that he hath shall be taken away from him." Luke 19 : 26.

"WELL, I wish I had Thompson's luck—that's all" said Rupert White as he sat with a dozen other boys were lounging in various attitudes in the common room of a large school. Examinations were over, and the names of the prize-winners had been announced, and on the next day the boys would be on the way in all directions to their homes.

"Luck, do you call it?" said a small thoughtful boy who was sitting on a chair on the other side of the room, leaning back with his hands clasped behind his head.

"I should have brains and industry rather than luck. Thompson deserves the scholarship better than any of us. Why, he is as far ahead as some of the men in college after their second year."

My brother has had a year at college and his Latin verses don't come near Thompson's."

"That's where the hardship comes in," White answered. "Thompson doesn't need any more education to make his way. Now if some of us could have a college course we should be well equipped, too. As it is, I have to go into my father's office to work with half an an education. He can't afford to send me to college. If I could have had the scholarship, I could have gone. Then I would have had a fair chance in life. Thompson is ahead now and he has no portunity of getting still farther ahead. It is to me advantages of this kind ought to be those who need them most."

"To him that hath shall be given," quoted a loose-limbed boy who was disentangling fishing lines, and was in the habit of listening quietly, and punctuating the conversation with some apposite quotation.

"Yes; that is the rule, I know," White said; "a hard one it is, and unfair, too."

"Why, what would you have, White?" asked the little boy who had spoken before. "The law is right, it's a natural law. Opportunities and advantages ought to go to those who can use them, and how do you know who will use them, but by finding out how they have used them? They have had already? Suppose there were two farms side by side, one well cultivated, kept, and bearing good crops and the other slovenly and half cultivated, would not the first be justified, if a third farm of better soil fell vacant and both tenants wanted it, in giving it to the man who had done best with his own farm? The other man might need it, for he would most likely be the poorer of the two, but the first is the right man for promotion. It's just the same everywhere. Here's David Marks, who lends us money when we are short. I daresay David does not get any money from his father than we do. But he takes care of it while we spend it. We don't let him pay him his little bits of interest when money comes, but it makes us poorer and richer all the time. I tell you it's a natural law, Socrates, I do not deny that, but it's a natural law for all that," White replied.

The bell rang for prayers and the boys filed into the chapel with others from the other schools and some of them felt sad as they realized that this was the end of the school-life with all its unpleasantnesses had, on the whole, been a happy life.

Rupert White went home next day and soon his ward was duly installed in his father's law office.

"Never mind, my son," his father said. "Rupert told him of his disappointment at getting the scholarship. Plenty of lawyers are waiting to the top without going to college. You will not have much work here at first. We can let you off early any day you like and you can read and study and come to me if you are in any difficulty. I can help you as well as a college professor." A kind, good-natured man was the old lawyer, never ambitious, but faithful in what he undertook and true as steel to his friends.

Rupert had an easy time in the office as his father had promised, but on the afternoons when he took off, he would go fishing, or to a base ball match, or to play a game of cards. He always meant to begin a course of reading, but never did begin it. So it came that when his father died and Rupert succeeded him, he was still but half equipped with legal knowledge and was glad to take the head clerk into partnership with him to make up for his own deficiencies.

The new arrangement was an easy one, but Rupert had only half the income under the partnership that his father enjoyed, and it vexed him, for he had drifted into a way of life in which a good income was needed. He was what is called a "good fellow," with many friends, and he was active in local politics. They were things about that time, and occupied a good deal of Rupert's attention. The head clerk, his partner, attended to the law business and Rupert was away making speeches, and organizing the campaign work. After a time, to Rupert's amazement and vexation, his partner proposed a dissolution of the partnership, and opened an office of his own in the town. After that, business dwindled. Most of the clients went to the new man who was always in his business, and was well up to his work. He was growing rich while Rupert was growing poorer year by year.

But a judge was to be elected and then Rupert's hopes brightened. He had so many friends that he felt sure of the nomination. He worked for that as he had never worked before. But in the convention a man of influence rose, and said he regretted to oppose his old friend, White, but it was necessary in the interest of the party. They all liked Mr. White but they must have a strong man for the head of the ticket with a good legal record. A little more of the same talk and Rupert saw his former partner nominated and afterwards elected. A man who did not need the salary, who was rich without it while it had been his last hope of saving himself from bankruptcy. "Yes," he said, "it is the old law 'to him that hath shall be given.'"

The disappointment and the accumulation of money troubles were too much for him and he fell sick. It seemed only a trifling illness at first, but after a few weeks the doctor looked grave, and said he did not know how things would go. He took occasion to hint to the clergyman that it might be well to visit Mr. White; he was in a bad way.

"I can't make out how you feel so sure of all these things," Rupert said to the clergyman after a long talk. "You seem to be as sure as if you had seen them. I have always been doubtful. It is true I have not paid much attention to religion, but I cannot see what basis you have for such confidence as yours."

"Ah, my dear sir," said the clergyman, "faith grows. It may be only small at first but like the grain of mustard seed, it becomes a strong tree as the years pass. But you must have the seed, the tree cannot come without that. When you have a little faith you gain more daily, you see farther, you become more confident and assured. God gives more grace. 'To him that hath shall be given.'"

"I know it," said Rupert, "I know that is the law of life in this world. I have seen it from my boyhood. I have never had anything, and I have nothing now either in this world or the next."

PREMILLENNIAL ADVENT.

The Optimistic View—How the World Might be Converted—A Hope from Past Triumphs and Present Energies—Discouragements to the View—Weakness of Normal Christianity—A Church Debilitated by Formalism—By Pride, Cupidity and Uncharitableness—The Social Obstacles Growing—The Sure Word of Prophecy.

BY REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL. B.*

WHEN we consider the Millennial Reign, when Christ's kingdom shall have fully and universally come, we naturally ask, by what means will this be accomplished. Many consider the means already in operation will suffice, only with a fuller outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and if the church prays more earnestly for a blessing on the ordinary means of grace and proclamation of the Gospel, the kingdom shall gradually extend until all shall know the Lord, "from the least into the greatest." Then, after a millennium of such reign of truth, Christ will come for the final judgment, to take His saints to His Kingdom in the heavens. Those who take this optimistic view say:

"Why should we doubt the efficiency of God's revealed Word to convince, convert and sanctify the soul? Why deem the power of the Holy Ghost insufficient to render that truth effectual? Have not the Word and the Spirit triumphed over the very worst forms of infidelity, selfishness and sin? Have not the most debased and degraded been raised to sit in heavenly places; the bitterest persecutors become the most zealous apostles; the most depraved and revolting sensualists and criminals been turned from darkness to light, and made new creatures in Christ Jesus? Agencies thus effectual in a thousand instances might be equally so in a thousand millions, with increased zeal and prayer for the Holy Ghost. There is surely much in the

of the Gospel and the present state of the church to encourage our hopes. Within the last fifty years into how many languages has the Bible been translated—in how many lands already have the idols been utterly abolished—how many tens of thousands, recently sunk in lowest barbarism, revelling in vice and bloodshed are now sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in their right mind! In our own land there were never so many faithful pastors, so many devout worshippers, so much evangelistic zeal. Christianity by its indirect influence has purified our social institutions, humanized our laws, broken the fetters of the slave, and mitigated the horrors of war. If the kingdom has made such advance during the last fifty years, what may not be hoped for it during the next five hundred?"

there are many who are discouraged. Present instrumentalities, they admit, suffice for the salvation of multitudes in all lands, but they ask: May we not look for something more in order to hasten the coming of the kingdom? After nearly nineteen centuries of witness-bearing, how small a part of the earth has the Church secured, even nominally, for Christ! Rejoicing in the great blessing that in late years has attended the circulation of the Scriptures and the preaching of the Gospel in heathen lands, we must lament the very small proportion of converts to the hundreds of millions utterly unreached by our missionaries. But let us look at Christendom. Can we think the kingdom of God has come in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Russia except in individual and exceptional cases? Are not superstition on the one hand, and atheism, on the other in the ascendant, rather than the Gospel? Have we not within our own time witnessed a series of wars between "Christian" nations, rivalling in slaughter those of Paganism? Are not millions of men under so-called Christian governments daily being trained for mutual slaughter, and the people oppressed to provide the cost of enormous armaments, even in times of peace? Do not frivolity and licentiousness run riot; and are not the stage and the press prostituted to the demoralization of the people? And how few and feeble are the counteracting influences!

Inadequate Agencies.

But, looking at home, we lament that with all our Christian agencies so long in operation, a vast portion of the population never even enter a place of worship, and of those who do the number is very small who even profess personal subjection to Christ. Is there not reason to fear that even in our own land the increase of conversions is less than that of the population, so that relatively as regards numbers, the kingdom is receding? And then again, from such professors, a large deduction must be made. Within the Church, do we see the kingdom supreme? Alas! How much looseness of doctrine, and inconsistency of conduct! Alas! How much ambition, pride, contention, jealousy! How often, in various ways, is God's house of prayer made a house of merchandise! How much flattery or fear of some, how much despising or patronising of others; how much outward show of undisguised indifference, how much formal ceremonial or dead informalism! How much sectarian exclusiveness, ecclesiastical assumption, intolerant judgment and want of charity! And if such things are to be lamented within the Church, which is the organized witness to the kingdom, can we be surprised at its slight influence on the world?

ALL ABOUT MERCY.

BENEDICT XIII. decreed that when the German Catholics met each other, they should always give the following salutation, the one first speaking, saying, "Praised be Jesus Christ," the other responding, "For ever, amen," a salutation as fit for Protestants whenever they come together. The word "mercy" is used in the Bible two hundred and fourteen times; it seems to be the favorite word of all the Scriptures. Sometimes it glances feebly upon us like dew in the starlight; then with bolder hand it seems to build an arched bridge from one storm-cloud of trouble to another; and then again it trickles like a fountain upon the thirst of the traveller. The finest roads I ever saw are in Switzerland; they are built by the government, and at very short intervals you come across water pouring out of the rocks. The government provides cups for men, and troughs for the animals to drink out of. And our King has so arranged it that on the highway we are travelling toward heaven, ever and anon there shall dash upon us the clear, sweet water that flows from the eternal Rock.

I propose to write some things about God's mercy. First, think of His pardoning mercy. The Gospel finds us shipwrecked; the wave beneath ready to swallow us, the storm above pelting us, our good works foundered, there is no such thing as getting ashore unhelped. The Gospel finds us incarcerated; of all those who have been in thick dungeon darkness, not one soul ever escaped by his own power. If a soul is delivered at all, it is because some one on the outside shall shove the bolt and swing open the door, and let the prisoner come out free. The sin of the soul is not, as some would seem to think, just a little dust on the knee or elbow that you can strike off in a moment and without any especial damage to you. Sin has utterly discomfited us; it has ransacked our entire nature; it has ruined us so completely that no human power can ever reconstruct us; but through the darkness of our prison gloom and through the storm there comes a voice from heaven, saying, "I will abundantly pardon."

Then think of His restraining mercy. I do not believe that it is possible for any man to tell his capacity for evil until he has been tested. There have been men who denounce all kinds of frauds, who scorned all mean transactions, who would have had you believe that it was impossible for them ever to be tempted to dishonesty, and yet they may be owing to-day the chief part of the stock in some fraudulent institution. There are men who once said they never could be tempted to intemperance. They had no mercy on the drunkard. They despised any man who became a victim of strong drink. Time passed on, and now they are the victims of the bottle, so far gone in their dissipation that it is almost impossible that they ever should be rescued. So there have been those who were very hard on all kinds of impurity, and who scoffed at unchastity, and who said that it was impossible that they should ever be led astray; but now they are in the house whose gates are the gates of hell! It is a very dangerous thing for a man to make a boast and say, "Such and such a sin I never could be tempted to commit." There are ten thousand hands of mercy holding us up; there are ten thousand hands of mercy holding us back, or we would long ago have gone over the precipice, and instead of being among the respected and the good, our song would have been that of the drunkard, or we would be "hail fellow well met" with the renegade and the profligate. Oh, the restraining mercy of God! Have you never celebrated it? Have you never rejoiced in it?

Think also of His guiding mercy. You have sometimes been on a journey, and come to where there were three roads—one ahead of you, one to the right and one to the left. It was a lonely place, and you had no one of whom to ask advice. You took the left-hand road, thinking that was the right one, but before night you found out your mistake, and yet your horse was too exhausted and you were too tired to retrace your steps, and the mistake you made was an irretrievable mistake. You come on in life, many a time, and find there are three or four or fifty roads, and which one of the fifty to take you do not know. Let me say that there are forty-nine chances out of fifty that you will take the wrong one, unless God directs you, since it is a great deal easier to do that which is wrong than that which is right, our nature being corrupt and depraved. Blessed be God! we have a directory! As a man lost on the mountains takes out his map and sees the right road marked down, and makes up his mind what to do, so the Lord, in His Gospel map, has said: "This is the way, walk ye in it." Blessed be God for His guiding mercy!

Think also of the comforting mercy of God. In the days when men lived five or six or seven hundred years, I suppose that troubles and misfortunes came to them at very great intervals. Life did not go so fast. There were not so many vicissitudes; there was not so much jostling. I suppose that now a man in forty years will have as many vexations and annoyances and hardships and trials and temptations as those antediluvians had in four hundred years. No one escapes. If you are not wounded in this side, you must be wounded in that. There are foes all around about you. There is no one who has come up to this moment without having been cleft of misfortunes, without having been disappointed and vexed and outraged and trampled on. The world comes and tries to solace us, but I think the most impotent thing on earth is human comfort when there is no Gospel mixed with it. It is a sham and an insult to a wounded spirit—all the comfort that this world can offer a man; but in his time of darkness and perplexity and bereavement and persecution and affliction, Christ comes to him with the solace of His Spirit, and He says: "Oh, thou tempted one, thou shalt not be tempted above that thou art able!" He tells the invalid, "There is a land where the inhabitants never say, 'I am sick.'" He says to the assaulted one, "You are no better than I am; they maltreated me, and the servant ought not to expect to have it easier than his Lord." He comes to the bereaved one and says: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." And if trouble be intricate, if there be so many horns to it, so many horns to it, so many hoofs to it, so many horns to it, so many hoofs to it, that he cannot take any of the other promises and comforts of God's word to his soul, he can take that other promise made for a man in the last emergency and when everything else fails, "All things will work together for good to those that love God." Oh, have you never sung of the comforting mercy of God?

Think also of His enthroning mercy. Notwithstanding there are so many comforts in Christ's Gospel, I do not think we could stand the assault and rebuff of the world forever. Blessed be God, this story of grief and trouble and perplexity will come to an end. There are twelve gates to heaven, and they are all gates of mercy. There are paths coming into all those gates, and they are all paths of mercy. There are bells that ring in the eternal towers, and they are all chimes of mercy. There are mansions prepared for us in the good land when we have done with earthly troubles, and all those mansions are mansions of mercy.

Can you not now strike upon your soul, saying, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, for thy pardoning mercy, for thy restraining mercy, for thy guiding mercy, for thy comforting mercy, for thy enthroning mercy?"

MINISTER'S SORE THROAT.

THIS disease, so prevalent, may in many cases be avoided by the observance of two or three rules. The drug-stores are full of troches, lozenges and compounds for speakers and singers. All these medicines have an important mission, but how much better it would be to avoid the ills than to spend one's time in trying to cure them! First of all, speak naturally. Let not incompetent elocutionists or the barbarisms of custom give you tones or enunciations at war with those that God implanted. Study the vocal instrument, and then play the best tune on it possible, do not try to make a flute sound like a trumpet, or a bagpipe do the work of a violin. Remember that the throat and lungs were no more intended to speak with than the whole body. When the vocal organs get red hot during a religious service, while the rest of the body does not sympathize with them, there will be inflammation, irritation and decay. But if the man shall, by appreciation of some great theme of time and eternity, go into it with all his body and soul, there will be an equalization of the whole physical organism, and bronchitis will not know whether to attack the speaker in his throat, right knee or left ankle, and while it is deciding at what point to make assault the speaker will go scot-free. The man who besieges an audience only with his throat attempts to take a castle with one gun, but he who comes at the work with head, hand, heart, feet, unlimbers against it a whole park of artillery. Then Sebastiano is sure to be taken.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Colonel Wheelock G. Veazey, the new Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, is one of the Interstate Commissioners. At the Milwaukee meeting of the G. R., a year ago, he was a much favored candidate for Commander and received the undivided support of the New England Posts. Colonel Veazey was born in New Hampshire, forty years ago, educated at the famous Exeter Academy, graduated at Dartmouth College and admitted to the bar in Vermont in 1860. When the war broke out, he went to the front with the Third Vermont Volunteers and soon became captain, rising rapidly to be Major and Lieutenant-Colonel. He afterwards became Colonel of the 16th Vermont, which took part in the famous Longstreet charge at Gettysburg. When war closed, he resumed the practice of law and was appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont in 1879. He is one of the most popular members of the G. A. R. and is a man of high executive abilities.

Emperor William's Friendly Intercourse With the Czar has failed utterly to induce that monarch to adopt the view of the young Kaiser in favor of a general withdrawal of troops by Germany, Austria and Russia from their respective frontiers. Nor is the Russian autocrat favorable to any European Congress with a view to the cessation of further armaments. The triple alliance, consisting of Germany, Austria and Italy, has failed to convince the Czar of the beauties of peace, and will now probably go on arming with more zest than ever. Italy is already beginning to stagger under the frightful burden of expense involved, and her associates are also feeling the tremendous financial draft, which, for the stubborn, militant attitude of Russia, has not been reduced to reasonable proportions.

The great Railroad Strike has Terminated triumphantly for the strikers, owing to the pathetic refusal of the other labor organizations to make common cause and join the movement. Some rather animated correspondence has passed between Master Workman Charles McPherson of the Knights of Labor, and Chief Engineer of the Brotherhood of Engineers, in which both leaders indulged in personal reprimand. Meanwhile the railroads are doing business without apparent inconvenience. The worst feature of the trouble is the number of men who have been thrown idle without any immediate prospect for re-employment, and many of whom will now be "blacklisted." More than three-quarters of a million dollars of wages have already been sacrificed. The Board of Arbitration will now discuss the strike.

Two Members of Congress Indulged in Fisticuffs by way of varying the monotony of the debate on the Conger Lard Bill on August 27, and created a pronounced sensation. During a general and rather heated altercation, in which Messrs. Cannon of Illinois, McAdoo of New Jersey, Enloe of Tennessee, Caruth of Kentucky, and others participated, the lie passed between Cannon and Mason of Illinois. While this was going on, Messrs. Wilson of Washington, and Smith of New Jersey, were indulging in similar remarks to each other, in a different part of the hall, and before anyone could interpose, Cannon suddenly planted a blow on Beckwith's forehead. The latter attempted to retaliate, when a score of members sprang to their feet and separated them. The tall Sergeant-at-Arms came down the aisle with the mace, and menaced the combatants with the outraged dignity of the House. Messrs. Cannon and Mason afterwards made statements to the House, designed to mollify the outraged propriety of that body, and the belligerents were seen shaking hands, so that the matter ended amicably. While it lasted, however, the hall was in wild uproar, and several ladies among the audience ran out in terror at the disgraceful scene.

Simultaneously with the news of the Reception to Dr. Peters, the German explorer, at Berlin, comes the intelligence of the organization of the Central African Company at London. This new British enterprise designs to explore the heart of the "Dark Continent,"—with a view to still further annexation of course,—in the country north of the Zambesi river, the Nyassa region and north to Lake Tanganyika, up to the verge of the German and Portuguese possessions on the East and the Congo on the West. This embraces all the territory assigned to England under the Anglo-German agreement and the present step shows that the British with their usual eye to quick commercial advantage, have lost not a moment in claiming their new possessions. Four large English companies are now engaged in opening up Central Africa for trading purposes, and British statesmanship looks forward to the day—not so very far distant—when the territory they have acquired there will be second only in attractiveness and commercial value to India itself.

Denmark is Preparing to Send Out Another expedition to Greenland. The Crown has voted 180,000 kronen, or about $50,000, for this purpose, and the vessel selected is now fitting out at Gotha. Lieutenant Ryder, of the Danish Navy, who has already had considerable experience as an explorer in Arctic latitudes, will be in command. It is expected that the expedition will be able to start in the spring, and will spend two years in Greenland. Dr. Nansen, another veteran explorer, is also fitting out an expedition under Swedish government auspices, with the view of penetrating to the Pole. He, too, will sail next spring. Lieutenant Ryder proposes to explore five hundred miles of unknown coast between 65 and 73 degrees, north latitude, and will take with him a party of nine persons. The plans of Captain Nansen have not been disclosed.

The Rumored Poisoning of Ismail Pasha, the ex-Khedive of Egypt by the secret order of the Sultan, if it be true, closes one of the most picturesque careers of the present century. Under Ismail's rule, Egypt was allowed to slip from the control of the Sultan as far as its revenues were concerned, and came under the sway of the money-lenders and bondholders of London and Paris. England secured the ascendancy in Egyptian affairs she had long desired. Ismail led a life of luxurious ease, and his riotous extravagance was the talk of the civilized world, rivalling that of the Sultan himself. At the same time, the former stagnation that had prevailed in Egyptian affairs was replaced by a general activity, and commerce increased everywhere, the profits, however, all going to foreigners. When Ismail was removed from the Khedivship, he is said to have taken with him a large fortune. He travelled much, and lived a great deal in Paris. Recently, according to the cable despatches, he was tempted to visit Constantinople, where he now seems to have fallen a victim to the familiar form of Turkish intrigue which has no scruple at removing an objectionable subject by poison or the bowstring. He is said to have taken with him to Turkey $10,000,000 in French and Italian securities and as the Sultan is continually in need of funds, it is quite probable that Ismail's wealth, no less than his political disfavor, had to do with his disappearance.

The Week has been a Notable one in Politics, and already State Conventions are being held in different parts of the country. In Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi, Michigan, and South Carolina, conventions were held and politics were at fever heat. In New York, the Grangers met and issued an address demanding a foreign market, and economy in State and national affairs. During the present month, a dozen or more other conventions will be held, and the new political factor, the Farmers' Alliance, will receive a good deal of attention on all hands, especially in the West, where it continues to make headway. It does not yet seem to be sufficiently crystallized however, to threaten the control of the older parties, and in some States no effort will be made to give it full scope until the Presidential year arrives. Its efforts this year will be mainly in the direction of securing representation in Congress and State legislatures.

There are Few Distinguished Foreigners Who, when they visit our shores, are accorded a more cordial and genuine welcome than the Count de Paris, who, it will be remembered, was here during the hottest part of the Civil War, a more than interested spectator. In announcing his intention of revisiting the United States he says: "I come as a former soldier of the Army of the Potomac, to see our battlefields and to see how my old friends are doing. Having been with the United States in some of the darkest hours of their history, it will be a pleasure for me to witness their present happiness and prosperity." The Count does not come as a princeling, but as a soldier who did good service to the Union, and whose old comrades will doubtless give him a right soldierly welcome. Few men are more admired in Europe than this grandson of Louis Philippe.

BRIEF NOTES.

The many friends of Henry Varley in this country will be glad to learn that his labors in New Zealand have been wonderfully blessed.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has promised to hold meetings at Oneonta, N. Y., early this month. The Opera House has been engaged for his use.

During the last ecclesiastical year St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, raised $100,000 for home and foreign missions and church work.

Rev. D. W. Waldron, of the Boston City Missionary Society, is invited by the Christian Endeavor Societies of Marion, Tremont, Wareham and Rochester, to furnish a hundred "fresh air" guests for these places.

The annual convention of the Christian Alliance of which Rev. A. B. Simpson of New York is President, is being held this week at Mountain Lake Park, Md. The sessions commenced August 20 and close September 7.

A native Siamese, who is a student of Williams College, has been supplying the pulpits of three Presbyterian churches in Michigan, during the summer. He preaches well, and his pastoral work is reported excellent.

Ira D. Sankey hoped to have assisted Dr. George F. Pentecost in his evangelistic mission to India, but is detained at home by unavoidable affairs. He has offered to pay the expenses of his friend, George C. Stebbins, if he will go in his stead.

Mr. George Muller, of the Bristol Orphanages, mentions gratefully that on one day of need in the Orphanage he received $25,000 from the United States. The cost of maintaining the orphans he now has in the institution is over $2,370 a week.

Mr. Frank De Witt Talmage, son of Dr. Talmage, addressed the farmers of Northampton at their county fair at Nazareth, near Easton, Pa., on August 23. He spoke on the race track before the grand stand, and held the attention of an audience of over 3,000 people for over an hour.

The Sing Sing camp meeting, conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison who was assisted by Rev. Stephen Merritt and other friends, was more than usually successful this year. Over six hundred Scandinavians were among those present on the ground and several of them were among the large number who at the closing meeting made public profession of faith.

It is reassuring to learn that the interests of the Protestant missionaries in Madagascar are protected by treaty. The British Premier, Lord Salisbury, has stated in Parliament that in consenting to the French Protectorate of the island an explicit stipulation was made by the British Government and agreed to by France that the missionaries should have the most perfect freedom for teaching and preaching.

Mr. D. L. Moody is about to establish a training school for female workers at Northfield "to meet the demand of women who earnestly desire larger service and better knowledge of the Word of God, and how to make practical use of it in home work." They will also receive instruction in dress-making and cooking, that they may be able to give practical help in their visits to the homes of the poor.

THE TRUE AND FALSE PEACE.

A NEW SERMON DELIVERED BY PASTOR
C. H. SPURGEON.

A Pearl of Price—Stormy Souls Loving Turmoil—I. The Devil's Peace—His Palace in the Heart—The Peace Merely Outward—Results from Thoughtlessness—From Superstition—From Unbelief—From Companionship—Often the Prelude of a Storm—II. The Lord's Peace—A Blessing in Itself—In Its Consequences—Comes Only from God—Undisturbed in Storm and in Death.

"When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace." Luke 11:21.

"The Lord will give strength unto His people; the Lord will bless His people with peace." Psalm 29:11.

PEACE is a condition of things greatly to be desired. To dread no outward disturbance, and to feel no inward storm—who does not desire such a state? Peace has been called a pearl; and rightly, for it is precious, and smiles with soft, mild radiance, bedecking the heart that wears it. It is, indeed, a pearl of great price: he that hath it hath more than riches. If his peace be, in very deed, the true pearl, he who wears it in his breast is one of the favored sons of God. There may be some few people in the world who love not peace; but we love not their spirit. Certain stormy natures delight in tempest, and, like sea-birds, ride on the crests of raging billows. Men of the Byron type are restless, and an atmosphere of peace suits them not. Their spirits, like thunderbolts, rush onward, finding pleasure in the crash with which they force their wilful way. I need not go out of my way for such; for in vain we speak to those who will not hear. The most of us were cast in another mould.

Peace and rest are two names for a flower which buds on earth, but is only found full-blown in heaven; yet even the faint perfume of the unopened blossom excites our strong desire. Gently doth the Saviour attract us to Himself by that sweet call: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Every precious thing in this world is sure to be counterfeited. Hence, while there is a peace more precious than the gold of Ophir, there is another peace which is worse than worthless. When a soul is borne up upon the waters of false peace, its case is hopeless till that peace is dried up, and the soul is stranded in self-despair. I thought this morning I might do you some service if I tried to set forth the two, the peace of the devil, and the peace of God.

I. First, there is

The Devil's Peace.

The foul spirit keeps things quiet in the heart over which he rules: "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace." The heart of man is not lawfully Satan's palace; but he has made it so by capture. In his pride he loves to dwell in the midst of this captured stronghold, that he may vaunt himself over the Most High, from whom he has taken the heart of His creature. Satan values a conquered human heart as a palace: he takes pleasure in domineering over the soul which he has forcibly rent away from God. That he may dwell securely, he covers himself with armor, and he keeps constant watch and ward. Hence the house is quiet, for his watchful power puts down every token of mutiny against his tyranny. I may be speaking to some here who are in good health, have a fair trade, and enjoy credit with their neighbors, and hence they have an earthly peace, and care nothing about being at peace with God. My design shall be to disturb that peace; for if it be the peace of the devil, the sooner it is broken the better for the soul.

This peace is often merely outward. Men put on the air of peace when they do not feel it in their hearts. You will often meet with irreligious men, who tell you that they are perfectly happy, and then ask—What do they want with Christ? They feel themselves all right; what need have they of a new birth? They are getting on so well without God's blessing that they do not care to seek it. Their laughter is loud, their jests are endless, their cares sit lightly upon them. They appear to have no anxiety for the faults of the past, the temptations of the present, or the recompenses of the future; and yet this peace is all external.

In all who have not come to Christ and found peace through His precious blood, their peace is false. Let them say what they will of it, it has no foundation or justification. They have no peace with God, for it is written, "There is no peace, saith my God to the wicked." A sinner may say, "I am at peace as to God"; but if this comes of forgetting or ignoring Him, it is a sorry sham. If a man has to forget God before he has peace, that fact betrays a fatal secret. If the man on remembering God, is troubled, then his peace is a mere writing on the sand. Such peace is false peace; and what true man will solace himself with that which is false? Better know that we are at war, if it be so, than dote upon a peace which is a fool's paradise, and Only Exists in Fancy.

With many, however, it is not so much ignorance as thoughtlessness. Multitudes of persons know, if they would know; but they make no use of their knowledge, for they never think. What a pity to perish forever from want of consideration! A man has a letter given to him: he puts it in his pocket, and does not open it. He goes out to-morrow for his day's pleasuring, and he promises himself that he will open the letter on Tuesday. Suppose in that letter there should be a warning of some plot against his life, or information of his mother being at the point of death, or of the sudden illness of a favorite child. What will he say to himself if he opens the letter too late? The Bible is to many a man God's unopened letter. Alas, how little do men search the Scriptures! Why will not men think? Thoughtlessness is one of Satan's great nets, in which he entangles many. If the devil can keep you from thinking, he will keep you from believing. If he can keep you in the giddy whirl of vicious pleasure, or even of idle levity, he can make sure of you. Possibly he can effect his purpose by getting you absorbed in politics, or parish matters, or science, or business. Little does he care which so long as he can draw you off from thinking of God, and of your soul, and of eternal things.

This peace, in many cases, is also the result of carnal security. Men say, "Well, well: we have not been much troubled yet, and why should we care? We have lived in sin and we have not suffered for it; in fact, we have prospered through our contempt of scruples." Of old men said, "Since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were"; and to day they cry, "No deluge of fire has broken out upon us. These Christians say that the earth and all the works of men will be burned up, and the very elements will melt with fervent heat; but we see no likelihood of it. In the heavens there is no cloud, no great white throne, no token of the judgment. Everything goes on calmly enough—why need we disturb ourselves?" Thus, like the sluggard in the Proverbs, they ask for a little more slumber. They are willingly ignorant, that once upon a time, in the olden days, it was so upon this earth; and men married, and were given in marriage, and ate, and drank, and were drunken; but as it was told them, so it happened; for the flood came and swept them all away. "When they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them." Beware, O men of this generation, lest this happen unto you also, and the deluge of fire be upon you before you have escaped to Christ, who alone is the ark of souls!

Some, again, have a peace that comes of superstition. "Well," say they, "we know that this is true which has been spoken, but it does not bear upon us. We are all right: we were made members of Christ, and children of God, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven in our infant baptism: we have been confirmed, and we have partaken of the holy communion, and have attended our church, or we have gone to our meeting-house with much regularity. Therefore we feel that for us there is a sure hope. O souls, beware of saying, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these." Join in the day when Solomon executed the vengeance of God against him, instead of confessing his fault, and seeking mercy, in the sanctuary, and therefore stood with hands upon the horns of the altar. The tidings came to the king, "He is by the altar;" but the stern sentence was given, "Fall upon him, and bury him;" and so he perished in the place where God's sacrifice was wont to be offered. So will you die if you do not trust the Lord Jesus, even though your hands should lie upon your baptism and your Lord's supper. No outward performance can enable you to dispense with repentance and faith. Alas! there is a peace which does not lie believing too much, but in believing too little. Unbelief brings false peace to thousands. Satan can persuade you that, after all, these things are not so; if he can lead you to disbelieve your Bible; if he can lead you to think that there is no God, or that, if there be a God, He takes no account of men, and will never come to judgment; then the arch-deceiver will make sure of you, and keep his goods in peace.

I fear that many are kept in peace through companionship. Hand joins in hand: the man would be troubled, but he meets his old friend who is a sceptic, and he laughs his fears out of him. The woman gets home, and talks with what she calls "her friends," who are as godless as herself, and she is by their tattle confirmed in her carelessness. O sirs, your friends cannot deliver you if you lose your souls through this.

Once more, dear friends, I say this—and may God make it come with power to some—peace caused by the devil is often of the last tremendous storm. One who subscribed to me the earthquake in the south of France, said, "That morning when we rose I never saw more lovely weather. Everything smiled deliciously across the blue Mediterranean, and the azure sky was without a cloud. Suddenly without a moment's warning, a tremor seized the earth, and there was a great cry from men and women in their fright." It usually happens, before tremendous convulsions of nature, that there is an ominous calm. You may have noticed, a few minutes before a storm, how awfully still everything becomes. The sea is motionless, the birds sit mute upon the bough, not a leaf is stirring, all is silent expectation. Deceive not yourself; with wings of flame the tempest is hurrying on, and while you speak it bursts upon you, casting all things into confusion and amazement.

II. Now we come to the second part of our discourse, upon which we hope to speak with far greater pleasure. The Psalmist says, "The Lord will bless his people with peace." He

The Lord's Peace.

I trust numbers of you are now enjoying it. A man of God lay dying, but he was very calm, yea, more—he was supremely happy. He lay in the house with cheerfulness. All who came to see him, knowing that he was about to die, he well knew himself, went away edified and comforted by the interview with this thrice-blessed man. One said to him, "Friend, how can you have such peace?" He answered, "I can see no ground or cause for it save that it is written, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee.'" Was not that a satisfactory reply? There is a weight of argument in it. If your mind is stayed on God, He will keep you in perfect peace.

Now, beloved, the peace that we should desire to possess is first of all, a peace which is a blessing; "The Lord will bless His people with peace." To have no quarrel with God, nor to have no difference between His will and your own—this is a delightful experience. Men may hate me, but if my God loves me, what does it matter? I may feel the cut of sharp, ungentle ords, but if my God speaketh peace to me, can make trouble? It is not only a blessing, but it is a blessing in its consequences. There is no man so humble as the man that is in perfect peace with God: he wonders at the peace he enjoys. There is no man so grateful as the man who has peace; there is no man so courageous; there is no man so little affected by the world: there is no man who bears suffering so patiently; there is no man who is so ready for heaven as the man who is in perfect peace with God, and knows it. Next, that this peace

Comes Only From God;

The Lord will bless His people with peace. You cannot get that peace apart from God Himself: it is of no use to try to work it out of yourself. You say, "I will get better; I will keep the law; I will do this, and do that." You will never dig peace out of the soil of your works. You cannot spin peace out of your own powers, as a spider spins her web. You go to the Lord for peace, and there is only one way in which you can go to Him: Jesus is the way. If you could come and sit with me, and I could comfort you, it might be of some use to you. If you could go to some aged priest, and he could absolve you, it might be one of the darkest of delusions. You go to God, and get His peace, that is solid and abiding. I pray you, seek peace, and make sure of it. You see how it is; for you must come to God for it, and come to Him in spirit and in truth.

Peace comes only

To His Own People:

The Lord will bless His people with peace. He will never bless those with peace who rebel against Him. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, its waters cast up mire and dirt." Say, are you of His people? Do you rest in Christ? Is the atoning sacrifice your soul's hope? If so, you have been begotten unto that lively hope by the resurrection of Christ from the dead, and the Lord will bless His people, who have risen in His own dear Son. The more closely you are to the Lord Jesus, the more clear and full is your peace.

Peace, again, that this is peace in the time of storm, and peace after storm. In spiritual storms that voice is our comfort; and after the storms are over, the Lord speaks a sweet word to the hearts of His children. He allays our fears, while He whispers, "It is I, be not afraid." Brethren, you will have many a tempest on earth here and heaven; but before the tempest, and after the tempest, the Lord will bless His people with peace. We have had peace with God these forty years; yes, but we have a promise of peace for ever.

Suppose we should live another forty years, we shall still have the same promise—The Lord will bless His people with peace. It is like an everlasting cheque from some bank, running thus: "So often as this cheque is presented at the bank, pay the bearer the sum asked." Few persons possessed of such a cheque would fail to put in an appearance at the bank. We should be regular visitors. O children of God, you have such a promissory note in the text before you! The Lord hath given us, boundless peace within Himself, and you have long enjoyed peace with Him. Go to Him again and say,

"Lord Renew My Peace.

When thou art unmoved: bless me with thy peace." When you are rich, and find riches bring cares, bring these to your God, and He will bless His people with peace. When you are poor, do the same. When children are born to you, and with them come family cares, take the new burden to the Lord, for He will give you peace. And if the children die, and you are left alone, as your young shoots are cut off, still turn to the Lord, and believe that He will bless you with peace. If you grow sick yourself, and the angel of a deadly disease appear upon you, still turn to Him, for He will bless you with peace. When you must go upstairs and lie down upon your last bed to rise no more, then, even then, the Lord will bless you with His ever-living peace; and when you wake up at the sound of the last trumpet the Lord will still keep you in perfect peace. "There remaineth a rest for the people of God." Ever is this the heritage of His believing ones: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God." Whatsoever shall befall our race according to the dark page of prophecy, whatever of terror shall break forth throughout the endless ages of the yet-to-be, the Lord will bless His people with peace. Take this truth home to your heart, and live upon it, and you may dwell perpetually

May I entreat you, to seek at once to have close dealings with God. Do not say, "I will begin searching the Scriptures." That is a good thing in itself, but if you rest in Scripture-reading, and do not go to God Himself, your Bible may be made a stumbling-stone for your soul. Do not say, "I shall attend more religious services." This, also, may be well; but religious services will ruin you if you put them in the place of personal dealings with God. Your living soul has personally to do with the living God. Come to Him this morning, if you have never been before. Come at once. Delay no more. Do you shrink? Do you want an introduction? Do you need a friend to go with you to heaven's high court? Behold, the Son of God waits to be your Mediator and Intercessor. Come you to the Father through the Son, and you will in no wise be cast out.

"But can we be sure?" cries one. There are thousands of us who possess the assurance of a child-like faith. In the day when I took hold of Christ Jesus my Lord, I found in Him such real peace that I knew and was persuaded that He is able to save. If any call me a dogmatist, I plead guilty to the charge. I must dogmatize when I am sure. I cannot live without being certain; doubt in this matter is death. I accept my Lord's atonement, I rest on it, and I find peace to my soul. "If," "but," "peradventure"—these are dirks and daggers at my heart. Where is the comfort to any soul in what he does not know to be true? The sap and substance of consolation lie in the certainty of the truth believed. If you are not sure, never rest till you are. Once know assuredly that God is good to Israel, and that He will bless His people with peace, and then go on to enjoy as much of that peace as your soul can hold. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Sunday in Heligoland.*

SUNDAY begins at sunset of Saturday. In winter everybody goes to church. In summer—perhaps from the necessity of serving guests—the natives leave the visitor to do duty for both. The St. Nicholas Kirche may well boast its claim of long descent, dating as it does from the seventeenth century, and even then erected on the ruins of a church still older. It is built of brick, faded now, but not dingy. Within and without it is in perfect harmony with the place, as it stands among the dead of past centuries. Wide-spreading buttresses reach tapering to its very eaves, giving it the look of a mother-hen brooding over her young. A loyal Heligolander rebuilt the tower at his own cost, in the eighty-seventh year of his age—so the tablet reads—and "in the twenty-fourth year of her gracious majesty, Queen Victoria." The whole church is queer and quaint, with a flavor of the sea about it. Its arched and ceiled roof is painted in conventional design, and in the centre the Danish shield, from which depends a full-rigged ship—the gift of a former governor of the island. Great transverse beams support the roof. Across the sides and rear a gallery runs, and in panels entirely surrounding its base may be seen the pictured story of the Bible, from Genesis to the Gospels, painted in an emphatic and realistic style by Andrew Amelink, in colors that have defied the ravages of two hundred years. A fine portrait of Martin Luther surmounts one of the state pews, and a small ship spreads every sail over its neighbor. Other portraits occupy the spaces between the windows—and such windows! Beginning with a gothic intention, they terminate abruptly in an arch; adding to the squat effect of the church, and giving it a nautical appearance when seen from within.

The pews are divided into several sittings, each painted to suit the individual owner, and marked with his name, which is an equitable arrangement, since it is recorded as a part of his personal effects, and may be transmitted like other property. A sitting, with the right to entail, may be purchased for five pounds. Three or four colors are seen in many a pew, but the softest tones are invariably chosen. In some cases, upon the book-board in front, beside the name and date, is placed in large, black letters, a text of Scripture, or a verse of some hymn, to fix the wandering thought perhaps, or to serve as an aid to devotion. Ancient dates bear witness to a long succession of the faithful followers of Luther.

The service is usually rendered in German, although an English Sunday comes once in the month; the same pastor being equal to both occasions. A choir of fresh young voices leads in singing time-honored hymns.

Africa's Mighty Rivers.

From Stanley Falls cataracts occur at intervals, but with navigable stretches of several hundred miles between. A reach of 327 miles, no considerable stream on its own merits, extends without an obstruction from Stanley Falls to Nyangive Falls.

Into the mighty Congo, all along its three thousand miles of length, pours a system of tributary streams, themselves navigable for distances varying from 20 to 800 miles. The estimate is given of 5,250 miles of uninterrupted navigable water in the thousand-mile reach of the Congo between Leopoldville and Stanley Falls and the tributaries of that section alone. Mr. Stanley's estimates of the navigable lengths and character of the tributaries were based on his own record of the brief runs aboard his little steamer, while engaged in founding the Congo State. That they are more likely to have been under than over-estimated seems probable in the light of more recent and extended explorations of some of the principal streams.

In addition to the navigable waters of this Leopoldville-Stanley Falls section, the Lualaba section, above Stanley Falls, with tributaries, gives 1,100 miles, and the Chambeze section 400. Then the Tanganyika system contributes about the same, which, altogether, including the 110 miles between Boma Station and the sea, gives an aggregate of 7,350 miles of uninterrupted navigable waterway in the Congo River and its affluents.

While dealing with the waterways of the west coast, it will contribute to the scope of the subject to glance briefly at a few of the more important of the lesser streams on that side of the continent. The most important and the largest of these is the Niger, which is to be called a lesser stream only in comparison with the truly African Amazon of the foregoing astonishing estimates. The Niger is near 3,000 miles long, and is one of the great rivers of the world, the third in length in Africa. Its mouth was known to Herodotus and the ancient geographers, who believed it to be a branch of the Nile. It was on the Niger that Mungo Park was supposed to have been drowned or murdered in 1805, while attempting to trace it to the sea in a canoe.

Since 1852 the Niger Company have entered the field, and at present there is a regular service of river and coast steamers that ply up to the Binne confluence, 200 miles from its mouth. Were the Niger deep in proportion to its length, it would be navigable for 2,000 miles instead of 200, when it would probably rival the Nile in importance. It flows through a country of remarkable richness, and along its length are many towns and cities with populations of from 20,000 to 50,000 people. The people are semi-civilized; and at 1,000 miles up the Niger the traveller is astonished to find imposing mosques, and to hear at sunset the melodious voices of the muezzins calling the faithful to prayers.

CONSUL-GENERAL SWEENEY'S VISIT.

AMONG the distinguished arrivals by the steamship Normannia from Europe on Friday, the 22d inst., was Rev. Dr. Z. T. Sweeney, LL.D., United States Consul-General to Turkey, who comes with his wife and family on a short vacation, intending to return to his duties in Constantinople in October. During his absence the consulate is in charge of Vice-Consul-General, Joseph Azarian. Professor Sweeney's appointment was one that gave the liveliest satisfaction to all classes of citizens, regardless of politics, for it would have been hard to find a gentleman more thoroughly equipped for the peculiar diplomatic duties of the post assigned him.

Though still a young man—he was born at Liberty, Ky., in 1849—he has seen a great deal of the world, and has a wide and valuable experience in Gospel work. He is the youngest of four brothers, all of whom are engaged in the ministry, and his father and grandfather were preachers. During his college days, he occasionally served as pastor of a church in Paris, Ill., and at the close of his educational career in 1871, was ordained and called to the pastorate of a church in Columbus, Ind. A few years later he was appointed to a church in Augusta, Ga., afterwards returning to the Indiana charge, which he retained until his appointment as Consul-General to the land of the Mussulmans.

While editor of The Central Christian, Mr. Sweeney, with Mr. Isaac Erritt, his associate editor, made a six months' tour of the old world, visiting the principal points of interest in Europe, Egypt and Palestine. An outcome of the trip, as far as the Professor was concerned, was a delightful volume entitled: Under Ten Flags, which graphically describes many of the famous scenes mentioned in the Scriptures. His style is bright, trenchant and chaste, and his familiarity with the peoples and customs of the lands he has visited dis-closes a wonderful faculty of observation and the most minute literary research.

"I attended the Consular-General Convention at Paris," he explained to the CHRISTIAN HERALD, "and I can report that the meeting was one of the most important events in the history of our Consular service, and will mark the beginning of a new era of prosperity in the foreign service of the United States. Turkey is experiencing a revival of industrial enterprise, and ere long the valleys of Asia Minor, so long neglected, will reverberate with the noise of the locomotive and the Euphrates river will swarm with steamers from the head of navigation to Baghdad. Everything points to a liberal reform and a wise administration that will result in bringing Turkey up to the front."

Professor Sweeney's administration of the office of Consul-General has given great satisfaction, not only to the Federal government at Washington but to the Ottoman authorities as well. No previous incumbent has been more popular among American residents or visitors at Constantinople. His good offices and faithful work for the Church and his country at home and abroad entitle him to the warmest admiration and respect of Christians everywhere.

THE CITY OF MECCA.

(See Illustration.)

THE ravages of the cholera at Mecca during the past few weeks have been appalling. Every day the cable has reported over a hundred deaths and on one day the number reached one hundred and seventy-five. The alarming aspect of the prevalence of the scourge in the city is that it is crowded with pilgrims who arrive at this season of the year in large numbers, and who, when they return to their widely scattered homes in the various Mohammedan countries are likely to carry the germs of the disease with them. The presence of the pilgrims has probably been a contributing cause to the outbreak of the plague. The city is small and the annual influx of pilgrims who come during July and August to tender their devotions in the city of their prophet's birth involves overcrowding, which, with the defective sanitary arrangements of an Oriental town is highly dangerous to health.

The city of Mecca is situated in Arabia on the east of the Red Sea about sixty-five miles inland from Jeddah, where the cholera is also raging with awful mortality. Its normal population is about 40,000, but it rises to over 100,000 at the time of the pilgrimages. It was there that Mohammed first saw the light in the year 570. It was even then regarded as a holy city on account of a temple within its walls containing 365 idols. Mohammed's uncle was keeper of this temple as his grandfather had been before him. Mohammed, however, was not reared under heathen influence exclusively. Many Jews were at Mecca and in its vicinity were several communities holding a debased form of Christianity. It is almost certain that Mohammed had communications with the professors of both faiths, he began to take journeys on the business of the lady merchant whom he subsequently married, he must have come in contact with a man of his mental calibre would surely be interested in their religion. Indeed the Koran in which his teachings are embodied gives evidence of an acquaintance with the Old Testament and with the teachings of Jesus Christ.

When he began to teach, Mohammed and his followers were fiercely persecuted in Mecca. His cardinal doctrine that there is but one God enraged the people of the city of 365 idols. He was stoned and left on the roadside for he was beaten and otherwise maltreated. Finally he stole away secretly from the city took refuge at Medinah a city 245 miles to the north. It is from this flight, or Hegira, which occurred in 622, that the Mohammedans date their era, as we date from the birth of Christ. The faith of Mohammedanism has spread over Africa, Asia, and Turkey, but the little city of Mecca in which it first saw the light is still its centre, its sacred object of reverence. To it the Mohammedan turns his face when he prays and to it he directs his steps for his most fervent act of homage.

A NEW AFRICAN RAILROAD.

The First Forty Miles of the Line from Mombasa to Lake Victoria Now Open.

THE opening of the new Mombasa and Nairobi Railroad, which took place on the twenty-first of August in presence of all the foreign consuls stationed at Zanzibar, marks a most important step in the direction of African civilization and Christianization. A year ago Sir William MacKinnon, President of the East African Lakes Company, suggested the construction of a line of railway from Mombasa inland to Lake Victoria. The line was gradually progressing until Lake Victoria was reached. The first rail was laid last year and the part now opened is the first forty miles of the new route that is destined to open up Central Africa to the world.

The territory to be penetrated is in many respects the most important in the "Dark Continent." With the construction of the railway

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

THE duty of making a public profession of his faith was one from which a man of Howard Wescott's mould was not likely to shrink. On the Wednesday night, following his interview with Dr. Hamlyn, he rose in the prayer-meeting, and simply and modestly described his former attitude toward religion, the recent experiences which had driven him from that position, the change which had occurred a few days before, and his present determination henceforth to follow Christ. There was no attempt at rhetorical display, nor was there any hesitation in his language. It was simply a statement which a courageous man makes when he finds that he has been mistaken, and is thoroughly and firmly convinced of the righteousness of a course which he means to pursue. It was such a speech as might have been made in the critical times of 1776, by a man who had decided to cast in his lot with Washington against the foreign yoke. Howard declared himself on the side of Christ in the world, and did so in plain, unvarnished unequivocal terms.

Dr. Hamlyn and his people listened intently. It was a novel kind of address. There was little of Scripture phraseology, none of the hackneyed theological phrases in it, yet through it all rang the clear note of personal conviction and manly resolution which, wherever it may be uttered, always moves an audience.

"I wish our young people had been here tonight," Dr. Hamlyn said after the meeting, as he shook hands with Wescott. "I believe your remarks would have done good. Nothing tells like a personal testimony; argument does not approach it in power. Would you be willing to make the same kind of statement in the Sunday-school?"

"Certainly, if you wish it, Doctor; I do not want to make a parade of it, but I am glad to let it be known where I stand."

"Then do by all means," said Dr. Hamlyn,
"come next Sunday."

Wescott promised, and on the following Sunday he gave an address in the school. It was a different kind of audience, but the former remarks were so plain and to the purpose that there was no need to change their character.
But remembering how many there were present who had not declared themselves Christians, Wescott added a few words of stirring appeal, urging his hearers to come to a decision on a matter so important to themselves for time and eternity. His words told. During the following week several young people went to Dr.
Hamlyn to speak with him about their souls, saying, that Wescott's address had set them thinking.

"Wescott, I wish you were going to be a minister instead of a lawyer," Dr. Hamlyn said, when they met on the street one day, toward the close of that week. "You have the talent, and I believe the spiritual fervor as well, to make a successful preacher. I know you can do good in the legal profession, if you want to, but not so much as you could if you consecrated all your efforts to the Gospel ministry. Besides, there is great need of good men to fill up the thinning ranks. Think about it."

Howard walked home in a reflective frame of mind. He remembered that he had never studied law with much enthusiasm, but rather because he had a good opportunity to do so with his brother-in-law; and then, there were some things connected with the profession that were decidedly distasteful to him. For several days he kept pondering Dr. Hamlyn's suggestion, and could not dismiss it. He did not want to decide hastily, for he knew that it was possible to be misled by evanescent impulses which might fade away; but when he found that the desire to preach the Gospel took complete possession of him, so that he cared for naught else, he recognized in his impressions a call to the ministry. The mental controversy, scrupulously locked in his own breast, went on for two weeks, when his religious feelings received an unexpected shock. It happened one day in Mr. Bollis's office while Howard and the lawyer were alone.

"Well, Howard," said the lawyer in his bland-est tones, "I understand that you are becoming quite an enthusiastic churchman, taking a prominent part in the religious meetings. Some one told me that Dr. Hamlyn had you to address the Sunday-school the other morning, and that you made a very neat little speech."

The tone of worldliness in the attorney's remark grated on Howard's religious sensibilities, and he replied: "I do not know about the neatness of it. It was rather rough, I thought; but I tried to make it effective. I was not seeking honor. I wanted to do good."

"Oh, come now!" said Mr. Bollis. "It's just possible to overdo this thing. There's no harm in belonging to a church, and it may even help you from a business point of view, if you want to be an honorable and successful attorney; but let me tell you plainly, Howard, this excessive religiousness won't work well with the practice of law. It'll hurt your business. I don't mean that you should do anything dishonest, but my advice is, keep your business and your religion apart; don't mix them up too much, old fellow. Don't become a religious enthusiast if you want to be a successful practitioner."

To Howard in his new-born religious fervor, this advice savored so much of a time-serving spirit that he shrank as one putting out his hand to pluck a flower, shudders at touching the cold, slimy skin of a snake. His idea was that religion should be supreme in life, pervading and sanctifying business, and all relations. His brother-in-law treated it almost like a matter of life-assurance, the premium on which should be the smallest compatible with the salvation of the soul from perdition. Religion must not hurt business! Why if religion and business were in conflict, so much the worse for the business. That was Howard's view. In such a case it should not be religion that should be curtailed and driven within narrower boundaries; the business should be brought to line. He was horrified at his mentor's false perspective. He could not trust himself to speak lest his indignant feelings should find utterance in unfraternal words.

That evening he was still brooding over the interview, when he went to see Addie More. He received little sympathy from her, and was much disappointed. His enthusiasm was not contagious, or if it was, she was not susceptible to it. He would have liked to talk to her about Dr. Hamlyn's suggestion of his entering the ministry; but he feared to introduce the subject. A vague premonition came that perhaps her unbelief would be a serious clog to their mutual happiness and to his religious life. But he loved her, and ejected the traitorous thought, as he regarded it, from his heart at once.

"Addie," he said, before taking his leave, "I wish I could induce you to become a believer. You know how the experience came to me. God will remove all your doubts if you go to Him."

"But you admit that your own doubts are not removed, that your difficulties are stifled not solved," she answered, rather acutely.

He was a little flustered. "Well, well," he faltered, "one cannot expect to be free from all temptation in this world, though I know it sounds like a mere platitude to say so. There is quite a difference between the discouragement I feel this evening and my old unbelief. My experience has shown me that my doubts are wrong, that they are merely the result of my melancholy mood, and hence are to be gotten rid of as soon as possible; whereas formerly I harbored my doubts voluntarily."

"Do you mean to say that you will crush your present doubts by main force, instead of letting the truth have its own way?"

"No, no; I shall take them to God, who will remove them. I should have done so before. That has been my mistake." Addie did not reply, and so Howard pursued: "Won't you try to seek the light?"

"Why," she said, with a forced laugh, "if I were to make a profession of religion now, everybody would say that I had done so on your account!"

"Oh! Addie, everyone would know that you are not so worldly-minded as that. This is a matter of truth, of principle, of salvation, and it doesn't signify one iota what people say. I have just as much right to influence you to become a Christian, if I can, as to influence you in any other way—as to induce you to read a favorite book, for instance, or even to promise to become my wife. Why, I'm surprised, Addie; I thought you had more independence."

She looked up at him appealingly, the tears gleaming in her eyes, and he became penitent at once.

"Forgive me, Addie, I didn't mean to lecture you. It was unkind of me. But won't you think this matter over? Now I must go. Good-night;" and kissing her, he left the room.

With a persistency that almost made him angry the thought kept forcing itself upon his mind as he walked home: "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" The question of affinity was one to which he had given some attention in other days, and now it troubled him, do what he would, to banish it from his mind.

On reaching home he went to his own apartment, and having read his usual Scripture selection, fell on his knees before God, and when he rose every misgiving, every doubt had vanished. He would do his duty, leaving the results with God, whom he knew he could trust. No! He would never swerve from his Christian course. He knew the truth and he would obey it.

With this reinforcement of spiritual strength the yearning to preach the Gospel was revived with redoubled power, casting into the shadow all his former ambitions for distinction in the legal world, and so Blackstone was laid aside for the Bible, and novels for the biographies of men eminent for their piety and usefulness in the church. "I can bear the mental strain no longer," he said to himself one day. "Dr. Hamlyn is my proper adviser in these matters. I shall go to him."

The Doctor met him with a cordial welcome at the door, and when Howard told his errand, the good man was visibly affected, and said:

"Well, what are your plans?"

"They are still in a nebulous state," replied Howard. "In the first place, I am not prepared for the work. I have had a college course, it is true, and have paid some attention to law, but my knowledge of the Bible and theology is very limited. I have just been getting glimpses of the wide field of study before me. A man who preaches the Gospel ought to be thoroughly equipped. So I think I ought to take a course of theological training. Am I not right?"

"There is no doubt about it. But are you prepared to go to a divinity school just now?"

"No, I am not. My finances—"

"Well, I am glad of it. I have a plan and you are just the man to carry it out successfully. My hands are so full that I must have help. My church, as you know, has established a mission in the eastern part of the city, a section that is thickly populated, and yet without Gospel opportunities. We have erected a large chapel there, and we need some one to take charge of the new enterprise—some one who could talk to the people on Sunday evening and gather them into the fold. They are like sheep without a shepherd. How would you like that kind of work?"

"It thrills me to think of it, sir," broke out Howard, almost rapturously.

"You might take charge of it for a year just as a lay preacher, without license or ordination, and after that perhaps a way may be opened for you to take a divinity course. Meantime I will arrange for your salary. I will guarantee you enough to live on, with a small sum over for the purchase of books. But I want you to give your whole time to it. You will have to abandon the law."

"I am ready to do so at once; I have thought it all over."

"This one thing I do," quoted the clergyman, approvingly. "You will have to study a good deal to do your work well, and so I want you to make free use of my library. I will lay out a course of reading for you. But there is another thing I want to speak of. There is a chapel about five miles in the country where I ought to be preaching by all means. Don't think you could go out there on a Sunday morning and give the people a Gospel! Then you could come back to the chapel in the evening."

Howard signified his readiness to do what he could, and had already gone to the door, when the Doctor called him back, saying:

"By the way, Wescott, a number of persons who have heard you speak at our prayer meetings and in Sunday-school, have intimate friends they would like to have you give a Sunday evening talk in the church. I believe myself it would do good. Suppose you do so next Sunday evening a week. Let the talk be like those we have already given, plain and simple and unadorned, and make it replete with your own experience. There will be a large audience present to hear you, for your conversion has attracted attention."

"Doctor, I am not worthy to stand in the pulpit," objected Howard, humbly.

"Neither am I, sir. No man is. 'We are all unprofitable servants.' But Christ is the ground of our worthiness, and we must rely on His merits."

"Well, if you put it so, I consent."

Another painful ordeal for the young Christian was the breaking of the news to his father and brother-in-law. Mrs. Bollis received the intelligence with joy, her eyes dewed with happy tears; but when, the next day, as Howard and the lawyer were walking home together, the office, the former said: "Will, I've decided to give up the law," Mr. Bollis opened his eyes with astonishment and exclaimed:

"Give up the law! Good gracious, what are you talking about? Are you a draftsman?"

"No, I have thought it over; I'm going to enter the ministry."

"Going to take to preaching!" echoed the lawyer, astonished. "Well, that's a good thing. What's your object in bantering me, Howard?"

"I never was more in earnest in my life."

"What! do you really mean it?" and the lawyer stopped, and taking his interlocutor by the shoulders, wheeled him around and looked squarely in the eyes. Seeing that the young man was determined, Mr. Bollis, though usually good-natured and kind to a fault, lost his temper.

"Don't be imbecile," he exclaimed. "Do not gushing over this religious nonsense. Religion's all right in its place, but to give up the law and go to preaching—bah! it's puerile, child. Why, just think of your prospects, Howard. One of your talents could go right up to the top round in the law in a few years. Even the attorney in this city says that you have a chance before you. Besides, in ten years you will be independent and in five more rich. But to go into this gospeling business, you'll stay poor, as poor as Job's turkey, if he owned that sort of a fowl."

"Will," returned Howard, calmly, "my calculations you have named are of a worldly character, and I can't allow myself to be influenced by them. With me the question is, where can I do the greatest amount of good?"

"Oh, this altruistic nonsense!" said the lawyer, making a wry face. "You talk like a visionary. We must have lawyers as well as parsons."

"I haven't a word to say against the legal profession. I honor the men who have achieved it. But I must withdraw from the fraternal association of lawyers; my mind is made up," he said firmly.

"Have your own way, then! You can't turn a man who is obstinate and won't listen to reason. I always thought too much religion would addle a man's brain."

And with that thrust, the attorney turned and walked home without vouchsafing another word.

A MOTHER'S SURPRISE.

Sunday night," says Pastor C. H. n, "I was urging Christian parents e be no delay in speaking to their about their souls. I said 'do it to- you have not done it already. You may say my children will be in bed ep when I get home; never mind, airs and wake them, and talk to out their souls.' A mother (this I be true) went home, and her little in bed and asleep. She woke her l, 'Jane, I have not spoken to you, dear child, about your soul. The pastor has been exhorting us to-night, and saying that if you were asleep you should be awakened.' Then said Jane, 'Mother I, have often wondered that you did not speak to me about Christ, but I have known Him these two years.' The mother stood convicted. She brought her daughter round on Monday and said, 'Let this dear girl be baptised and join the Church.' I said to her, 'Why did you not tell your mother?' 'Well,' said she, 'you know, mother never seemed to come up to the subject; she never gave me a chance.' Then the mother said, 'Quite right; I have not been to my children what I ought to have been; but, please God, there shall never be another child of mine that shall steal a march on her mother, and find Christ without her mother, knowing it.' God graciously rebuked that mother."

A CHINESE HERO.

AN illustration of the argument used by the Apostle Paul (Rom. 5: 6, 8.) comes from China. It is the story of a man who to save his brother's life, and to benefit his family voluntarily offered to lay down his own life. It appears that a political prisoner escaped from the custody of his guards, and sought refuge with his friend Loo-nan-kin. His retreat was discovered. Loo-nan-kin was arrested, and preparations were being made for his trial, when the younger brother came forward. "It is I who harbored the fugitive," said he; "It is I who should die, and not my brother." Loo-nan-kin, on the other hand, declared that he alone was guilty, and that his brother had falsely accused himself. The judge cross-questioned the young man with such skill as to involve him in contradictions, and he was obliged at length to confess the imposture. "Alas!" said he, "I had strong reasons for acting thus; it is a long time since our mother died, and we have not yet been able to pay her the duties due from sons to their mother's memory. We have, moreover, a sister unmarried. My elder brother alone has it in his power to provide for these exigencies; so that it were better for me to die in his stead. I conjure you, therefore, to accept my confession and let me bear the penalty." The judge was deeply affected; he reported this instance of filial piety and brotherly love to the supreme tribunal, and the emperor pardoned the guilty man. His life was thus spared because another loved him well enough to offer to die in his place. It is thus that man is reconciled to God. But in his case, as the apostle points out, the love was infinitely more wonderful because it was while we were yet enemies that Christ died for us.

THE NEED OF MORE MISSIONARIES.

COMPARING the missionary work in the home and foreign fields, the Missionary Record makes the surprising, yet truthful assertion that in our own land there is one minister to every 800 inhabitants: while in the foreign field there is one missionary to 400,000. The Missionary Review estimates that there are 650 workers in the home field to one in the foreign; and twenty dollars is given for the home work to one for the foreign. That is, while the need is from five hundred to six hundred and fifty times greater in the foreign field, we spend twenty times as much in the home field. The annual expenditure of the Protestant church members in the United States for church work at home is $80,000,000, while that for foreign work is only $4,000,000—in other words, eighty millions for 60,000,000 of people here as against one-twentieth of that sum for the evangelization of 1,181,000,000 souls, or about one-third of a cent per soul! There could be no stronger argument in behalf of the immediate increase in foreign missionary activities than this.

THE RUM TRAFFIC IN AFRICA.

In a letter to the Advance, Rev. W. H. Rice tells in graphic terms, of the horrors of the rum traffic in Africa. He writes: "Four firms only are in control of this horrible business—and from this source is flowing a stream that is whelming in destruction and everlasting death millions of the people of Africa. At present, rum destroys more than all the missionaries can repair. Think of boys and girls of fourteen or fifteen years of age getting their wages in rum! In 1888 nearly 600 natives were picked up dead in Kimberly, South Africa, killed by intoxicating drink. Rev. Horace Walter says he has seen hundreds of native girls lying in a state of intoxication around the wagons of the spirit sellers. The blood of thousands of the natives to-day cries to heaven against the hellish greed that perpetrates such a traffic.

"The question may be asked, can the traffic be prohibited? Most assuredly! One only needs refer to the action of Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, France and Holland in the matter of the rum traffic among the North Sea Fisheries.

"When these Powers came to an agreement to protect the fishermen from the ravages of the drink traffic, it only took a short time for the liquor sellers to find out that they dealt with a force that could not and would not be trifled with—and the traffic was stopped."

Estey Organs have been sold in the last fifty years.

An enormous number! No other Organ has been so popular. No other Organ has had such a sale.

We want to secure the best conception of 200,000 Organs. We ask some reader of this paper to give us an illustration of the number 200,000 which will show how great it is.

Here is one specimen illustration.

"It is a long distance from Brattleboro', Vt., to the moon, but if those organs were distributed along the route, and you traveled the whole way at the rate of 330 miles a day, you would be two whole years on the trip, and would pass an Estey Organ every five minutes, day or night, waking or sleeping, week-days and Sundays."

This is a good illustration. Perhaps you can do better. Will you not try?

"TELL JESUS."

Is there a shadow resting on thy brow,
Caused by the daily cares that none may know;

Trials which, little though they seem in one,
Oft fret thy life as water frets the stone?

Tell Jesus.

Is there a chord within thy aching breast,
More sensitive to pain than all the rest,
That oft is struck by cruelty and wrong,
Until thou fain would'st cry, "O Lord, how long?"

Tell Jesus.

And does thy spirit grieve o'er doubts and sin,
Thick clouds without and fiery darts within?
Poor tempted one! There is an eye above,
Marking thee daily with a pitying love.

Tell Jesus.

And when dark waves of tribulation roll,
In wild and surging billows o'er thy soul,
Oh, think, amid the tempest's might, of One Who cried, in that dark hour, "Thy will be done;"

Tell Jesus.

And dost thou moan in solitary mood,
Sighing because thou art not understood:
That in the world there is no spirit tone
To echo the sweet music of thine own?

Tell Jesus.

Oh, may this thought sustain thee in thy grief
Though earthly sympathy give no relief,
Yet there is One who bends from courts above
To sound all depths of human woe and love.

Tell Jesus.

IDOLS IN PAWN.

AN intelligent Chinaman in Canton who has renounced idol worship, but instead of becoming a Christian has fallen into infidelity, contending with a Christian missionary, remarked that the idolatrous Chinaman had an advantage over a non-idolatrous one. "How is that?" asked the missionary. "His god often saves him from starvation." "Never," said the missionary. "But it does," contended the Chinaman, "and I can prove it." The dispute waxed warm, and finally the Chinaman, being challenged to produce his proof, said, "The man prays to his god for food, and if he does not get it, and is pushed to an extremity, he takes his god and pawns it. Thus his god does save him from starvation." The missionary doubted the truth of his assertion, believing that a Chinaman would consider the act a gross sacrilege. "The next day, however," he says, "I went to a shop where we had often stopped to survey the hideous deities of wood and plaster arrayed in the open window front, and to watch the manufacture of such images going on within. To our surprise a good supply of second-hand images was produced for our inspection. 'How do you get these?' we asked. 'The people, when they are in want of food, bring them here to pawn.' What a startling supplement, we thought, to the prophet's splendid satire on the idolator of his own day! He heweth wood and kindleth it and warmeth himself, and baketh bread and roasteth meat; and the residue of his fuel he maketh a god; he boweth down to it; and then, when he lacks bread to bake and meat to roast on his firewood, he takes the god made from its refuse, and raises therewith a few copper coins.

SELF-BURDENED.

AN incident related by Rev. Mark Guy Pearse illustrates the feeling common among Christians of struggling under their burdens instead of taking them to Christ who has promised to bear them if they will hand them over to Him. He says:

"One very hot summer's day I was driving along a dusty road, when I overtook a woman with a heavy basket on her arm. I did not want to feel like the priest in the story that Jesus told, who 'passed by on the other side,' so I offered her a ride. She gladly accepted it, but as she rode still carried the heavy basket on her arm. 'My good woman,' I said, as kindly as I could, 'do not carry that basket; put it down on the bottom of the trap.' 'Oh,' she said, 'that would be imposing on your kindness to have you carry the basket as well as me.' 'But,' I said, 'that would not make the load any heavier and your basket would ride just as well in the bottom of the trap, and you would be much more comfortable.' 'Ah, so it would, sir, thank you; I never thought of that,' she said, as she put her burden down. 'That is very much like I often do,' I remarked after a little while. 'Like you do, sir?' and the woman looked up inquiringly. 'Yes; I, too, often carry heavy burdens when there is no need for it.' She waited for my explanation. 'The Lord Jesus has taken me up into His chariot, and I rejoice to ride in it, but very often I carry a great burden of care on my back that would ride just as well if I put it down, for the Lord would carry me and my cares too.' 'Yes, bless the Lord!' said she, with a joy that told that she had found the cure for care. 'It is true, sir, when He takes us up in His chariot, He takes cares and all.' Here is a cure for your cares, for all the little daily worries and the burdens of anxiety that oppress you—The Lord careth for you."

ILL-HOARDED WEALTH.

REV. A. J. GORDON, an Ohio clergyman states a startling mathematical problem as follows: "According to recent estimates, it is computed that there are now $8,000,000,000 hoarded up in the hands of American Christians, a sum so great that it staggers our mathematics to compute it. Now, making a fair provision for sickness and old age, it is unquestionable that a vast proportion of this sum would still come under the description of our Lord's parable of money 'kept laid up in a napkin.' That napkin may be cut according to the strictest pattern of commercial integrity; it may be hemmed with the most rigid rules of political economy; nevertheless, I fear that if our Lord were suddenly to return from that far country whence he has gone, he would shake his hapkin clear of its contents and exclaim: 'Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou oughtest to have put my money to the exchangers, that at my return I might have had my own with usury'—the usury of saved souls, the usury of evangelized nations, the usury of eternal praise to Him who, 'though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich.'"

And the most solemn consideration is that our Lord will not take one cent of this hoarded wealth by compulsion or seizure. He who saves no man without his consent, taxes no man without his consent. For our freedom of will is the most sacred thing in the universe—the very crown jewel of manhood. And God will never in any circumstance violate it."

THE FATE OF A WIDOW IN INDIA.

THE Apostolic declaration that the Gospel is good for the life that now is as well as for that which is to come, (1 Timothy 4:8) has no more conclusive proof than furnished by a contrast between the social customs of countries even nominally Christian and those still lying in heathen darkness. A case in point is contained in a letter from Miss Beauchamp, a missionary laboring among the women of India. She says: "I have just lost three of my Zenana pupils—one a young widow, formerly a pupil in one of the schools. She was very fond of me, and seemed to look forward to my visits. One day, when I went as usual, her father said he wished to speak to me, and hoped I should not be offended. He then said, 'After this week it will not be convenient for you to see my daughter. She has been unlucky enough to lose her husband, and her future life will be miserable.' I said, 'I am sorry, but as your daughter has lost so much, is it well to deprive her of the pleasure of seeing me?' 'Oh,' he said, 'I would willingly allow you to continue your visits if I dared, but I shall lose caste if I do. My daughter must undergo some ceremonies. Her head will be shaved. She will be allowed only one meal a day, and you must not see her.' I pleaded very hard with him, but although tears came into his eyes he said, 'No; what can I do? I respect your people, but if I allow my widowed daughter to be seen and taught by you I shall lose caste'; but he said, 'You may come one day more if you wish.' I gladly availed myself of the permission given, and on the following Friday I went to see the poor girl. She is fourteen years old, has never lived with her husband, and yet she must suffer all this. Your prayers are requested for the poor widows of India."

JEWISH INFLUENCE IN THE WORLD.

At the City Temple, London, on a Sabbath morning recently during the course of his remarks, Dr. Parker spoke of the Hebrew race as follows; I like the Jews even when not converted. Some of them I like and trust after conversion. The Jewish mind is the greatest intellectual power in the world. It always was so. To-day the world is inspired and ruled by Jews. Christians are apt to overlook this fact. Was not the Old Testament written by Jews? Is not the New Testament the work of Jews? Is not salvation of the Jews? God will never forget honest Jews. They are His own people.

And they sang a new song." Rev. 5: 9.

NEARLY all the cities of Europe and America have conservatories of music, and associations, whose object it is, by voice and instrument, to advance the art of sweet sounds. On Thursday nights, Exeter Hall, of London, used to resound with the music of first-class performers, who gave their services gratuitously to the masses, who came in with free tickets, and huzzaned at the entertainment. At Berlin, at eleven o'clock daily, the military band, with sixty or one hundred instruments, discourses at the royal opera-house for the people. On Easter Sunday, in Dresden, the boom of cannon and the ringing of bells, bring multitudes to the churches to listen to the organ peals, and the exciting sounds of trumpet and drum. When the great fair-day of Leipsic comes, the bands of music, from far and near, gather in the street, and bewilder the ear with incessant playing of flute, and horn, violin and bassoon. At Dusseldorf, once a year, the lovers of music assemble, and for three or four days wait upon the great singing festivals, and shout at the close of the choruses, and greet the successful competitors as the prizes are distributed—cups and vases of silver and gold. All our American cities at times resound with orchestra and oratorio. Those who can sing well or play skilfully upon instruments are greeted with vociferation, and garlanded by excited admirers.

There are many whose most ecstatic delight is to be found in melodies; and all the splendor of celestial gates, and all the lusciousness of twelve manner of fruits, and all the rush of floods from under the throne of God, would not make a heaven for them if there were no great and transporting harmonies. Passing along our streets in the hour of worship, you hear the voice of sacred melody, although you do not enter the building. And passing along the street of heaven we hear, from the temple of God and the Lamb, the breaking forth of magnificent jubilate. We may not yet enter in among the favored throng, but God will not deny us the pleasure of standing awhile on the outside to hear. John listened to it a great while ago, and "they sang a new song."

Let none aspire to that blessed place who have no love for this exercise, for although it is many ages since the thrones were set, and the harps were strung, there has been no cessation in the song, excepting once for about thirty minutes; and, judging from the glorious things now transpiring in God's world, and the ever-accumulating triumphs of the Messiah, that was the last half-hour that heaven will ever be silent.

Mark the fact that this was a new song. Sometimes I have in church been floated away upon some great choral, in which all our people seemed to mingle their voices, and I have, in the glow of my emotions, said, Surely this is music good enough for heaven. Indeed I do not believe that "Luther's Hymn," or "Coronation," or "Old Hundred," or "Mount Pisgah," would sound ill if spoken by sainted lips, or thrummed from seraphic harps. There are many of our fathers and mothers in glory who would be slow to shut heaven's gate against these old-time harmonies. But this, we are told, is a new song. Some of our greatest anthems and chorals are compositions from other tunes—the sweetest parts of them gathered up into the harmony; and I have sometimes thought that this "new song" may be partly made up of sweet strains of Earthly Music Mingled in eternal choral. But it will, after all, be a new song. This I do know, that in sweetness and power it will be something that ear never heard. All the skill of the oldest harpers of heaven will be flung into it. All the love of God's heart will ring from it. In its cadences the floods will clap their hands, and it will drop with the sunlight of everlasting day, and breathe with odors from the blossoms of the tree of life. "A new song"—just made for heaven.

Many earthly songs are written by composers just for the purpose of making a tune; and the land is flooded with note-books in which really valuable tunes are the exception. But once in a while a man is wrought up by some great spectacle, or moved by some terrible agony, or transported by some exquisite gladness, and he sits down to write a tune or a hymn, in which every note or every word is a spark dropped from the forge of his own burning emotions.

So Mendelssohn wrote, and so Beethoven, and so Charles Wesley. Cowper, depressed with misfortunes until almost insane, resolved on suicide, and asked the cab-driver to take him to a certain place where he expected to destroy his own life. The cab-driver lost his way, and Cowper began to think of his sin, and went back to his home and sat down and wrote—

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

"Ye fearful saine, fresh courage take,
The clouds you so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head."

Mozart composed his own requiem, and said to his daughter Emily, "Play that;" and while Emily was playing the requiem, Mozart's soul went up on the wave of his own music into glory. Emily looked around, and her father was dead.

A Pæan of Victory.

This new song of heaven was not composed because heaven had nothing else to do, but Christ, in memory of cross and crown, of manger and throne, of earth and heaven, and wrought upon by the raptures of the great eternity, poured this from His heart, made it for the armies of heaven to shout in celebration of victory, for worshipers to chant in their temple services, for the innumerable home circles of heaven to sing in the house of many mansions. If a new tune be started in church, there is only here and there a person that can sing it. It is some time before the congregation learn a new tune. But not so with the new song of heaven. The children who went up to-day from the waters of the Ganges are now singing it. That Christian man or woman, who, a few minutes ago, departed from this very street, has joined it. All know it—those by the gates, those on the river bank, those in the temple. Not feeling their way through it, or halting, or going back, as if they never before had sung it, but with a full round voice they throw their soul into this new song. If some Sabbath day a few notes of that anthem should travel down air, we could not sing it. No organ could catch its thunder. No harp could catch its trill. No lip could announce its sweetness. Transfixed, lost, enchanted, dumb, we could not hear the faintest note of the new song. Yet, will speak, heaven's cathedral quakes under it, a seas of glory bear it from beach to beach, a ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands sing it—"the new song."

Further: It is a commemorative song, are distinctly told that it makes reference past deliverances. Oh, how much have to sing about. They sing of the dark through which on earth they passed, and it night song. That one was killed at Yorktown and with him it is a battle song. That one imprisoned for Christ's sake, and with him, a prison song. That was a Christian sailor that had his back broken on the ship's halyard and with him it is a sailor's song. That burned at Smithfield, and with him it is a song. Oh! how they Will Sing of Floods Waded, of fires endured, of persecution suffered, grace extended! Song of hail! Song of sword song of hot lead! song of axe! As when organ-pipes peal out some great harmony, it comes occasionally the sound of the tremulous weeping through the cadences, adding excitement to the performances, so amidst the pious acclamation of the heavenly worshippers shall come tremulous remembrances of past duration, adding a sweetness and glory to triumphal strain. So the glorified mother sing of the cradle that death robbed; and enthroned spirit from the alms-house will sing of a lifetime of want. God may wipe all tears, but not the memory of the grief that started them!

Further: It will be an accompanied song. Some have a great prejudice against musical instruments, and even among those who love them, there is an idea that they are unauthorized. I love the cymbals, for Israel clapped them triumph at the Red Sea. I love the harp, David struck it in praising the Lord. I love the trumpet, for we are told that it shall wake the dead. I love all stringed instruments and gongs; for God demands that we shall praise

Him on strings in instruments organs. There is such music in to suggest higher worship for I read when he had the book, the and-twenty fell down before the Lamb, had everyone of "harps," and heard the voice the harpers singing with the harps," and "I saw them that had gotten victory from the beast standing on the sea glass, having the harps of God."

Yes, the song is to be accompanied. You that all this is figurative. Then I say, prove I do not know how much of it is literal, how much of it is figurative. Who can say that from some of the precious woods of heaven and heaven there may not be made instruments of celestial accord. In that worship David take the harp, and Habakkuk the shigionoth when the great multitudes shall, following their own inclinations, take up instruments sweeter than Mozart ever fingered, or Schumann dreamed of, or Beethoven ever wrote for, let heaven make ready for the burst of stupendous minstrelsy, and the roll of the eternal orchestra.

Further: it will be an anticipative song. Why, my friends, heaven has hardly begun. If you had taken the opening piece of music to-day for the whole service, you would have made so great a mistake as to suppose heaven is fully inaugurated. Festal chor-

You can t Rome in six weeks. You can not see in a month. You can not see the great the New Jerusalem in a day. old preachers, in describing the sorrows lost, used to lift up their hands and "The wrath to come!" "The wrath to To-day I lift up my hands, and look- ward the great future, cry, "The joy to "The bliss to come!" Oh, to wander on the banks of the bright river, and yet to feel that a little further down we shall find still brighter floods entering into it! Oh, to stand a thousand years, listening to the enchanting music of heaven, and then to find out that the harpers are only tuning their harps.

I stayed a week at Niagara Falls, hoping thoroughly to understand and appreciate it. But on the last day they seemed newer and more incomprehensible than on the first day. Gazing on the infinite rush of celestial splendors, where the oceans of delight meet, and pour themselves into the great heart of God—how soon will we exhaust the song that shall then arise? Never! Never!

Finally, I remark, that it will be a unanimous song. There will, no doubt, be some to lead, but all will be expected to join. It will be grand congregational singing. All the sweet voices of the redeemed! Grand music it will be, when that new song arises. Luther sings it. Charles Wesley sings it. Lowell Mason sings it. Our voices now may be harsh and our ears uncultivated, but, our throats cleared at last, and our capacities enlarged, you and I will not be ashamed to sing as loudly as any of them.

The Song of All Nations.

Those nations that have always been distinguished for their capacity in song will lift up their voices in that melody. Those who have had much opportunity to hear the Germans sing will know what idea I mean to give, when I say that the great German nation will pour their deep full voices into the new song. Everybody knows the natural gift of the African for singing. No singing on this continent like that of the colored churches in the south. Everybody going to Richmond or to Charleston wants to hear the Africans sing. But when not only Ethiopia, but all that continent of darkness, lifts up its hands, and all Africa pours her great volume of voice into the new song—that will be music for you. Added to this are all the sixteen thousand millions of children that are estimated to have gone into glory, and the host of young and old that hereafter shall people the earth and inhabit the stars.

Oh! the new song! Gather it all up! Multiply it with every sweetness! Pour into it every harmony! Crown it with every gladness! Belt it with every splendor! Fire it with every glory! Toss it to the greatest height of majesty! Roll it to the grandest cycle of eternity!—and then you have but the faintest conception of what John experienced when, amidst the apocalyptic vision, he heard it—the new song!

God grant that at last we may all sing it. But if we do not sing the praise of Christ upon earth, we will never sing it in heaven. Be sure that your hearts are now attuned for the heavenly worship. There is a cathedral in Europe with an organ at each end. Organ answers organ, and the music waves backward and forward with indescribable effect. Well, my friends, the time will come when earth and heaven will be but different parts of one great accord. It will be joy here and joy there! Jesus here and Jesus there! Trumpet to trumpet! Organ to organ! Hallelujah to hallelujah! "Until the day break and the shadows flee away, turn, my beloved, and be thou like a young hart upon the mountains of Bether!"

PALESTINE AWAKENING.

SOME remarkable facts respecting the Holy Land are reported by Mr. Samuel Schor. They indicate that in many ways. God is preparing to restore His chosen people to their own land. Not only are the means of transportation being multiplied and developed, but the Jews, persecuted in Russia, disliked in Germany and other lands, are turning longing eyes toward Palestine, and taking practical measures toward establishing more Jewish settlements there. Mr. Schor says: "The proposed railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem is to have a formidable rival in the North, for Mr. Pilling, of Manchester, has just received the necessary concession from the Sultan for a line from Damascus to the Bay of Acre, crossing the ancient Israelitish city of Dan. It would also be extended southward to Joppa, thus connecting Jerusalem with the North, and then be continued to Egypt. Jew and Englishman are thus working together for the regeneration of Palestine. This is as it should be." But it appears that even they are not to be alone in the field. The Turk is actually waking up, for an Effendi has also obtained a concession for a line in Syria.

"New colonists continue to pour into the country, and the fearful sufferings of the Jews in Russia, which are only too true in spite of official denials, will give a greater impetus to this movement. Some influential members of the Jewish Colonization Society called the Chovevei Zion Society of Russia have just visited the Holy Land with the object of seeing for themselves whether the Jewish colonies in Palestine are the success they claim to be. This deputation was headed by the great Rabbi Samuel Mohilever, a name well known and highly respected for learning and piety throughout the whole of Russia. They have now returned, and the thousands of Jews whom they represent will await with breathless interest the report they will give of their visit. May it be a good report, like that given by Joshua and Caleb on a similar occasion more than 3,000 years ago.

"Baron Hirsch has not come to any decision yet. It is natural that he should take time before deciding on so stupendous a measure. But I cannot help thinking that the recent visit of M. Schied, a French Jew, to the Holy Land, where he made a careful inspection of most of the Jewish colonies, may have something to do with the Baron's future plans. I should also mention that the colonists have a very warm friend and supporter in Baron de Rothschild, of Paris, who has already spent large sums of money in the Holy Land.

"The London branch of this Colonization Society has now over a thousand members all of whom are Jews. Its principles are similar to those of an ordinary building society. Each member pays a small sum per week. When the subscriptions have reached a certain amount two or more families, chosen by ballot, will be sent to Palestine. Land will be bought, as well as all necessary implements. There will also be advisers on the spot, to direct, to teach, and train the colonists till they can help themselves. Of course the funds are also augmented by donations from wealthy friends."

A FRIEND'S WISH.

A FRIEND in Wortendyke, N. J., who secured a colored print of the new Brooklyn Tabernacle by sending to Dr. Talmage four subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, acknowledges its receipt in the following poetical aspiration for the success of the new Tabernacle, which we feel sure every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will warmly echo:

Our picture came—a handsome view,
Of your great church, so grand and new,
And, phoenix-like, so soon to rise,
With all its beauty toward the skies.
May many souls be gathered in,
Each one; and all, be saved from sin;
A trysting-place, all welcome there;
A restful Home, the House of Prayer.

Volume XII., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1889, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, 1887, and 1888 are also for sale. None are on hand prior to 1884.

"MOTHER" is a title sacred the world over and nowhere is it more venerated than in the Orient, or its gentle offices held in higher esteem. While in Europe and our own country many of the cares and responsibilities of motherhood are delegated to servants, an Eastern mother and her child are practically inseparable. The exceptions are found only in the very highest ranks and among the wealthiest; but in all other classes, whether in Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, or Hindostan, the mother is the nurse, companion, teacher and carrier of the babe until it has reached an age when it passes out of her hands.

The illustrations published on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day, and which are reproduced from photographs secured by Dr. Talmage during his recent tour in the Holy Land, are especially interesting as showing types of Oriental mothers of a class very seldom depicted and but little known to our civilization. The Nubian mother and baby shown in the picture on the first page is a fair type of the young matron of Middle Egypt. Straight and lissome, she carries her little one as lightly on her shoulder as though the chubby fellow were hardly a feather's weight. He clasps her forehead with his tiny palms, and clings to her with his feet, fearless of danger and feeling as secure in his seat as a white one-year-old would in his nurse's arms.

In Egypt and in all the Nile countries, one meets this familiar group. Sometimes, as seen at Cairo, it is varied, the mother carrying the child on her arm or on one shoulder, while on her head is a tray, with small earthenware bowls full of scalded buffalo milk, known as "kishtar;" or she may have on her arm a jar of "Haleeb wa laban," (new milk) for the use of the household. As she walks along, with her disengaged hand she occasionally reaches up to the youngster astraddle on back or shoulder and pops a sweetmeat between his lips which he delightedly sucks. When she pays a visit to her neighbors, or goes up the lane for a half-hour of gossip, she carries him along, sometimes dressed in a little shirt of dark-blue cotton, to which, if the weather be cold, she adds a short jacket of colored print and a colored handkerchief bound tightly about his head; or, perhaps, a pointed hood of coarse cloth, the peak of which dangles behind him like an elongated fez, giving him a highly comical appearance. The very poor, however, do not scruple to shoulder their little ones absolutely naked.

An Egyptian

Baby has a Hard Time of it, and while infant mortality there is far less than it is in the large cities of the new world, he seems to survive rather in spite of than because of the maternal care he receives. His round, plump body grows emaciated and his large bright black eyes grow dull with continued exposure to the sun and the flies—which latter plague him terribly—and with careless feeding. The children of the poor in Egypt and some parts of the Holy Land suffer greatly from ophthalmia. Their mothers, in very many cases, are girl-wives of thirteen or fourteen, and the baby toilet appears in such cases to be dispensed with altogether, the little ones being neither dressed nor washed save at long intervals. This is frequently owing to a superstitious fear of the evil eye and the "envious glance," which the mother dreads may be cast at her offspring and cause it to wither and die, if she makes it too presentable. Yet mothers are often seen with strings of gold and silver coins about their necks, any one of which would buy themselves a clean veil and baby an outfit.

Bedouin Babies

are not to be envied their lot in early life. Rarely goes a Bedouin mother preserve her good it is still considered a reproach to be less. They lavish a world of love and attention upon their little ones and this is evidenced by the fact that besides the word "olam," (eternity,) they have others that describe the babe in its different stages of development. First, there is the "yonek," or new born infant; then the "yonek" at its mother's bosom; the "olel," when it eats something stronger than milk; the "olel" when it is able to toddle about and no longer depends upon the maternal fountain; the "olel" when it can run; the "elem" when it is able to hold its own physically among its playmates and to take part in sports, and the "elem" when the little one is a girl and growing into childhood. The "naar" or growing lad, the "bachur" or youth fit for marriage or service, complete the list. In olden times indeed in many parts of the world even the firstborn in a Jewish household is dedicated to God. This is in remembrance of the fact that the Lord, when he slew the firstborn of the Egyptians, hallowed himself to those of the Israelites to himself. Beside looks after her eighteenth year. She is squat ungraceful and heavy-browed ; yet the maternal love is strong and she goes nowhere without her children, carrying them in a variety of ways, several of which are shown in the pictures on this page. One fashion of carrying is at the side or rather on the hips. "Thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side," says the Scripture. In this instance the young Bedouin, while no doubt easy enough, is hardly as graceful as in some other ways. But where the mother has two to carry around simultaneously it is not to be supposed that she can always assume graceful poses. Still another way—and one that is almost universal among mothers who have to work in the vineyards of the Orient—is to have a basket slung to the back, formed somewhat in the shape of a cradle, in which the baby is fastened, very much after the manner of Indian mothers in our own land, who bind their papposes to stiff birch boards until they look like miniature mummies, and then hang them over their backs by a cord attached to the top of the board.

Many of the older nations had "names" for their children and among Hebrew the eighth day was observed for this. The Greeks named their babies on the day while the Persians, singularly, chose the night time for the ceremony. The father, if he were rich, gave a feast to his child's honor. During the feast, five pieces of paper containing different names were placed between the leaves of the Koran, a chapter of the book was read and then one of the names was drawn out by the father and explained to the priest, who, having seen the name, retained, whispered it into the baby's ear. Then the written slip upon the swaddling clothes was placed forward with their presents.

The Hebrew mother, and especially the poorer class, is inseparable from her child. They go with her everywhere. They arms, sit on her shoulder or cling to her. Nurses are a rarity. Rebekah's nurse,

In all Eastern lands the first education of the child devolves upon the mother. In some countries, the infant's religious education may be said to begin even before it can speak. He is taught to kiss the finger in salutation to sacred symbols, to lisp little fragments of prayer and to recognize the Scriptures whenever he sees it. Paul refers to this childish tuition when he says of Timothy that Lois, the grand-mother, and Eunice, the mother, taught him so faithfully that from a baby he knew the Holy Scriptures. At five the Oriental child begins the reading of the sacred books; at ten he advances a step and takes up sacred writings emendatory of the first; at thirteen he must know and understand the commandments; at fifteen he is well grounded in all religious education and is responsible before God for his own actions. If a daughter, she has a more rudimentary course of study, the Oriental idea attributing to the sex a "lighter mind" than man possesses. In matters of secular education and in juvenile pleasures, however, the prattlers of both sexes grow up side by side on almost even terms. Much good work has been done and is now going on in the Christian mission schools in Eastern cities among the children, thousands of whom are being educated, and brought to a knowledge of Him who is indeed the "Children's Friend," and who passed many hours of His life on earth teaching and comforting them.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Novel Missionary Work is to be Under- taken by the well-known Evangelist Rev. George F. Pentecost, who sailed Saturday last for England, where he will join a party of friends and proceed to India. His purpose is to preach the Gospel to the high caste Hindus. There are some five millions of these people who are educated far better than the average native—a large proportion as well as college graduates in our own country. They are both Hindu and Mohammedan, and belong to a class not reached by ordinary mission work, which deals with the India. Indeed, never mission upper there. Mr. Pentecost, who is a native of Albion, Ills., forty-eight years old, is in a vigorous prime and with God's blessing has many years of good work before him. The most encouraging feature of this missionary enterprise is in the character of the men engaged in it. The Brahmins and high caste Hindus are men of subtle intellect, and so skilled in dialectics that the most learned theologians shrink from an argument with them. But Mr. Pentecost and those who accompany him are men who do not rely on their own powers but in the might of the Holy Spirit, who in Apostolic days so helped Stephen that he spoke with a wisdom that his opponents could not resist. (Acts 6: 10.) Christians everywhere should pray that the results of this effort may be such an outpouring of the Holy Spirit in that teeming land, that this visit may ever after- ward be identified with the name of Pentecost, not in connection with its leader, but to its like- ness to that memorable day when "the day of Pentecost being fully come" there were added to the church under one sermon three thou- sand souls. (Acts 2: 1 and 41.)

An Indignant Protest against a Record of death was made at Police Headquarters, New York, on September 1. At an early hour on that morning a telegram was received by the sergeant on duty reporting that a German citizen who keeps a restaurant on the East side had jumped from a ferry-boat and was drowned. Shortly afterward a messenger arrived with papers taken from the pockets of the dead man's garments, which he had thrown off before jumping into the water. Among the papers was a letter addressed to his wife, asking her to forgive him for his crime. A policeman was sent around to the man's house to break the sad intelligence to the widow. As it was three o'clock in the morning he had some difficulty in arousing any one at the house, but eventual- ly the door was opened by the very man whose death the policeman had come to announce. The policeman, not knowing him, delivered his message, and the man in a highly excited state dressed, and went to Police Headquarters to protest. As he was not known there and as his testimony was unsupported, the sergeant declined to receive it, and the man though giving un- mistakable and even menacing proofs of being alive, was obliged to depart, leaving behind him on the blotter the official record that he was dead. During the day he learned that the re- port and the forged letter were a joke played at his expense by some friends. A man conscious of life need not have been much concerned if a record of his death did stand on a police-blotter, but it would be a terrible thing for him if in God's book it were recorded that while living he is spiritually dead, and that record is made of ev- ery man who is not alive in Christ. (John 6: 53.)

An Amateur Surgical Operation Performed by the patient himself is reported by a press cor- respondent at Middleton, Miss. He says, that among recent settlers in that neighborhood, was a German named Herman Loebnitz who purchased a tract of land, part of which had never been cleared. He worked upon it with the energy and self-reliance of his race. Early and late he was laboring with his axe on the giant trees. One morning he cut down a tree which, in falling, was caught and supported by the branches of another tree. Loebnitz tied his axe around his waist, and climbed the standing tree to cut away the limbs which held up the one he had felled. He cut off one of the limbs, and the tree fell a short distance; but it dragged him with it, and in falling his right foot was caught between the two trees. He hung head downward, held a prisoner by his foot. By a desperate effort he dragged himself around to a horizontal position, but in doing so he dislocated his ankle. The pain was excruciating, and his agony of mind was still worse. He had never seen anyone pass that way, and he knew that he might be held there a prisoner until he died of starvation, before anyone came to his assistance. He brooded on his situation until he could bear it no longer, and decided to release himself by a desperate measure. He raised his axe, and with two blows cut off his foot just above the ankle. Sliding down the tree he reached the ground and crawled to where his hat lay. This he filled with earth and bound it on the bleeding stump. Then he set out on his knees for the village, where a doctor tied up the arteries and dressed the wound. The correspondent says that the man is now on the way to recovery. The rough operation must have been an awful shock to his nerves as well as a most painful one, but as it probably saved his life he is not likely to regret it. His decision of character may be commended as an example to some, who have become entangled in sinful habits or relations. Though to sever the ties that hold them back from following Christ may involve mental anguish as terrible as the pain the woodsman endured, it is better to bear it than risk the loss of the soul. (Mark 9: 45.)

PREMILLENNIAL ADVENT.

THE spiritual condition of the Church and the world is not the only evidence we have on which to found our belief that there will be no millennium until after the second coming of Christ. There is

The Social Difficulty.

Who can examine into the condition of the multitude of the poorer classes without sadness!—the pigsties in which many of our agricultural laborers exist, filth and crowding illustrating an evolution downward into the brute; the dull routine toil of the factory, amid dust and heat and foul air; the dismal, perilous labor of the mine; the protracted, health-sapping hours in shops and warehouses; the starving wages of the needle-women; the teeming lodging-houses of the city, whole families being crowded into a single narrow room; the gin-palace producing poverty, and poverty seeking to relieve its wretchedness in the gin-palace, and the low music-hall; and then, the multitude of the sick and poor whom no faults of their own have brought to destitution, who, notwithstanding all the efforts of benevolence, are shivering and starving and dying unheeded; while wealth and pomp in ever-increasing ratio are stimulating luxury and licentiousness, not only in the palaces of the great, but in the dwellings of the middle classes, who imitate and emulate the self-indulgence of many in higher grades;—can we see all this without lamenting how far, how very far we are from that condition of the world we are all hoping for, and how little progress we seem to be making towards it, with the means now possessed by the Church of God!

With such thoughts it is not surprising that many are expecting a different and more powerful agency than any now in operation, even the "glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." Their hopes are in Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar's image of gold, silver, brass and iron, symbolizing the "universal" empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, was cast down by the stone cut out without hands. This is to be a kingdom, in some sense similar to those it displaces—real, visible, universal. "The stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth." This is not yet true of the Church. We are therefore still expecting the triumph of the stone which is to "break to pieces" the remains of the last monarchy, which the "wind will carry away like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors." Then will the kingdom of God appear, not as now, only here and there as green hillocks in the desert, but as a "great mountain" filling "the whole earth." This kingdom "shall stand forever." (Dan. 2: 44.)

In another vision, also, the Millennial Reign as introduced by the Advent is taught by the same prophet. His own vision of the four beasts corresponds with Nebuchadnezzar's vision of the image. The fourth beast is the fourth, or iron kingdom, and its ten horns ten governments proceeding from it. And "behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days; and there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away." Then "the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him." It is therefore a fair inference that the Coming of the Son of Man here predicted is the cause of the triumph of the kingdom, and introduces the era of its perfect universal sway on the earth.

Our Lord frequently spoke of His coming again; but almost always in immediate connection with the final judgment. "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another." Matt. 25: 31, 46, 16, 27, 26, 64, Mark 8: 38, Acts 17: 31, II. Tim. 4: 1, 8; I. Pet. 4: 5. Such passages seem at first sight to indicate that the judgment will be immediately consequent on the Second Advent; and if so, that the Millennial age must precede the Advent. But our Lord and the Apostles spoke of His coming as immediately near, as the first great event to be expected, which would not be the case to our apprehension, if the millennial Reign were known to precede it. How could the Church be "looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God;" how could it be said, "The Coming of the Lord draweth near;" how could

He Bid Us Watch,

"lest coming suddenly He should find us sleeping," if He were not to come till a long period of Millennial glory had transpired? It is therefore inferred that our Lord spoke of the event which was the nearer and not of the one more remote; that which the church was first to expect. And as His Coming would be at once attended with judgment on the rebellious then living, and would be followed by a continued rule of righteousness, to close with the general judgment, He to whom a thousand years are as one day might appropriately speak of coming to judgment, though that judgment would only be completed at the termination of that thousand years. Thus the Apostles habitually urged the churches to be living in joyful hope of and diligent preparation for the "glorious appearing" of Christ, as the proximate great event in the history of the Church.

From such statements of Scripture it is inferred that while existing agencies are to be diligently employed to spread the truth, we are not to be discouraged if the result should illustrate the Lord's words, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come;" rather than for the conversion of all nations. (Matt. 24: 14.) If such universal conversion is the hope that chiefly animates missionary enterprise, a hope so long deferred may make the heart sick, and discourage exertion; whereas no difficulty and no apparent want of success are likely to lessen the labors of those who are hoping that speedily, even in our own day, Christ Himself may come to establish His kingdom throughout the world.

A Colored Thanksgiving.*

A LARGE, barn-like church, whitewashed on the outside, benches of rough boards, windows without glass, and rough board shutters to admit the light; colored people of all shades of complexion, from jet-black, to flaxen-haired, rosy-cheeked little girls, with blue eyes; but all pass for colored people. The church is filled, men sitting on one side, women on the other, all singing with enthusiasm.

"I'm going down Jorden,
Going down Jorden,
Going down Jorden,
To never return again."

After the singing, a gray-haired black man, born in Africa more than seventy years ago, begins the sermon thus:

"Friends and fellow sinners! the powers dat be, has invited us to jine in thanksgivin', an' we is mighty glad to be able to respond; for ef dere is a people which has a right to be thankful, it is we poor, low-down 'uns, which aint neber had noffin' in dis world. JESUS ENTERING JERUSALEM.

LESSON BY MRS. M. BAXTER FOR SEPT. 21, 1890. KE 19:37-48; GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 19:38.

Commission to the Two Disciples—The Duty of Unquestioning Obedience—Apparent Impossibilities Revealed—The Word of a King—The Change in Christ's Attitude—A Brief Hour of Triumph—A Unique Dominion—Conquest by Yielding—Tears for a Doomed City—The Church's Day of Visitation.

HE progress of Jesus on this, His last journey of any length before His sufferings, had been arrested by His encounter with blind Bartimeus, and His meeting with the publican. His times were in His hand, and Jesus was not tried in spirit. An unlooked-for interruption hindered Him. He was always and absolutely at the disposal of His heavenly Father, and tracing His life in all that happened, He received everything coming from Him, seeing persons and circumstances as altogether secondary. It is difficult for poor human nature to let go its hold on things visible and temporal, to endure as Jesus Him who is invisible, and to every passing circumstance. Our Lord trod the path of faith without variation, "leaving us an example that we should follow in His steps." From the plains of Jericho to the hills of Jerusalem was an ascent, "and when He was come to Bethpage and Bethany, at the mount called the Mount of Olives, He sent two of His disciples, saying; go ye into the village over against you; in the which at your entering ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man hath sat; loose him, and bring him hither." It is to do what the Lord commands, although there may be apparent difficulties in the way. He never threw the responsibility of a commission which He gave, on the shoulders of those who were to execute it. He who knew the hearts of all men, had already prepared the heart of the owner of the colt. And He said to His disciples: "If any man ask you, why do ye loose him? Thus shall ye say unto him, because the Lord hath need of him." Whatever may be the excuses, or apparent impossibilities, in the path which the Lord has traced before us, we must be absolutely sure that He has gone before to make room for us, and it is guilty unbelief when we are harassed and perplexed because we cannot see beforehand how we are to be extricated, or how, in perplexing relations with others, we can be justified in a line of conduct which, nevertheless, the Word of God sets out to us as the right one. His way is always a prepared one; our own may look the easiest, but, in the end, it will be found a false way. "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." (Prov. 14:12.)

Christ's message to the owner was

The Word of a King;

"The Lord hath need of him." Such a word is enough for the children of the kingdom. Many there are who are constantly occupied with the thought of their own need, and they rejoice in the blessed truth, "My God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory through Christ Jesus." (Phil. 4:19.) But that He should need us, that He can count upon us for any service to Him, this is indeed a glory, and an untold privilege. The disciples obeyed, and they "found even as He had said unto them." They were put to the test, the owners inquired what business they had to interfere with their property, and they found how the Lord had gone before them, and how His word sufficed as their authority, and they brought the colt to Jesus. For one brief hour

was changed. He who, up to this time came, "not to be ministered unto, but to minister," allowed Himself to be ministered to, "they cast their garments on the colt, and they set Jesus thereon." He who received "not honor from men," (John 5:41,) made an exception in the present instance, and allowed the people to cast their garments in the way, and did not hinder them when they "began to rejoice, and praise God for the mighty works that they had seen." He who, eighteen months before, when they of Galilee sought to "take Him by force, to make Him a King, departed again unto a mountain Himself alone," (John 6:15,) now, on His lowly beast of burden, quietly accepted the homage of the multitude of the disciples, who cried, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest." It was necessary that the Scripture should be fulfilled, that Zechariah's prophecy should have its fulfilment, and so there should be no excuse left to the Jews that they did not recognize their King, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold, thy King cometh unto thee; He is just, and having salvation; meek, and riding upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass." (Zech. 9:9.)

But this external triumph was of short duration. Until Jesus comes "again in His own glory and in the glory of His Father," His Kingship will not be known or acknowledged except among His faithful disciples. The Pharisees were the first to object; they would not suffer that this lowly Man, so unlike themselves, should be recognized as King. "Master," they said, "rebuke thy disciples." And He answered and said, unto them, "I tell you, that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." God must have His witnesses; if man will answer to His call, he may be the witness, if not, inanimate nature must serve God's purpose.

And when this, till now, unacknowledged King drew near to His royal city in the lowly state with which lowly people had invested Him, did He attempt to seize the reins of government? O no, His kingdom was "not of this world." His servants could not fight; could not resist evil; could not seek their own. Yet He was on the eve of such a conquest as outshines all the glories of all the heroes of history. He was about to conquer the foe which has overcome every conqueror the world has produced. Jesus was about to grapple with death itself, and the sin which is the sting of it. (1. Cor. 15:56.) He was about to deliver a multitude of captives whose sin cried out for death eternal. He was going to deliver them by his own surrender, and to put every instance of self-surrender or self-devotion in the world's history to the blush.

What did He do in his royal city? "When he was come near He beheld the city, and Wept Over It."

He had preached, had healed, had raised the dead, had worked miracles, and they did not believe; there was nothing left but to weep. Those tears of Jesus, sown in Jerusalem, shall yet bring forth a glorious harvest; but for the time He could only weep. Jerusalem had failed her King, and His heart was broken with sorrow. "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee around, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation."

Such was His appeal to the Jewish Church divided within herself, and nevertheless, full of self-complacency, Jerusalem was like Laodicea, could it be, that, had she owned her Lord, He might have been crucified by the Gentiles, and might have called His bride from Israel? We know not. In any case, the call to His Church in these days in which "there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female," but all are "one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28), is clear to leave all else for Him. But is the church of this day awakening to her high vocation? Does she know

The Time of Her Visitation?

Are Christians aware that "the time is short," and the days in which we live are solemn days, that there is no time to trifle, that if ever we would "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," it must be now? We thank God that all over the world there are those who are awakening to the call to a life out of self, a life in which adulation and flattery cannot live, subterfuge and evasion, all which has not the ring of truth cannot live—Calumny, strife, unkindness, all which manifests a want of love, cannot live, pride, conceit, vaunting, cannot exist. The air in certain circles is getting purer, there are Abrahams in these last days, who are willing to come out from country and kindred and the house of their fathers, who leave behind them the glory of their pedigree, the comforts of their home, the advantages of position, whether living in the midst of old surroundings, or going forth to China, India, or Africa, their "life is hid with Christ in God," they are no more of the world, even as Christ is not of the world. The old worldly principle "all see to their own," governs them no more, they are a heavenly people, their treasure, their citizenship, their home, their hopes, are in heaven. They look, "not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen" (II. Cor. 4:18,) they live in the light of eternity, not of time. And why? They have known the time of their visitation. And He who wept over Jerusalem rejoices over them, rests in His love, rejoices over them with singing. (Zeph. 3:17.) They are to be found in every land, in every church; denominations neither hinder nor help them; they are of all ages and in all circumstances; and surely the Lord is preparing them for His return. They have the true Spirit of the Bride, for the Bridegroom is all in all to them, and they live the life of self no more.

But the church as a whole; how far is it ready for the coming of the Lord? The chief evangelistic work is being done outside the churches, while within them the worldlings are ever on the increase; concerts, bazaars, entertainments are the rule; does it look as though she knew not the time of her visitation? Where are the girded loins and the burning lights which tell of a coming Bridegroom?

Jesus, His eyes yet wet with tears, "went into the temple." It was the place of all others consecrated to holy interviews with God; and He found it a money-making concern, and His soul shrank from such desecration. For another brief moment the authority of the King was exercised, He cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, and said, "It is written, my house is the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves."

CHRISTIAN TALK.

I WISH that Christians would engage in more religious conversation. I do not really think that Christian talk is of so high a type as it used to be. Some of you can look back to your very early days and remember how the neighbors used to come in and talk by the hour, about Christ and heaven and their hopes of the eternal world. There has a great deal of that gone out of fashion. I suppose that if ten or fifteen of us should happen to come into a circle to spend the evening, we would talk about politics or the recent flurry in financial circles, and about five hundred other things, and perhaps we would not talk any about Jesus Christ and our hopes of heaven. That is not Christianity; that is heathenism. Indeed, I have sometimes been amazed to find Christian people actually lacking in subjects of conversation while the two persons knew each of the other that he was a Christian. You take two Christian people of this modern day and place them in the same room, (I suppose the two men may have no worldly subjects in common.) What are they talking about? There being no worldly subject common to them, they are in great stress for a subject, and after a long pause Mr. A remarks: "It is a pleasant evening." Again there is a long pause. These two men, both redeemed by the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, heaven above them, hell beneath them, eternity before them, the glorious history of the Church of Jesus Christ behind them, certainly after a while they will converse on the subject of religion. A few minutes have passed and Mr. B remarks: "Fine Autumn we are having." Again there is a profound quiet. Now, you suppose that their religious feelings have really been dammed back for a little while; the men have been postponing the things of God, and eternity that they may approach the subject with more deliberation, and you wonder what useful thing Mr. B will say to Mr. A in conversation. It is the third time, and perhaps it is the last that these two Christian men will ever meet until they come face to face before the throne of God. They know it. The third attempt is now made. Mr. A says to Mr. B "Feels like snow!" My opinion is, it must have felt more like ice. Oh, how little real, practical religious conversation there is in this day! I would to God that we might get back to the old time Christianity, when men and women came into associations, and felt, "Here I must use all the influence I can for Christ upon that soul, and get all the good I can. This may be the last opportunity I shall have in this world of interviewing that immortal spirit." But there are Christian associations where men and women do talk out their religion; and my advice to you is to seek out all those things, and remember that just in proportion as you seek such society will you be elevated and blessed. After all, the Gospel boat is the only safe boat to sail in.

CHRISTIANITY AND WOMAN.

CHRISTIANITY is sometimes "wounded in the house of its friends." In some pulpits and professorships the knife of criticism is used not to demonstrate the divine character and completeness of revelation, but to expose what are imagined to be its defects and inconsistencies. Some who with solemn vows have been commissioned and sustained to do nothing but to defend and commend the Church of Christ are alert for any opportunity to invalidate its claims and weaken its influence and its testimony. It is a notable fact that throughout the heathen world from the earliest times, the general condition of woman was that of social degradation and oppression. The divine idea of the unity of husband and wife, the divine institution of the family, were abandoned, and woman was reduced to a condition little above that of a slave. The wife became the purchased property of the husband, acquired only for his service and absolutely subject to his will.

An exhaustive work on "Woman Outside Christianity," by J. G. Maudely of North Broughton, England, depicts her condition in every land, civilized and uncivilized, under all forms of religion. This work, the expansion of lectures delivered before a workingmen's institute, was inspired by the following sentiments of Mr. Gladstone, to whom the author has dedicated it. Says Mr. Gladstone: "When scepticism alleges that our advanced morality is really the work not of Christianity, but of civilization, require it to show cause why this advanced morality has never grown except under the ægis of the Gospel. When you are assured that marriage and the laws of purity are safe, ask how it was that the ancients, in these capital respects, marched continually downwards; and that only in Christian times and lands have these laws come to, and maintain, authority." Mr. Maudely declares "that the words of Christ and the preaching of the Apostles did bring about a great elevation of woman in the social compact, and a far better treatment of her than was ever known before, no unprejudiced historian would attempt to deny." And he adds that "this elevation was not due to race characteristics, as is proved by history."

In perfect consonance with this are the words of that wonderful preacher, F. W. Robertson: "Before Christ came the heathen had counted for divine the legislation of the man, manly strength, manly truth, manly courage. The life and Cross of Christ shed a splendor from heaven upon a new, and until then unheard of order of heroism—that which may be called the feminine order, meekness, endurance, long-suffering, the passion strength of martyrdom. For Christianity does not say, honor the wise, but blessed are the meek . . . In Christ is magnified not force of will but the glory of a divine humility. Therefore it was that from that time forward woman assumed a new place in this world."

Tertullian writes thus to his wife at the close of a book he dedicated to her: "How can I paint the happiness of a marriage which the Church ratifies, the oblation (the communion of the Lord's Supper) confirms, the benediction seals, angels announce, the Father declares valid? Even upon earth, indeed, sons not legitimately marry without the consent of their fathers. What a union of two believers—one hope, one vow, one discipline, and one worship! Where there is one flesh there is one spirit. Christ rejoices when He sees and hears this. He gives them His peace. Where two are together in His name there is He; and where He is there the evil one cannot come. It is impossible to form a higher ideal than this which was actually realized by the fathers and pastors of the second and third centuries. It is that which the world most needs to-day to save it from corruption.

THE ONLY SALT.

ONE of the sayings of our Lord, which is continuously illustrated in the history of the world, is "Ye are the salt of the earth." Addressed to His disciples, it was symbolic of the character and influence of His Church. It means that His Church is the only conserving power in this world of corruption. Christ represented His Church as the "kingdom of heaven," which He erected amid the general apostasy expressly to act as the regaining and preserving agency of the earth. It has always been, and is to-day, the only element which preserves the world from total corruption and withholds the outpourings of divine wrath. There is at this hour iniquity enough to precipitate the vengeance of Heaven. The partial disclosure of it in the daily press oppresses our limited judgment.

How must it appear to God's omniscience. The demon of iniquity seems to possess the paths of mankind. Hell "lets slip the dogs of war." Mammon consumes the sympathies and petrifies the heart. Intemperance from its cups pours out distress and damnation, burning up sensibility, desolating homes, flashing through the soul the red lightnings of remorse. Deceit with its cruel hand lashes the free-born children of God and tramples ruthlessly on human rights. Treachery abuses its trust, scandal sows the seeds of discord, and intrigue is breaking up domestic ties and civil order to gratify lust and ambition.

There is sin and crime enough here to paralyze the heavens and let down a fiery flood of wrath. Why then does God withhold it? Because of His Church. It is the object of His love and care, it is the sanctuary in which His who family is to be gathered before He expends His judgment. Let the churches as they resume work, realize that no agency, organization or institution can take the place of the Church of Christ in "overcoming the evil that is in the world" and saving it. Personal consecration to Christ and the personal enthusiasm of the Holy Ghost will conquer the world and make an abode of righteousness.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Green Mountain Farmer's Boy, John M. Thurston of Montpelier, Vt., will be the resident of the next National Convention of the Republican Clubs, which was this week called at Cincinnati, on the 21st, of April 1891.

Mr. Thurston is a young man, he has for years made Nebraska his home, having gone west with his father, a Union soldier, in 1860 when 13 years old. The family was very poor and young Thurston had to work on a farm, attending school when he had leisure. At eighteen he was a grocer in Chicago. He worked his way through University and, in 1868, was admitted to the bar, afterwards settling at Omaha. He has been in the state legislature and is a powerful speaker and very popular. The Republican Clubs all over the country are already at work to make the Convention the greatest in the history of the League. President Thurston's nomination is given above. The hottest election it has known in years came off during the year, resulting in a Republican victory that was better than a defeat. Big Republican victories were reported all over the State. Governor received less than half the majorities in 1888. The Democrats claim that the extravagance in National affairs, has shaken the earth and the earthquake that has shaken the Republic Gibraltar.

Superintendent Robert P. Porter has been greatly harassed by demands from a number of cities for a recount of population, on the ground that injustice has been done by the enumerators. In all except a few cases, the apportionment has been denied for sufficient reasons. At Albany, N. Y., Nashville, Tenn., and a few other cities where a test of the work of the enumerators confirmed its value. He testified that Helena, Mont., Portland, Ore., and Minneapolis, Minn., had been wronged, and so recounts were ordered there. In the two latter cities, this was done because the first count the population had been greatly exaggerated. With those exceptions, the work of the enumerators will stand.

Legislative Bombshell was Exploded in the United States Senate, a few days ago by the introduction of a resolution by Senator Sherman for unrestricted reciprocity with Canada. The subject of common talk everywhere in the nation, and the question is asked whether the Canadian government will now cease its opposition to reciprocity, since it has become the topic of the day. The Sherman resolution gives ample scope for negotiation, mutual concession and the protection of interests equal to the material and political prosperity of the Dominion. Although the present Canadian Ministry is known to be opposed to closer relations, there is a strong sentiment at Montreal and Toronto in favor of the Sherman bill. The Canadian press has been very out in its favor.

New York is Watching with Bated Breath the operation of a law lately enacted and which has gone into effect, prohibiting the use of tobacco in public in any form by boys under 16. It is being rigidly enforced and the result is a gratifying diminution in the number of cigarette smokers in the streets and elsewhere.

British Trades Union Congress Opened in Liverpool on the 1st, inst. with five hundred delegates. In Europe, as in this country, the workmen are divided among themselves, and there is a struggle in prospect between the old Unions for the mastery, the new favorable measures, which the old deprecate. The proposition is to raise wages by increasing the amount of labor in the market.

Mr. Watkins, the President of the Congress, predicted a great labor revival. He said the time had come for an eight-hour day, and advocated labor representation in Parliament, State control of railways and nationalization of the land. The Congress, on a vote, recorded itself overwhelmingly in favor of eight hours.

The Week in other Lands has been a Somewhat eventful one. Cholera continues to spread in Southern Europe, although its violence is believed to be about spent. Several Mediterranean ports have been quarantined. A bridge over the river Moldau at Prague, in Austria, collapsed, drowning thirty persons. The Armenian revolutionary party have issued a manifesto urging their oppressed countrymen to fight Russia. Dr. Peters, the German explorer, at a banquet in Munich, declared that the King of Uganda would not accept an English Protectorate. One half of Salonica, the largest town in European Turkey next to Constantinople, has been destroyed by fire. A railroad is projected across Australia. A company is said to have been formed in England for the purpose of buying Irish estates and re-selling them to tenants. A number of passengers were killed by an accident to the night mail on the Northern Railway, between Ailly and La Faloise, France, on Thursday.

Boulangism is very Far from being Dead, if what is reported by the cable be true. The "brav" general" declares that he still hopes to play a prominent part in the affairs of France, and to revenge himself upon his enemies. His friends in the Chamber of Deputies admit that he has relations with Prince Jerome Napoleon, and the Count de Paris. Should Boulanger be the means of reseating a Napoleon on the imperial throne of France, it would be one of the strangest events in modern history, and a direct fulfilment of the forecasts made by many students of prophecy.

The Aftermath of the Great Railroad Strike is still under consideration by the Board of Arbitration. During the week the Board heard a number of witnesses, both for the Knights of Labor and the New York Central Railroad Company. Mr. H. Walter Webb, (whose portrait is given in this column,) the acting President of the road, made a most interesting witness, detailing the events that led up to the dismissal of the men and denying emphatically that they were discharged because of their connection with the Knights. He declared that only seventeen of the seventy-eight discharged were members of the order. Messrs. Powderly, Lee, Holland and others of the Knights maintained that the Order was the point of attack. A mass of evidence was submitted and there were some pretty flat contradictions. The decision of the Board has not yet been announced. Mr. Webb, before his connection with the Central, was in the management of the Wagner Palace Car Company, and it was under his supervision that many notable improvements were adopted in that service. He is thirty-nine years old, a prodigious worker, and possessed of fine executive ability. His management of the strike will probably make him the next president of the Central Road.

The Return of Henry George from his Australian tour on the opening day of the Single Tax National Conference in New York City gave a new interest to that movement which has been quiescent for many months past. The platform adopted declares that no one should be permitted to hold property without a fair return; that the products of labor should be untaxed; and that national, state and municipal revenue should be raised by a single tax, levied upon land values, irrespective of the improvements.

There is Not a Drop of Liquor to be Found in the towns of South Dakota. This is the direct result of the passage of the Prohibition law which affects every one of the mining towns in the Black Hills, where rum has been the curse of the community and the cause of numberless crimes. Of course the saloon element in towns like Deadwood is furious, and the drinkers are desperate, but the law-abiding Christian people of the territory have decided that there can be no future for that part of Dakota, if rum's reign is perpetuated and so the saloons have gone. Thirty-eight were closed in a single town by injunction.

One of the Best Known Literary Figures in Washington is Frank Hatton, the editor of the Post, who is now reported to be seriously ill. Mr. Hatton, when a lad of ten was a newspaper carrier at Cadiz, Ohio. That was in 1855, and in 1884, the Ohio newsboy was a member of the President's Cabinet, holding the important portfolio of Postmaster-General. The biography of his active and progressive career as a printer, soldier, journalist and statesman would fill a page of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Hatton, (whose portrait we publish,) is a thorough editor and like Greeley, has learned his profession from the ground up, beginning as a worker at the case. He is exceedingly popular at the National Capital and his death would leave a marked vacancy in the newspaper world.

Mr. E. A. Vail, Superintendent of the Union Gospel Mission, New Orleans, writes to express his thanks for the liberal response to his appeal recently published in these columns. The needs of the mission are urgent and numerous, and he begs the continued help of Christian friends. His address is 163 Camp Street, New Orleans, La.

An appeal to the World's Fair Commissioners asking them not to have the exhibition open on Sundays, if they succeed in getting it open on week-days, is being prepared for presentation to them at their meeting next month. All churches, associations and institutions desiring to co-operate and add their support to this appeal are invited to communicate with the American Sabbath Union, 23 Park Row, New York.

Rev. Thomas Needham has accepted an invitation to hold evangelistic services at Calais, Me., commencing next Sunday. Mr. Needham's work in Pennsylvania and the South has been signally blessed of God.

The Young Men's Hebrew Benevolent Society of Montreal has received a letter from Baron Hirsch enclosing a cheque for 20,000 dollars, with promise of further help, to aid in the establishment of a Home at Montreal to receive Jewish immigrants until they are able to obtain work.

The School for Christian workers at Springfield, Mass., has just issued its fifth annual report. It shows that during the past year the attendance at the regular school has been 62; in the school for preparing young men for the work of Y. M. C. A. 49; and in that of Sunday school and Pastors' Helpers 13. Henceforward the two schools which make up the institution will be under separate financial management though co-operating in joint expenses. The name "School for Christian Workers," which heretofore has applied to the two schools, will hereafter be the name of only one of them; namely, "The Training School for Sunday-school Workers and Pastors' Helpers," while the other school has become incorporated under the name of "The Young Men's Christian Association Training School."

CHRIST'S TESTIMONY.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR
C. H. SPURGEON.

The Statistics of Christian Work—Two Estimates of the Effect of Christ's Teaching—The Results of Present Effort—The World is not to be Converted by Preaching—I. The Testifier—His Origin—His Character—His Personal Testimony—The Lord of Life—II. His Testimony—To the Atonement—To Access to God—To the Principle of Worship—III. The Rejecters—IV. Those who Received the Testimony—The Seal to a Trust Deed.

"He that hath received His testimony hath set to his seal that God is true," John 3:33.

IN opening this discourse, I would call your attention to the different statistics given by John's disciples, and by John himself. In the twenty-sixth verse, the disciples say, "All men come to Him;" that is their judgment of how the ministry of Jesus was succeeding. John, in the thirty-second verse, said, "And no man receiveth His testimony." Be very doubtful of statistics; they depend very much upon the person compiling them. Some, with sanguine spirit, say everything that is delightful and encouraging; others, with more serious, and with perhaps more severe judgment, say much that is depressing.

I am inclined to take both these opinions with a grain of salt; each one was intended for truth, but neither of them was exact. We often hear persons say that there are crowds attending such a ministry, the people block up the gangways, they fill every seat, and the preacher is very useful, for "all men come to Him." This may be true; and yet there may be few conversions, and little spiritual result; so that another may as truly say, "No man receiveth His testimony." Ah, dear friends, we can never be satisfied with a numerous congregation; we want souls to receive the testimony of Christ!

John's Report.

Forgetting what the disciples reported, let us now look at what John said, "No man receiveth His testimony." He did not mean literally that no one received the truth, for his next word was, "He that hath received His testimony." He meant that comparatively none received it. Compared with the crowds who came to Him, compared with the nation of Israel, compared with the human race, those who received Christ's testimony were so few that his sadness made Him call them none. John, though he went a little below the mark, was not far from the truth when he said, "No man receiveth His testimony."

In these profound and wordy days this is called the "pessimist" view of things. However, if it was not precisely the truth, it was mournfully near it. To-day, Christ is preached, and many will come to hear about Him; but, alas, few receive the Gospel into their hearts. Go through these crowded streets, and mark how few receive the sacred testimony. Go into our provincial towns and country villages, and note how few receive the truth as it is in Jesus. When you look at the denominational rolls at the end of the year, what small additions have been made! I think one section of the church reports one addition for the year. If any community reports as high as three or four per cent., people think wonders are accomplished. The world can never be converted at the rate at which we are now going on for the increase of population is greater than the increase of the churches. We are relatively further back than we were. There are more Christians; but there are fewer Christians in proportion to the population.

I. First, let us observe

The Testifier.

Who is this testifier? this witness? We answer that, according to the context, it is "He that cometh from above." To save us, there has not come to us a man whose origin was at His birth, but one who existed long before, and descended from above. It is true that Jesus was born at Bethlehem; but it is equally true that He had a pre-existence from before all worlds. The Word was from the beginning with God; "without Him was not anything made that was made." He was God as truly before He became man as ever He was afterwards. He that has come to save us has, in the highest sense, come from above. Let this kindle hope in the sinner's mind, and draw forth faith in The Divine Ambassador.

He was one of the very highest character. Observe: "He that cometh from above is above all; he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth; He that cometh from heaven is above all." All other messengers that God has sent have had much earthliness about them; and assuredly, we who are now His messengers, have much of it. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels;" but there was nothing in our Lord Jesus that could debase the messenger. He was pure, perfect, heavenly; and though He bore our nature, yet He shared not our sinfulness; and though He spoke in our tongue, and brought down the mysteries of heaven to our comprehension, yet still He spoke them in a heavenly style—a style to which a mere man could never have reached. Moses wrote as a man, and the Spirit of God only revealed truth measurably by him; but our Lord Jesus Christ was full of grace and truth, and He spoke with a manhood united to Godhead, having the Spirit without measure.

We are further told by John a very important fact, which ought to weigh with every thoughtful mind. The testimony of Jesus is Personal Testimony;

"what He hath seen and heard, that he testifieth." Christ's teaching is not second-hand: "No man knoweth the Father, save the Son." Who taught Him wisdom? Whence hath this Man knowledge? From His own self, from His own eternal experience, as dwelling with God before all worlds. He speaks to us. Do you want a better messenger, my hearers? How can the Lord serve you better than by sending one who knows what He declares, knows it by having heard, and seen, and handled it?

Once more only. Concerning this testifier, we learn that He is the Lord and Giver of life, and if we will, but accept His testimony, we shall live thereby. He hath life in Himself, and He has power to quicken whomsoever He will. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." And, to make the matter still more pressing, the word of warning is added, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." O my dear hearers, I wish I had the power to set forth my Lord as the witness! As I cannot do this as I would, I commend to you the passage of Scripture itself. The sentences are short, sharp, crisp, clear; and they show you who He is whom God hath sent on the great errand of divine love. Refuse Him not, I implore you.

II. Secondly hearken to His Testimony.

What is the testimony of Jesus? What has the Christ to tell us concerning God? I will only use the three chapters which precede my text, and I shall gather enough from them to give a fair outline of what Jesus tells us of the Father, and His willingness to forgive and save.

First, he tells us, God has provided an atonement. Look at the twenty-ninth verse of the first chapter, where John says, "Behold, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The very fact that the Son of God came here as man to suffer for our sin, proves that God has provided a great and all-sufficient sacrifice. The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us all from sin. Jesus has died; and in that death He has finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness. All believers are forgiven through His death. God is willing that you, believing in His dear Son, should be so forgiven as to be washed whiter than snow. That is Christ's testimony to you; and he that receiveth it has set to his seal that God is true.

The next testimony of Jesus is that the Lord has made a way of access between man and God. See you the fifty-first verse of the first chapter. He said to Nathanael, "Verily, verily I say unto you, hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." Jacob's ladder is not now before you as a dream, but as a reality. The Son of man, the Incarnate God, in Christ Jesus, is the way by which there be commerce between man and God. We go up to God, and the angels of God, laden with blessings, can come down to men. The gulf is bridged, a glorious stairway has been made across the dread abyss which separated guilty man from his offended God. Jesus Christ himself, in His own person, is that ladder. He bears witness thereof to you. Sin is away, and distance is removed.

Spirituality Essential.

What is the next part of His testimony? It will find it in the third chapter: "God is to be approached in a spiritual way." To go to God, "ye must be born again." That which is born of flesh is flesh, and cannot commune with God, who is a spirit. That which is of the Spirit is spirit, and can commune with the holy God, and understand spiritual things. My hearers, there is no coming to God by the priest of human consecration, no coming outward ritual, form, and ceremony: "God is Spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." You have a spiritual nature, that the Spirit of God may commune with you.

Jesus also testified plainly that from all believe in Him the Lord has removed condemnation. "It is written, 'He that believeth in the Son is not condemned.' He that believeth is justified, and 'being justified by faith, we have peace with God.' Guilty and condemning you may be this hour, if you accept the Son of God to stand for you, you are not condemned. There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." Though sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow. You can be saved; yea, if you now believe in Christ Jesus, you are saved. All heavenly legions are yours now, where you now sit. You shall be yours world without end. Glory to God!

III. With great heaviness we now notice

The Rejecters:

"No man receiveth His testimony." I would have thought that the moment this testimony was delivered to the world, every man would have hastened to hear it, and would have believed it with joyful readiness; but, alas, very reverse happened. If I went to a sea full of fish rushing towards me; but not so. Men, as a rule, will not accept heavenly salvation; no man will receive the gift moved by God the Holy Ghost. Why is this?

In the case of many, it is because they are earthly; the message and the messenger are heavenly for them. They are earth-bound, earth-buried. They are so busy; how can they consider the grand fact that God has come down to save men? They will think of great spiritual truth one of these days, they have made sufficient money, and can afford to have nothing better to do than to attend to the claims of God. God is second rate in their esteem. They are so occupied, and their thoughts are so busy with daily cares of this life, that God's claims must wait their convenience.

Some of the rejecters of the Word of the Lord, I have no doubt, were too learned to believe in anything so simple as the statement that God was among them in human form to live and die for men. Though this is in truth the sublimest of all mysteries, yet a pride counts it a small matter: it is to them a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness. Men know so much that they will not know God. I am struck every day, when viewing books of the present period, with the wise fools are nowadays. Pardon me; I say it differently, and say—how foolish the wise are nowadays. I mean the same thing, which I say it. It is to-day as it was in our Lord's day, "not many wise men after the flesh are ed." Still have we to ask, "Where is the scribe? Where is the scribe of this world?" Those who glory in worldly wisdom cannot receive the testimony of carpenter's Son—a testimony so plain that poor and illiterate can understand it, and enter into eternal life thereby. I hope this will be the case with any of the more cultured among you. Be willing to take Christ's yoke to you, and learn of Him.

Pedigree and Privilege.

Certain people did not receive the testimony of Jesus because they were too proud. Pedigree and privilege kept many away. Read this in the first chapter:—"He came unto His own, and His own received him not." Why? Because they thought they were God's own. Did they not wear a text of Scripture upon their eyes? Had they not broad robes of blue to their dress? Did they not mint, and anise, and cummin, and other yeworths of herbs? Did they not fast thrice a week, and so on? What did they want of Jesus? Those who professed to belong to Him and cried, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we," were too good to get a Saviour, too near to heaven to need a messenger from God.

The real reason for rejecting the testimony of Jesus was this—they were too evil to receive it. Unbelieving hearers, if you were better men, you would more readily accept the light of Christ! If men were not such sinners as we are, they would come to Him to learn the will of the Lord. Alas! the depth of man's sin has hardened his heart, and darkened his eyes, and made him prefer darkness. We will conclude by speaking upon the last point. Let us commune with Those Who Receive Christ's Testimony.

Those people begin with believing in Jesus, and then turn aside to believe in their own feelings; you must not do so. You must believe in Christ, keep right on believing. The just shall live by faith. We receive Christ and keep on believing Him. "He that receiveth His testimony." Do you refuse anything to which Jesus testifies? This is evil. Receive His testimony with unquestioning faith. Some men believe any monstrous assertion of science or spiritualists, or rationalists; but they do not believe the plain witness of the Lord Jesus Christ. The man who takes in the teaching of Jesus, and keeps to it, he is the saved man.

He takes in the testimony of Jesus for himself, and receives it as his own possession. That is saves from sin is true; that He saves me is a more personal truth. Christ will save those who believe. This is good. But "I have, and therefore I am saved," is better. Personal appropriation is the best receiving. Get the truth of Jesus for your own soul; it is by the grip of a personal faith, and then have it. You have seen a boy with a burn-lamp—he concentrates all the rays of the sun so as to produce a burning; even so, by concentrating the testimony of Jesus upon your own case, and you will soon feel a wonderful power working in your soul. He that receives the testimony of Jesus makes it his food, and is saved thereby.

Doubt Excluded.

Receivers of Christ's testimony allow nothing to make them doubt what He has said. When a believer is down in the dumps, and is passing through a dark time, he says, "What Jesus said is true for all this. He has told me if I believe in Him, I have eternal life, and I know it, however gloomy things may appear. He says it and I cannot doubt Him." It is a good thing to have your confidence outside of yourself; it is glorious to have it all in Christ. The foregoing will enable you to see the truth of the statement, "He that hath received His testimony hath set to his seal that God is true." The olden time men did not often write their testimonies, because they could not write at all.

Even kings set their seal, because they could not give a signature. To this day, how often does it happen to me, as a trustee to a chapel or a school, to have a paper laid before me, and I not only sign my name, but I put my finger on that red wafer, which represents my seal, and I say, "This is my act and deed!" When you believe in Jesus, you have set your seal to the testimony of Jesus, which is the revelation of the Lord. You have certified that you believe in God as true. What does that mean? It means not only that He has kept His promise as made to the fathers in the Old Testament, and will keep it in Christ Jesus; but it means also, that to you God is real.

The Way to Holiness.

Between you and God there will be henceforth a holy confidence; and what will that lead to? It will lead to holiness of life, and earnest seeking to please God, in whom you unreservedly believe. You will love Him with all your heart, and with all your soul, now that confidence is created. See what a change faith makes! Have you never heard of a servant who believed hard things of her mistress? She thought her a tyrant, and resolved that she would do nothing to please her. When she did her work, she did it very badly, and thought it was quite good enough for such a creature as her mistress. But she heard something about her which entirely changed her opinion. Instead of thinking her a demon, she judged her to be little less than an angel. It might have seemed a small matter, but it was not so. She did her work zealously and gladly, now that her suspicions were ended. Faith in her mistress affected her whole life. So is it in spiritual things. Faith in Christ Jesus is the fountain of obedience, the ensign of a change of heart. God grant it to you all! Amen.

THE CITIES OF KOR.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for September 21.

"Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord." Luke 19:38.

AN extraordinary page of history is that of the ancient Kingdom of Kor, or Cor as the Romans spelled it. Never has there been just such a kingdom for tumults, revolutions, experiments in government, the triumphs of unworthy factions, the prevalence of corruption and the rapidity of purification. Its founder and rightful king surpassed any ruler who ever lived in wisdom and in the enlightened system of his government. But Kor was a peculiar land. Its cities were many and various. They varied in size, in soil, in climate, in inhabitants, and in their mode of life. Some were cities of trade and manufacture; others were given up entirely to pleasure. They were practically independent, though each had so many connections, social and commercial, with other cities, that they influenced each other a great deal. But they were independent as to their government. Every city-council could settle the kind of government the city should have and could, if they so pleased, decide that the king should be the supreme ruler. Or the council could dispense with his rule and govern the city themselves, or delegate the government to any one citizen or committee of citizens. That privilege arose from a cherished principle of the king's. He wished to rule, and, indeed, claimed the right to rule, but he would not exercise the right unless he was formally invited to do so by the city council. That invitation was seldom given, as the citizens preferred to manage their own affairs.

Truth to tell, they managed badly, as a rule. The better elements of society kept in the background and the worst elements were predominant in most of the cities. The dominant faction in nine out of ten of all the cities of Kor was a group of men who were known as Cupidates. They were the lowest in intelligence and culture and self-control of all the classes, but they were strong and energetic, and they had forced their way to power. The city councils in many cases were ashamed of being subservient to the Cupidates and often spasmodically resisted their dictation, but the struggle was generally short. The Cupidates made things right with the council by bribes or privileges and in one way or another managed to keep control. They were a bad lot, worse than the Whyos or any street-gang in New York.

Though they were all called Cupidates, there were many subdivisions of them. The list of their names would be too long to give here, but two of them deserve special mention. These were the Seculi and the Ebrietates. The Seculi governed a very large number of cities of Kor. All those cities were wealthy. Wherever the Seculi were in power, they "made things hum," as we say here. Those cities got on, but though there was plenty of money, the streets were badly paved, the sewage system was neglected and epidemics frequent. The police arrangements were bad, too; crime was prevalent and rarely punished. In fact the Seculi were so busy pushing business that they had no time for any other work.

The Ebrietates were a very different kind of men. When they obtained control of a city, as they often did, when the other citizens were weak, the city was sure to be ruined. They were the worst of all factions of the Cupidates. They were fond of banquets which became orgies and they neglected everything else to attend them. Under their rule the city was always in disorder, full of rioting and boisterous hilarity, and often of fighting and bloodshed. There were instances on record of the Ebrietates having burned cities after gaining control of them. A bad set they were, but once dominant they held on and it was next to impossible to oust them. But that was characteristic of all the Cupidates and every faction of them made bad rulers.

Gradually the condition of the kingdom of Kor became deplorable. Almost every city was controlled by the Cupidates and was full of corruption and misery of all kinds. I suppose there was not a city in the land that had not at some time tried to shake off the yoke. They felt themselves disgraced by being governed by the lowest and most degraded of their citizens. But scarcely any succeeded in emancipating themselves, and after a short time of cleaner rule they fell back into their old ways, which were more easy and pleasant.

It was strange that the cities that groaned under the yoke did not invite the king to govern them. Some of them did think of it, but the Cupidates dissuaded them. They told the council that the king was a tyrant; that he would interfere with business, close the theatres, stop the races, and put an end to all pleasures and amusements. If that argument did not succeed, they would say that the king was angry at being slighted so long and if a petition were sent to him he would reject it. It would be a humiliation to send the petition and a double-humiliation to have it rejected. This was always the plea that the Cupidates kept as a last resort, and it generally caused the council to vote against sending the petition.

At last a report of what the Cupidates were doing reached the ears of the king himself and he was very indignant. He hated to be misrepresented. He resolved to send a messenger to Kor to declare his real disposition, and that there might be no question as to the truth of the message he sent his own son. The son journeyed thither in a very unostentatious way. No army, nor officers of state accompanied him nor did he wear the crown or the royal robes. He wore the same clothes that were worn by the citizens of Kor and looked like the humblest of them. On his arrival, he delivered his message in a quiet way to a few cities and then sent special messengers to every city in the land. They were ordered to state it clearly and simply so that every city might understand it. The gist of the message was that any city desiring to be delivered from anarchy and the rule of the Cupidates, might send an invitation to him and he would come and establish peace, order and good government, and rule the city himself. The messengers were ordered to lay special emphasis on one fact. They were to say that the only condition was that a formal invitation be sent to the king's son. This was necessary because many cities had the idea that it was necessary to reform and clean up before sending the invitation. He told his messengers to say explicitly there was no need for that. He would see to the purification of the city when he assumed power, and he could do it better than they. The foulest city in Kor might invite him and he would come at once and put things right. The citizens must stand by him and support his authority and he would clear the city of its foulness and have the Cupidates in prison in short order. Anarchy, corruption and crime would disappear and the citizens become prosperous, contented and happy.

And he kept his word. Several of the worst cities in Kor sent invitations and they were promptly accepted. The change in them was marvellous, and they sent out messengers to other cities to tell how well the change worked, and urge them to send an invitation too. Of course the Cupidates resisted, but they were beaten in many instances. Sometimes the city council assembled in the night, and sent an invitation without consulting them. Sometimes the Cupidates were excluded from the council-chamber, and no hearing given to them. There was always a way of overcoming them, when the council were in earnest. When they were not in earnest, and were willing that the rule of the Cupidates should continue, no invitation was sent, and things went on in the old way. It was worthy of notice, however, that no instance was ever recorded of a city regretting giving itself up to the rule of the King's son, or ever reversing the words they uttered at his inauguration, "Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord."

A CHRISTIAN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

FEW persons have had a more remarkable experience of the Saviour's love and care for His trusting ones than Mrs. Bella Cooke, the story of whose life was published in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Much of the information furnished in our recent article was drawn from a volume entitled Rifted Clouds, written in autobiographical form by Mrs. Cooke and published by Palmer & Hughes, Bible House, New York. It is the graphic yet simple story of a life full of Christian faith and endeavor, and shows the happiness of one who has received the "fullness of blessing" while in this life.

THE CITY OF GUATEMALA.

AN unpleasant interest attaches to the city of Guatemala, a picture of which is here given, from the popular demonstration against our minister there, which took place last week. The cause of the indignation against him arose out of the killing of Gen. Barrundia when he was on board a United States ship. Barrundia had taken refuge there, believing himself safe under the stars and stripes from the hostility of his Guatemalan enemies and when an effort was made him, the protected Mizner, the United States Minister, however, the Captain to him, and tain had But Bar-sist'd and It would be impro-comment Mizner's as his own-tion has date of been re-This ex-may show that Mr. Mizner had good reason for his conduct, which at first sight seems incomprehensible. There can be no question as to the way it is viewed in Guatemala. An angry and excited crowd surrounded the Legation, on Sept. 3, shouting, "Death to the Yankees" and it was necessary to surround the building with a strong guard to prevent the mob wrecking the house. A daughter of Barrundia succeeded in making her way in and tried to shoot Mr. Mizner, but he intercepted her shot with a large book that he had in his hand at the time. The widow of Barrundia has taken the wiser course of appealing to President Harrison and a promise of an investigation has been made to her. It may be hoped that the result of the investigation will be to vindicate Mr. Mizner and that the hostile feeling of the people toward him and toward the United States will be allayed. Our readers will be the more ready to take a prayerful interest in this result from the fact that a member of the Legation, Consul-Gen. Hosmer, has several times contributed articles to this journal on the religious condition of Central America. May God preserve his valuable life!

The city of Guatemala is situated on a plateau nearly 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. The journey thither from the Pacific coast seventy-two miles away, is through a succession of magnificent scenes of natural beauty. The city itself is much like one of our own cities. The streets intersect the avenues at right angles and they and the avenues are known by numbers, not names. Near the centre of the city stands the Cathedral, an imposing edifice of beautiful design. Fronting it is the chief plaza of the city, called the Plaza des Armes. Two of the sides of the Plaza are occupied by Government offices and the fourth by small stores. The centre of the Plaza is a circular garden, rich in tropical plants of rare beauty.

The population of the city is about 70,000. The religious provision consists of about twenty-eight Roman Catholic Churches, and one Protestant Chapel. The pastor of the latter is a most zealous worker who is trying to establish branch missions in various parts of the city. The most hopeful religious work in the city is the personal work that this pastor and his native helpers are doing. Though nominally Catholic a large number of the people of Guatemala are infidel, in life, if not in creed and it is only by personal contact with them, outside the churches, that they can be won for Christ. Valuable help in such work, it has been found can be given by Mexicans who have been trained in Bishop H. C. Riley's educational institutions.

The Republic of Guatemala, of which Guatemala City is the Capital, covers an area of 44,800 square miles (about the size of the State of Pennsylvania,) and has a population of 1,222,544. Like other Central American countries, in the lowlands the negroes and Indians form the majority while the whites occupy the high table-lands. In the secluded valleys among the mountains, they are still to be found also specimens of the original Toltec race, the degenerate descendants of the men who built the fortresses and mounds, the ruins of which excite the wonder and admiration of the explorer. All over Guatemala are to be found the ruins of their cities, still bearing traces of inscriptions in a symbolic language of historical events, meteorological data, and astronomical observations. Under their Spanish conquerors they sank into comparative barbarism.

Like all the Central American States, Guatemala has been the scene of innumerable revolutions, assassinations and foreign invasions. The recent struggle with Salvador is only the latest of a long list of such struggles. It arose from the strong desire of its President, Don Manuel Lisandro Barillas (whose portrait is given on page 588) to unite all Central America under one strong government. He found a strong opponent to his scheme in the Republic of Salvador. The people of that country suspected that the essence of the plan was practically for Guatemala to absorb or annex its sister republics, and they resisted it. He endeavored to carry his point by force, but was defeated. Since that time, it is alleged, Barillas has been intriguing to secure the election of a President of Salvador favorable to the Union. To punish this interference, General Ezeta, of Salvador, invaded Guatemala, and was pushing on toward the capital, defeating the Guatemalan forces in several battles, when by the mediation of the United States Government a treaty of peace was arranged. The treaty was formally signed on August 28th.

A RECEPTION ON THE GOLD COAST.

THE accompanying illustration gives a graphic idea of an African festival. It is taken from a sketch made on the spot by a member of the staff of the Governor of the Gold Coast on Western Africa. The fete was held to celebrate the arrival of the Governor, who has recently been appointed to that post. The Gold Coast is part of the British possessions in Africa. It is an area of 16,620 square miles, with an estimated population of 520,000. Originally it was held in joint possession by the Dutch and British, but in 1872, an arrangement was made by which the Dutch government ceded to Great Britain exclusive right to the country. Gold is found there in small grains, mixed with red sand and gravel, and occasionally in quartz. The district is also valuable for its oil palms, which grow there in profusion. Of late, the exports have had another useful addition in the shape of rubber, of which hundreds of tons are now shipped annually to the English markets.

A Native Reception to the Governor of the Gold Coast of Western Africa.

On the landing of the new Governor, Sir Baldwin Griffith, recently, the native chiefs assembled, with their people, to give him a loyal reception. "The noise of the tom-toms," says the officer reporting the novel entertainment, "the peals of the trumpets, the roar of the drums, the yells of the fog-horns, and the cries of the people were literally deafening as they paraded in front of the Governor and his staff; some of them dancing wild and grotesque dances all the time. Chiefs carried flags covered with strange devices; and as they passed the platform on which the Governor was seated, they held them out before him as a token of their faith and loyalty. The Governor having addressed a speech of welcome to them, through an interpreter, the crowds dispersed."

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Trial and Discouragements.

THERE was one to whom Wescott must break the news of his decision to become a minister, and that person was Addie More. Somehow he felt a terrible apprehension. What would she think of his resolve? Would she, could she consistently cast in her lot with one who had chosen that vocation for his life-work. There was torture in the thought of the possibilities that might be involved. But the matter had to be decided sometime, the sooner the better, and so, one beautiful moonlight evening about the middle of September, he drove over to the North Side, and found her ready to accompany him in a drive to the country.

How should he introduce the subject weighing on his mind? An hour passed, when Addie said:

"So you are going to talk to us in Dr. Hamlyn's church next Sunday evening. You will become a preacher yet, I suppose," she subjoined archly."

"If I should, you would be a preacher's wife," he replied, trying to speak in a composed tone, though he did not succeed very well. "How would that do?"

The blush that tinged her cheeks made her look lovely in the vague moonlight; but there was a serious expression on her face which she could not disguise, as she replied: "Oh! I should be poorly qualified for a minister's wife."

"Why?"

"You speak as if you were actually serious," she said, glancing up at him in surprise. "The reason is self-evident. In the first place, I'm not a Christian, and that would be an insuperable barrier. A minister's life would be a burden to him if his wife didn't sympathize with him and help him to carry on his mission. Besides, ministers and ministers' wives are always talked about so much that I could never endure the publicity."

Howard's heart sank. This was the most severe ordeal through which he had yet passed. Should he abandon all his cherished hopes, and go back to the law for Addie's sake? The temptation was strong, for he loved her very dearly. But as he thought of the two careers, he could not yield. In the one he would be concerned in legal technicalities, contending in the courts with unscrupulous opponents; in the other he would be working for Christ, winning souls for Him, comforting the mourner, cheering the sorrowing, pointing the perplexed and the sin-burdened to the Light of the world. No; not even Addie's love, precious as it was, could turn the scale.

"Addie," he said, "I can do no other. I must do my duty at whatever cost to you or to me. I have decided to be a minister."

The girl started as if her heart had been suddenly pierced by an arrow, and her face became ashen. It was plain that an awful struggle was going on in her bosom, which heaved with an emotion that she tried in vain to suppress.

"Howard," she said, at length, "I do not see my duty clear. In my present state of mind I could not make you a good wife. While I could sympathize with you in your struggles, I would, I fear, have little sympathy with the mission of your life, only a formal interest at least. I should be a hindrance, a clog to you. And yet," she almost gasped, "and yet how can I—how can I give up my hopes of happiness!" and the poor girl hid her face in her hands and broke into tears.

"My darling," said Howard, "you don't think of breaking the engagement, do you? Oh, you can't contemplate such a thing! Addie, go to God with your doubts, let Him give you the truth," he pleaded. "and then there will be no difficulty."

"I can't," the girl declared, despairingly. "It will be harder than ever to do so now. I couldn't keep you out of my thoughts; I couldn't be sure of my motives. God couldn't accept me. No, I cannot mock Him by going to Him for pardon when it would be my love for you rather than for Him that prompted me to do so."

"But I will not consent to having the engagement broken," Howard said, "Let it remain as it is. I am sure God will find a way of escape from our perplexities."

"Does God care?" she asked incredulously and very sadly. "If He does, why does He permit so much sorrow among His creatures?"

"Oh! Addie, you are so sceptical."

"Yes, you see how I am. I can't help it. Shall I give you back your ring?"

"Keep it," he said decisively. Then he added, more kindly: "You are taking too despondent a view of the case. All will be right yet, I feel sure." They had now reached her home, and as he lifted her from the carriage, he said: "Kiss me good-night, Addie, and don't borrow trouble."

"Have I a right to kiss you?" she said, looking at him with tearful eyes. "Perhaps—"

"Not another word," he enjoined, and taking her in his strong arms, he pressed his lips passionately upon hers.

But as he drove home the grim form of his old unbelief, rose before his mental vision like a spectre of portentous form, and it was only after a period of agitated struggle upon his knees that it disappeared, leaving him calm and victorious. As much as possible he kept this new phase of trouble out of his mind during the week, so that it would not interfere with the preparation of the address he was to deliver on the ensuing Sabbath evening. The address gave him little trouble, except to select what he wanted to say from the many thoughts that crowded upon him. Almost before he was aware of it, Sunday evening had come, and he was on his way to the church.

It had been duly announced that he was to speak, so that when he reached the auditorium he found that it was crowded from chancel to balcony. He was still too inexperienced to know that many persons habitually flock to a sensation, or at least to the place where there is prospect of one, and so he accepted the fact of the large gathering as a token of the interest that was being aroused in the revival of religion, scarcely thinking that he was himself the centre of absorbing concern.

"Isn't he just lovely?" simpered one young lady, as Howard entered the pulpit with Dr. Hamlyn. "What handsome eyes! I like to see a man with a smoothly shaven face, don't you?"

"He's just a little awkward in his walk," commented a certain lady who was supposed to be an authority on deportment.

"It's a risk to let a young fellow like that go into the pulpit to instruct old men like Dr. Sweeter, Judge Mains, and myself. I hope Hamlyn won't let boys preach here very often." This was the mental outburst of an elderly trustee.

"I'm afraid he'll make a failure," thought one kind-hearted but over-anxious deacon. "I should feel very sorry for him if he did. He looks a little pale. I declare, I most wish I was at home. It's so trying to have a speaker break down."

"I hope he will do well. God help him!" was the fervent prayer of Howard's sister, as it was of more than one sincerely pious person in that throng.

The audience seemed to be more apprehensive of failure than the young man himself, who was comparatively calm, confident in God and the burning interest he felt in his theme. He took no part in the opening service, except to join in the responses. When the time came, he stepped forward without any notes to guide him and began his talk, for he would not have called it a sermon, the science of homiletics being still an unknown territory to him. He had not committed the address to memory verbatim, but had the outline firmly fixed in his mind. It was a simple enough effort from a literary or theological point of view, but the speaker's earnestness, which made the sentences burn and scintillate, held the audience with breathless attention from the beginning, and when he described in a low, tremulous voice his own experience in finding rest from doubt, a solemn hush pervaded the room and many eyes were brimming with tears. Raising his voice, which was strong and melodious, he poured forth a torrent of eloquence in praise of God's power to convince and save, that swept everything before it and almost brought Dr. Hamlyn to his feet. The last words had scarcely dropped from Howard's lips before the old clergyman rose, his eyes a little dim with tears, and grasping the young speaker by the hand before the excited audience, he broke out into a fervent "God bless you, my son!" The act was so spontaneous that all hearts were touched.

"The most thrilling thing I ever heard," remarked a semi-rationalist as he stepped out of the church door. "That young man has no trouble about the miracles or any of my difficulties. Gracious! I almost wish I had as firm a faith as he seems to have."

"He'll make a grand preacher," whispered the aged trustee, "when he gets a little more matured, won't he?"

Upon which his spouse, who was not very friendly to Dr. Hamlyn, remarked: "When he gets more matured! Why, he goes ahead of the old Doctor now!"

"Oh, you've only heard him once, my dear; wait until you hear him again, before you make comparisons. The idea of mentioning a stripling like him in connection with Dr. Hamlyn! Why, it's preposterous!"

And thus the discussion went on, while the young man who was the subject of it stepped from the pulpit and took the hands of those who pressed around him to express their appreciation of the address. He had demonstrated, to the satisfaction of all, that, if he kept humble and studied well, he would become a successful preacher. Dr. Hamlyn was delighted, and on the following day completed his arrangements to give the East Side Mission, as it was called, into Howard's charge, making an appointment for him on the next Sunday evening. With a fervor that for some weeks knew no abatement, Howard gave himself to the work, visiting from house to house among rich and poor alike, and talking on Sabbath evenings to a crowded house. In a few weeks he had been the means of rescuing several persons from lives of sin, especially one man who, though talented and noble-minded in other respects, had been for years the slave of strong drink. It was a thrilling sight to see the reclaimed inebriate sitting humbly in the house of God with his wife and children, his face still bearing the marks of his life of excess, now kindling with rapturous delight as he listened to the stirring words of his young pastor.

"Why, Mr. Wescott," he broke out after the service, "I wouldn't have thought it possible a month ago that I could live for four weeks without stimulants, and yet I can now go from one end of Main Street to the other without even being tempted to enter a grog-shop. It is wonderful. The grace of God has taken away the appetite almost entirely."

Several men, who had made themselves somewhat notorious as radical opponents of Christianity in that part of the city, yielded to Howard's appeals and became humble believers. It can truthfully be said that the young man had never before felt such an exhilaration in any kind of work as he did in that of rescuing his fellow men.

But it was not all to be smooth sailing. He soon learned how fickle the smiles of fortune are. He made a mistake. So busily engaged had he been in practical pastoral work, visiting the sick, calling on the non-church-goers, and dealing with inquirers, that he neglected his study, and so, after he had given some four or five Gospel talks, he began to feel that his fund of thought was becoming exhausted, and that he would either have to gather new material or repeat what he had already said.

Just at this crisis he received an urgent letter on Friday evening from Dr. Hamlyn, requesting him to talk again in his church, as the clergyman was not well enough to fill the appointment himself. Howard felt obliged to comply. But what should he say? He could not repeat one of his former talks, for he knew that many persons from the mission would come to hear him at the Euclid Street Church, and he must have ready something fresh and new. All the forenoon Saturday he paced the room trying to think of something to say, but despite his most arduous mental toil and workment, no theme would open. He seemed to be immured by the high, ominous walls of mental vacuity, and even when he read the Bible it did not seem so suggestive as he had formerly found it. Saturday afternoon his conscience or what he had supposed was his conscience drove him out upon the streets in search of several persons for whose salvation he was solicitous. The whole Sabbath was full of numerous self-imposed tasks, so that Sunday evening came, with the time for the service finding him ill prepared to feed the people who had gathered to hear him.

As if to increase his perturbation, the evening turned out rainy, and the audience was not large as he had expected, there being several vacant pews in front, and no one in the balcony. This was a test of the young man's motive and when during the singing of the opening hymns, he fell into an introspective mood, he discovered that he was really hurt, his personal pride had received a shock, on account of the sparseness of the audience; and this self-revelation disheartened him still more, making him feel utterly unworthy to preach.

And when he came to speak he did fail, failed miserably, at least in his own estimation. He felt no unction, his thoughts dragged heavily, the forming of sentences became a burden, and he seemed to be struggling blind through the mazes of expression.

At last he had worried through to the end, announced the last hymn, and then sank in the pulpit chair with a suppressed groan. He could not bear to look his auditors in the face after the service, so profound was his humiliation, and he therefore slipped down the rear stairway that led into Dr. Hamlyn's study, from which he let himself out into a back alley. He might be expected, numerous remarks were interchanged by his hearers.

"What do you think of your young Chrysostom now?" said the venerable trustee, looking teasingly at his wife. "Didn't I tell you you had better wait until you heard him again?"

"Well, I'd no idea he'd take such a sudden drop as that," responded the old lady, who was rather fickle in her admiration. "Still, it wasn't himself to-night. Something troubled him. And, besides, I've seen Dr. Hamlyn fail too, when it seemed he couldn't say what he wanted to, and got his sentences mixed."

"It was an awful poor sermon, awful poor," asserted a cantankerous old deacon. "The young man had better go to a theological seminary before he undertakes to preach. It does no good to come to church to hear such wishy-washy stuff. If he isn't careful he'll play out entirely. I'm thinking Dr. Hamlyn will see his mistake."

Other persons were inclined to take a more generous view of the sermon, suggesting that Howard could not have been well, or that the Spirit had deserted him, as He sometimes does to keep him humble, and that he would soon recover his wonted power and unction, when he would preach better than ever.

He had bought a horse and saddle from a Dutchman at Bihe, but his horse died on the way, and he then had no use for his saddle. He gave it to me this morning, and he asked me to exchange it for a piece of calico cloth; would you like to take it?" The traveller rejoiced that he had been fortunate enough to meet the African boy—he gladly gave him a piece of calico in exchange, feeling no hesitation in believing this to be an answer to prayer.

TWO SISTERS.

"I KNEW two sisters," remarks the Rev. J. Wells, "whose respective marriages made a strong contrast in their social position. They were the daughters of a nobleman of high rank, and both up to the time of marriage moved in the same circle. The elder sister, however, married a very wealthy man, while the younger married one comparatively poor. The elder sister gave her-self up entirely to the pleasures of social life. She was received into the best society and was looked upon as one of its leaders, as a society queen. She was possessed of many things that the world values. Her diamonds cost quite a large fortune. Her sister did not enter into the giddy whirl of society. She became a true Christian, and faithful follower of Christ, bearing cheer-fully her Master's yoke, and striving by every means in her power to bring her fel-low creatures to a knowledge of the Saviour. Not long ago a friend who knew both of these ladies intimately, said to me that the wealthy society lady was the most miserable woman with whom he had ever come in contact, but her sister, comparatively poor and unknown in society, who with Christian love was working for her Master, was the happiest woman that he knew. Yes, the world's yoke was galling and burdensome, but that of Christ is easy."

Peculiar

To itself in many important particulars, Hood's Sarsaparilla is different from and superior to any other medicine.

Peculiar in combination, proportion and prepa-ration of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla pos-sesses the full curative value of the best known remedies of the vegetable kingdom.

Peculiar in its medicinal merit, Hood's Sarsapa-rilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown.

Peculiar in strength and economy—Hood's Sar-saparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "100 doses one dollar." Medicines in larger and smaller bottles require larger doses, and do not produce as good results as Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Peculiar in its "good name at home"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell, where it is made, than of all other blood purifiers.

Peculiar in its phenomenal record of sales abroad, no other preparation has ever attained such popularity in so short a time. Do not be in-duced to take any other preparation. Be sure to get

THE HIDDEN LIFE.

"Hid with Christ in God."—Col. iii: 3.

My life is hid, oh, Christ, with Thee,
I wait in speechless ecstasy,
I wait in prayer.
For Thou art with me in the gloom,
And with me in the silent room,
And everywhere.

My life is hidden, Lord, with Thee,
With Thee once nailed upon the tree,
Who loved me so.
Oh! fold Thy child within Thy breast
And give to me Thy promised rest,
Nor let me go.

My life is hidden here below
From all the stormy winds that blow,
From things that pain,
And now, whatever may betide
I cease from self and so I hide
In Thee again.

I could not, Saviour, stand alone,
But Thou, my precious "corner stone,"
Art sure and tried.
Thy words of promise cannot fail,
Thine own great love must still prevail.
In Thee I hide.

Oh! Master, how can heart conceive,
And how can mortals e'er believe Thy faithfulness?
I only look to Thee in prayer,
And wait for what Thou dost prepare,
And Thou dost bless.

For mercies crowning every day,
For tears which thou hast wiped away,
For gifts outpoured,
For all the wonders Thou hast wrought
So far exceeding human thought,
I thank Thee, Lord.

I can but praise Thee, and I ask
That Thou would'st give to me my task,
My work to do.
Oh! may I brighten some poor heart,
In showing, Lord, how good thou art,
How loving, too!

If from this timid child of Thine,
Some little ray of hope may shine
In souls distressed—
My Lord, I cannot look for more,
Thou givest of Thy treasure store,
I leave the rest.

—Eleanor Grant.

The importance of keeping the liver and kidneys in good condition cannot be overestimated. Hood's Sarsaparilla is a great remedy for regulating and invigorating these organs.

FRANCE'S RELIGIOUS REACTION.

THE young men of France, says Rev. J. W. Mendenhall in the Central Christian Advocate, and the students in the Universities, the business men, the professional men, are dissatisfied with Roman Catholicism on the one hand, and the brilliant scepticism of the Renan school on the other. They begin to see the frivolous teaching of the one and the empty sentiment of the other, and are disposed to rebel against both. In fact, the majority of Frenchmen under thirty-five years of age are ridiculing the stereotyped forms of scepticism that have played their role in the Saraborn, corrupted the famous salons of bewitching talkers, and brought only a harvest of unusable ideas and fictions to the mind's contemplation. They are testing scepticism by the scales of sound judgment and a correct standard of criticism, and the result is the repudiation of the fascinations of unbelief. The value of this reaction is in its spontaneity. We are not unmindful of the presence of evangelical movements in France, such as the McAll Mission, the Wesleyan influence, the Lutheran and Presbyterian Churches, and the Protestant Faculty of Theology in Paris, all of which have contributed something to the regeneration that awaits France; but it will be allowed that the French people have been unusually impervious to outside, and even to native, agencies that have for their purpose the restraint of scepticism, or the moral discipline of the people. It, therefore, remains that the younger France, as if under a providential guidance, had concluded of its own motion to depart from the old unbeliefs of the fathers and to set its face towards the sun. The reaction has also extended among the scholars. There are many brilliant sceptics in Paris, but they are quiet; they are not exercising their power over society to corrupt it, and seem to have given up the struggle.

OBEDIENCE THE TEST OF LOVE.

God produces within us, says a writer in The Nashville Christian Advocate, the right spirit—the disposition to obey. This is the main thing. Then he furnishes us with great principles for the guidance of our lives—not rules. Rules are made out of cast-iron, and when we try to bend them they break. But principles have infinite elasticity, and are capable of adjustment to all the varying circumstances of human life. Furthermore, lest we should fail correctly to interpret and apply these principles, God gives us particular cases under them—specimen cases—for our instruction. Finally, when he has done all this, he throws us on our liberty, and bids us walk worthy of our calling. When the little boy is just beginning to walk, his mother watches every step that he takes. Even after he gets large enough to go away from home she still thinks it necessary to tell him how long he shall stay, with whom he shall associate, what he shall and shall not do—prescribing the very form of all his conduct. But when he passes the gates of manhood, if he be the high-minded young man that he ought to be, she knows that it is not necessary for her to do more than follow him to the door, put her hand on his shoulder, leave a kiss on his lips, and say to him, "My son, you must not do any thing to-day that you think would bring grief and pain to my heart." She trusts him enough to throw him upon himself. So God trusts his children, not tying them down with petty and minute restrictions, but leaving them free to do as they please, with this only condition, that they do nothing to grieve him. He puts them on their honor; and it were better for them to die than to dishonor him.

AN AUSTRALIAN CHILD MISSION.

In the city of Melbourne, Australia, Mrs. Varcoe, a goodly woman, has been doing good work in rescuing the homeless waifs of the streets. A little over a year ago, she found one evening, a little bare-footed and bare-headed match-vendor, sobbing as if his heart were breaking. He had been robbed of the few pennies he had saved from his day's labor to hire a bed for the night. It was only a four-penny bit, all told, but it was all he had. While Mrs. Varcoe interrogated him a number of the lads gathered around her, and she asked them if they wouldn't like a better place in which to stay. There was an ominous silence, till a sharp little fellow winked to his comrades, and said, "She wants to take us to the 'dustrial school." The charge was denied, and the frank offer of a helping hand and home was made. The next morning there came a timid knock at the door; two bare-footed boys greeted her as she opened it, the heroes of the night before, and their greeting was, "Please, mum, we've come to be your boys." This was irresistible; they were taken in, washed, clothed, and fed; and within a week the home was properly started. "Livingstone House," Drummond Street, North Carlton, is the homes. It contains eight roomy, clean, and well-ventilated apartments, and is at present occupied by thirteen children. Gazetted as a constable under the Neglected Children's Act, Mrs. Varcoe has the power to arrest children who are destitute, or who are in immoral places, and to have them committed to her charge by magistrates. This power has enabled her to rescue seventy-five children, whose wretched condition has been in nearly every case owing to drink, and these little ones are now nearly all happily provided for.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS IN COLORADO.

It is astonishing as well as gratifying to note the rapid growth of the Sunday-schools in the far western states.

There are in Colorado, 90,000 children of school age, of whom 30,000 are enrolled in all the Sunday-schools of the State, 5,192 in the Congregational Sunday-schools of which there are fifty-five. There are 1,000 enrolled in the Congregational mission schools. The schools contributed the sum of $3,168 during the year, of which $608 was for benevolence.

SEVEN WAYS OF GIVING.

How should we give of our substance, so as to be most acceptable to the Lord? There are several ways of giving, of which the seven following may be enumerated:

1. The Careless Way.—To give something to every cause that is presented, without inquiring into its merits.
2. The Impulsive Way.—To give from impulse, as much and as often as love and pity and sensibility prompt.
3. The Lazy Way.—To make a special effort to earn money for benevolent objects by fairs, festivals, etc.
4. The Self-Denying Way.—To save the cost of luxuries and apply them to purposes of religion and charity. This may lead to asceticism and self-complaisance.
5. The Systematic Way.—To lay aside as an offering to God a definite portion of our gains—one-tenth, one-fifth, one-third, one-half. This is adapted to all, whether poor or rich, and gifts would be greatly increased if it were generally practiced.
6. The Equal Way.—To give to God and the needy just as much as we spend on ourselves.
7. The Heroic Way.—To limit our expenditures to a certain sum, and give away all the rest of our income. This was John Wesley's way.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

Strong Wings—Mighty to Save or Destroy—IV. Gentle Wings—The Only Safe Nest.

"The Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust." Ruth 2: 12.

SCENE: An Oriental harvest-field. Grain standing. Grain in swathes. Grain in sheaves.

At the side of the field, a white tent in which to take the nooning, jars of vinegar or of sour wine to quench the thirst of the hot working-people. Swarthy men striking their sickles into the rustling barley. Others twisting the bands for the sheaves, putting one end of the band under the arm, and with the free arm and foot collecting the sheaf. Sunburned women picking up the stray straws and bringing them to the binders. Boaz, a fine-looking Oriental, gray-bearded and bright-faced, the owner of the field, looking on, and estimating the value of the grain and calculating so many ephahs to the acre; and, with his large, sympathetic heart, pitying the overtasked workmen and the women, with white faces enough to faint, in the hot noonday sun.

But there is one woman who especially attracts the man's attention. She is soon to be with him the joint owner of the field. She has come from a distant land for the sole purpose of being kind to an aged woman. I know not what her features were; but when the Lord God sets behind a woman's face the lamp of courage, and faith, and self-sacrifice, there comes out a glory independent of features. She is to be the ancestress of Jesus Christ. Boaz, the owner of the field, as soon as he understands that it is Ruth, accosts her with a blessing: "A full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust." Christ compares Himself to a hen gathering the chickens under her wings. In Deuteronomy, God is represented as an eagle stirring up her nest. In a great many places in the Psalms, David makes ornithological allusions; while my text mentions the wings of God, under which a poor, weary soul had come to trust.

I ask your attention, therefore, while, taking the suggestion of my text, I speak to you in all simplicity and love of the wings of the Almighty.

First: I remark that they were swift wings under which Ruth had come to trust. There is nothing in all the handiwork of God more curious than a bird's wing. You have been surprised, sometimes, to see how far it could fly with one stroke of the wing; and, when it has food in prospect, or when it is affrighted, the pulsations of the bird's wing are unimaginable for velocity. The English lords used to pride themselves on the speed of their falcons. These birds, when tamed, had in them the dart of lightning. How swift were the carrier-pigeons in the time of Anthony and at the siege of Jerusalem! Wonderful speed! A carrier-pigeon was thrown up at Rouen and came down at Ghent—ninety miles off—in one hour. The carrier-pigeons were the telegraphs of the olden time. Swallows have been shot in our latitude having the undigested rice of Georgia swamps in their crops, showing that they had come four hundred miles in six hours. It has been estimated that, in the ten years of a swallow's life, it flies far enough to have gone around the world eighty-nine times, so great is its velocity. And so the wings of the Almighty, spoken of in the text, are swift wings. They are swift when they drop upon a foe, and swift when they come to help God's friends. If a father and his son be walking by the way and the child goes too near a precipice, how long does it take for the father to deliver the child from danger? Longer than it takes God to swoop for the rescue of His children. The fact is that you cannot get away from the care of God. If you take the steamship, or the swift railroad, He is all the time along with you. "Whither shall I go from Thy spirit, and whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven Thou art there. If I make my bed in hell, behold! Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there Thy hand shall hold me."

Swift as the Wind.

If it gets but one glimpse of the hunter, it puts many crags between. Solomon, four or five times, compares Christ to an Arabian gazelle (calling it by another name) when he says: "My beloved is like a roe." The difference is, that the roe speeds the other way; Jesus speeds this. Who but Christ could have been quick enough to have helped Peter, when the water-pavement broke? Who but Christ could have been quick enough to help the Duke of Argyle, when, in his dying moment, he cried: "Good cheer! I could die like a Roman, but I mean to die like a Christian. Come away gentlemen. He who goes first, goes cleanest?" I had a friend who stood by the rail-track at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, when the ammunition had given out at Antietam; and he saw the train from Harrisburg, freighted with shot and shell, as it went thundering down toward the battle-field. He said that it stopped not for any crossing. They put down the brakes for no grade. They held up for no peril. The wheels were on fire with the speed as they dashed past. If the train did not come up in time with the ammunition, it might as well not come at all. So, my friends, there are times in our lives when we must have help immediately or perish. The grace that comes too late is no grace at all. What you and I want is a God—now. Oh! is it not blessed to think that God is always in such quick pursuit of His dear children? When a sinner seeks pardon, or a baffled soul needs help, swifter than thrush's wing, swifter than ptarmigan's wing, swifter than eagle's wing, are the wings of the Almighty.

I remark further, carrying out the idea of my text, that the wings under which Ruth had come to trust were Very Broad Wings.

Eagles have been shot on the Rocky Mountains with wings that were seven feet from tip to tip. When the king of the air sits on the crag, the wings are spread over all the eaglets in the eyrie, and when the eagle starts from the rock, the shadow is like the spreading of a storm cloud. So the wings of God are broad wings. Ruth had been under those wings in her infantile days; in the days of her happy girlhood in Moab; in the day when she gave her hand to Mahlon, in her first marriage; in the day when she wept over his grave; in the day when she trudged out into the wilderness of poverty; in the days when she picked up the few straws of barley dropped by ancient custom in the way of the poor.

Oh! yes, the wings of God are broad wings. They cover up all our wants, all our sorrows, all our sufferings. He puts one wing over our cradle, and He puts the other over our grave. Yes, my dear friends, it is not a desert in which we are placed; it is a nest. Sometimes it is a very hard nest, like that of the eagle, spread on the rock, with ragged moss and rough sticks, but still is a nest; and, although it may be very hard under us, over us are the wings of the Almighty. There sometimes comes a period of one's life

When He Feels Forsaken.

He says: "All are against me. The world is against me. The church is against me. No sympathy; no hope. Everybody that comes near me thrusts at me. I wonder if there is a God, anyhow!" Everything seems to be going slipshod and at haphazard. There does seem to be any hand on the helm. Job's help fails. David's Absalom gets to be a reproach. Martha's brother dies. Abraham's Sarah goes into the grave of Machpelah. "Woe worth the day in which I was born!" has said many a Christian. David seemed to scream out in sorrow, as he said: "Is His mercy clean gone forever? And will He be favorable no more? And hath He in anger shut up His tender mercies?" Job, with his throat swollen and clogged until he could not even swallow the food that ran into his mouth, exclaims: "How long before thou wilt depart from me, and leave me alone, that I may swallow down my spittle? Have there never been times in your life when you envied those who were buried? When you longed for the gravedigger to do his work on you? Oh, the faithlessness of the human heart! God's wings are broad, whether we know it or not.

Sometimes the mother-bird goes away from the nest, and it seems very strange that she should leave the callow young. She plunges her beak into the bark of the tree, and drops into the grain-field, or to the chaff in the barn-door, or to the furrows in the plough. Meanwhile the birds in the nest shiver, and wonder why the mother-bird does not come. Ah, she has gone for food. And while there is a whirr of wings and the mother-bird stands the edge of the nest, and the little ones open their mouths, and the food is dropped in, then the old bird spreads out her feathers, and all is peace. So, sometimes, God leaves us to go off to get food for our soul; and then comes back after a while to the nest, and says: "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." He drops into it the sweet promises of grace, and the love of God is shed abroad, and we are under His wings—the broad wings of the Almighty.

Yes; they are very broad! There is no under those wings for the sixteen hundred millions of the race. You say: "Do not make the invitation too large, for there is room for more awkward than to have more guests than accommodations." I know it. The Seamen's Friend Society is inviting all the sailors. The Tract Society is inviting all the destitute. The Sabbath-schools are inviting all the children. The Missionary Society is inviting all the heathen. The printing-presses of the Bible Societies are going night and day, doing nothing but printing invitations to this great banquet. And are you not afraid that there will be more guests than accommodations? No! All who have been invited will fill up the table. UNITED FREE P. O. VICKERY, AUSA chairs for more. There are cups for more. I could with one feather of His wing cover all those who have come; and when He spreads out both wings, they cover all the earth and all the heavens. Ye Israelites, who went through the Red Sea, come under! Ye multitudes who have come into glory in the last six thousand years, come under! Ye tired and forlorn thousand, the thousands of thousands, come under! Ye cherubim and archangel, your pinions, come under? Yet there is a God! Ay! if God would have all the people under His wings occupied, He must make other worlds, and people them with other myriads, have other Resurrection and Judgment; for broader than all space, broader than light, wide as eternity, from tip to tip, are the wings of the Almighty! Oh! under such provision as that can you not rejoice? Come, ye wandering, ye weary, ye troubled, ye dying souls! Come under the wings of the Almighty. Whosoever will come, let him come. However ragged, however wretched, never abandoned, however woe-begone, there is room enough under the wings—under the wings of the Almighty! Oh, what a Gospel so glorious, so magnificent in its provision! Come to preach it. It is my life to preach it. I live to preach it.

Strong Wings. I remark, further, that the wings under which I came to trust were strong wings. The length of a bird's wing—of a sea-fowl's wing, for example—you might guess it from the fact that sometimes for five, six or seven days it is unable to fly without resting. There have been eagles in the Andes that could overcome an eagle or a stag. There have been eagles that have reared up children, and swung them to the top of the cliffs. The flap of an eagle's wing has been in it to everything it strikes. There are eagles whose wings are packed with strength to lift, to destroy. So the wings of God are strong wings. Mighty to save. Mighty to destroy. I preach Him—"the Lord, strong and mighty—the Lord, mighty in battle!" He spread His wing, and the antediluvian world was gone. He flapped His wing and Babylon was destroyed. He flapped His wing and Herculani was buried. He flapped His wing and the Roman empire ceased. Before the stroke of the pinion a fleet is nothing. An army is nothing. An empire is nothing. A world is nothing. The universe is nothing. King—Eternity—Omnipotent—He asks no counsel from the angels of heaven. He takes not the counsel of His cabinet. He wants none to draw His arrows for they are the winds. None to load His batteries, for they are the lightnings. None to be the sandals of His feet for they are the clouds. Mighty to save. Our enemies may be strong, our sorrows violent. Our sins may be great. But quicker than an eagle ever hurred from the crags a hawk or raven, will the Lord sweep back our sins and our temptations, if they assault us when we are once seated on the eternal rock of His salvation. What a blessed thing it is to be defended by the strong wing of the Almighty! Stronger than the pelican's wing, stronger than the albatross's wing, stronger than the condor's wing, are the wings of the Almighty.

Gentle Wings. I have only one more thought to present. The wings under which Ruth had come to trust were gentle wings. There is nothing softer than a feather. You have noticed when a bird returns from flight, how gently it stoops over its nest. The young birds are not afraid of having their lives trampled out by the mother-bird; the old whip-or-will drops into its nest of leaves, the oriole into its casket of bark, the humming-bird into its hammock of moss—gently as the light. And so, says the Psalmist, He shall cover thee with His wing. Oh, the gentleness of God! But even that figure does not fully set it forth; for I have sometimes looked into the bird's-nest and seen a dead bird—its life having been trampled out by the mother-bird. But no one that ever came under the feathers of the Almighty was trodden on.

Blessed nest! warm nest! Why will men stay out in the cold to be shot of temptation and to be chilled by the blast, when there is divine shelter? More beautiful than any flower I ever saw are the hues of a bird's plumage. Did you ever examine it? The blackbird, floating like a flake of darkness through the sunlight; the meadow-lark, with head of fawn, and throat of velvet and breast of gold; the red flamingo flying over the Southern swamps, like sparks from the forge of the setting sun; the pelican white and black—morning and night tangled in its wings—give but a very faint idea of the beauty that comes down over the soul when on it drop the feathers of the Almighty. Here fold your weary wings. This is

The Only Safe Nest.

Every other nest will be destroyed. "Though thou exalt thyself like the eagle, and set thy nest among the stars, yet will I bring thee down, saith the Lord of Hosts." Under the swift wings, under the broad wings, under the strong wings, under the gentle wings of the Almighty, find shelter until these calamities be overpast. Then when you want to change nests, it will only be from the valley of earth to the heights of heaven; and instead of "the wings of a dove," for which David longed, not knowing that in the first mile of their flight they would give out, you will be conducted upward by the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings Ruth, the beautiful Moabitess, came to trust.

God forbid that in this matter of eternal weal or woe we should be more stupid than the fowls of heaven; "for the stork knoweth her appointed time; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their going; but my people know not the judgments of the Lord."

THE FAMINE AT SUAKIN.

A LETTER from Dr. Harper, of the British Army, at Suakin, gives a heartrending description of the famine and misery prevailing there. He writes: We made a zereba and huts of matting for the sick. We had hardly completed these when a large number of new cases came in dying from the interior. The first morning after the distribution of food sixty people were left lying on the ground too far gone to be moved. We took them into our hospital, and next day fifteen more. The people began to carry the dying on sacks and beds to our zereba. Of the first sixty many died, but this has not prevented new cases from being brought. On Wednesday a man was carried to the zereba. I was not there at the time, but when I arrived I found him dead. Next day some people brought a woman on a bed, but when they got to the zereba she was dead. It is ghastly work; nobody knows what the mortality is. I heard that some poor weak ones who had been lying outside the walls had not been able to get to the zereba. We found them out that evening and gave them food. One was a poor woman with a little girl about two years old. She crawled to the zereba, lingered two or three days, and died. We have the little orphan. The same day another woman died, leaving five children in the zereba. Her husband is alive but starving. We have over fifty children now in the zereba. Some will die, and others will be left orphans. Of our first sixty the bad cases have died, and the rest are getting stronger, and we have to turn out the strong ones. The little boys are afraid of being turned out, and ask me over and over again for tickets. When we ask, "Where is your father?" the answer is "Dead." "Where is your mother?" "Dead" is the general answer. What is to become of them? They will disappear to Jeddah and be sold as slaves. Perhaps if things get better their own tribes will look after the orphans. There are hundreds of cases around Suakin at present who are too far gone to attempt a journey, even if there was food in the mountains. Tokar is full of starving people, and those who can come here. Notwithstanding our efforts to keep down our numbers there were one hundred and fifty-seven in the hospital this evening, and we have had fifteen deaths in eleven days.

AMONG THE LAOS.

Something About the Strange People for Whom a Language was Lately Invented.

A FEW weeks ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published the Lord's Prayer in the newly invented printed language of the Laos, a people of Upper India. Much interest is taken in this people, among whom, several worthy and earnest American missionaries are now laboring. In a letter to The Church at Home and Abroad, dated from Lakawn, Mr. Hugh Taylor writes the following interesting statement about the Laos:

"We left Lakawn on the 12th of February, with Dr. McGilvary and his daughter, and in four days reached Moung Praa. Our tents were pitched by the roadside just outside of one of the city gates. The advent of four foreigners, two of whom were women, created quite a stir, and we were all kept abundantly busy visiting and being visited. Miss McGilvary and Mrs. Taylor were the first white women to visit the place, and of course, much to their own discomfort, were the centres of attraction.

The Praa people seemed very ready to listen to the Gospel, so plenty of auditors were found everywhere. On Sabbath (the 16th) the first Praa convert was baptized. He is a blind man, Noi Woung by name, who had come to Lakawn to have Dr. Peoples operate on his eyes; but as nothing could be done for him he returned home, carrying in his heart some of the teachings he heard while here, and in his hand a manuscript copy of a small catechism I had been able to spare him. From the nature of his answers before the session it was evident that he had used his brother well in having him read that catechism to him. His brother has promised to come to Lakawn to take a course in Siamese, so as to read the Bible.

"On Wednesday we started on for Moung Nan and arrived there the following Tuesday (February 25.) We received a very cordial welcome from the officials of the city, who sent a man to put in order a "rest-house" for us, and another to conduct our elephants to a place of plenty of food and water. The next day, after court closed, some of the officers came to visit us. After wading through the crowds on the first and second verandas, and finally planting himself cross-legged in the middle of the thronged reception-room, their chief said that they thought we would be lonesome, so they came to visit. No idea could be more comical to us, but he was seriously in earnest, and explained that he had never known the people to visit with other foreigners who had chanced to come to their city. Indeed, the people were astonished at themselves for not being afraid of us. "Many persons were found who seemed anxious to hear all we had to say and pressed us with very earnest questions. The last day spent at Maung Lang and the three on the way home we both had a severe bout with jungle fever, but recovered immediately on arriving home.—Last Sabbath (March 30) two of the men who went on the tour with us, with two others, made a profession of their faith and were baptized. So our little band increases."

The Gospel Light Chasing Heathen Darkness Away—A Young Missionary's Experience—The Lesson it Teaches—Stout Bodies, Skilful Hands and Medical Knowledge Invaluable—Growth of the Congo Stations—Types of the Races of the Congo—Cannibalism Still Prevalent.

THE great missionary struggle of the present century—and one that has been fruitful of the most glorious results—is for the redemption of Africa. Hundreds of noble lives and millions upon millions of dollars have already been expended in the enterprise, and the Christian world is still pouring into the

The portraits of native types given on the same page are faithful reproductions of photographs taken by recent travellers. In the first panel, (No. 1,) a woman of the Congo is pictured in a coiffure at once unique and startling, and it is difficult to realize that this African belle has been able to build such a marvelous head-dress with her own hair. Panels Nos. 2 and 3 show types of the Manyemas—one an elderly man, possibly a chief, and the other a youth. The Manyemas are among the most peaceful and intelligent of the Congo tribes. They live in well-built villages, cultivate farms and raise stock. The grave of a Congo chief is shown in panel No. 4, surrounded by hideous, grinning skulls, the trophies of his own prowess in battle, or the heads of victims who have been sacrificed to celebrate his funeral with the pomp and clat due to savage rank. Panel No. 5 gives a group of Congo idols, which are venerated as medical

"After my first year's experience, I found that I could devote nearly the whole of my time to missionary work of different kinds. But I also discovered that after a missionary leaves his mission, he cannot become connected with any other mission without first going home. I wanted to earn sufficient money to buy my passage home, and at the same time to get all the reliable information concerning the country I could, believing that it might be useful to other mis-

"While at Sierra Leone, a friend of mine, Mr. Hailes, a member of the Royal Geographical Society, told me of a very strange ethnical discovery made by him, while up the Niger River some time previously. He was taken prisoner by the Sultan of Bede, a territory in the southern confines of the great desert. The town itself is a walled town, presumably of great antiquity and with about ten thousand population. While he was a prisoner, a Sultan from one of the inland tribes visited him. Mr. Hailes speaks very poor Arabic and the Sultan's English was equally indifferent; but they managed to understand each other. The latter was the chief of a tribe which called themselves 'followers of the white man' and he was very anxious to see me."

Nazarene and his religious belief was almost identical with our Christianity; yet he never heard of Christ nor had his people. It is more, this was the first time he had seen a white man, and no white man had set foot in his domain. His people had never even heard of Christianity, and did not know that there were others on the earth who held the same views they did. The presumption is that the tribe was in some way related to the Abyssinians and had wandered, generations ago, to the eastward and settled there. The Abyssinians trace their descent to the king of Solomon. It would be most interesting to investigate the origin of this singular people, and to learn just how these people came to be settled in the heart of Central Africa. Before Mr. Hailes came away (he was soon released), the Sultan of Bede became his friend. Starting he said to him: 'Now, you can go back to your country and your Queen, and tell her I can send all the missionaries, and all the people here she likes, but on one condition;

She Must Not Send Any Rum!"

The people of whom Mr. Laffin speaks are like the Mandingoes, light-colored and well-featured, a class rather as Arabs than as negroes. They are totally different from the majority of tribes found in the great Congo basin, the like Balolo ("men of iron"), whose territory, shown in the map on the first page, is almost equal to any existing empire, the Bakutus, Basongos, Bakubas, Basundi, Kasongos, Mawambas, and the half-hundred others, all of whom are purely Bantus, although varying much in physique, features, color, and actions. The Bantus are not negro, and many have aquiline features, thin lips. Their language, too, is radically different from that of the negro races.

"Cannibalism," says Mr. Laffin, "is still prevalent in the interior, without a question. While we have never seen markets for the sale of human flesh, I have known of their existence in the Congo district and among the Babangi. Slaves and captives are driven to market and sold like cattle on the hoof, for the purpose of supplying the interior. There is no doubt about it. But as soon as a native becomes a Christian—indeed, soon as he becomes acquainted with white men—he grows ashamed of his propensity. The idea of the prevalence of heathen practices may be gathered from the fact that outside the immediate vicinity of the mission stations along the Congo, and between each station, the country is wild. It is only within a very narrow circle around the stations that there is any pretense of civilized usages. Among the best people I know in Africa are the Bantus. Along the Kassai river is Bantu, and there is a very excellent field for the mission there."

A corroboration of this view concerning the prevalence of cannibal practices, it may be mentioned that Mr. Roger Casement, a young explorer, who penetrated the Congo as far as the Congo River and thence to the headwaters of the latter a year ago, came across a tribe called Lufembi who are Professional Cannibals.

They are as wild and terrible as the head-hunters of Borneo, and are dreaded by all the neighboring tribes upon whom they prey. Their prey is man and the elephant, and they have human meat-markets at various points along the Congo, where dismembered prisoners are sold to the consumers just as beef is sold in the markets of civilization. Miss Mary Sharp, a very bright missionary, who has been eleven years in the Kroo country in Liberia, and who on different times has penetrated to distant parts in the interior, also declares that even among the natives living near the mission stations, cannibalism is secretly indulged, although she believes that it does not exist among those who have become converts. Wherever the missionary penetrates, the "long pig" or human feast of the savages disappears. With the advance of the Gospel-bearers, the medicine men and his horrible orgies retreat farther and farther into the recesses of savage Africa.

A Fatal Mistake was Made by a Canadian on Sept. 2. He and his son and a friend having suffered considerable loss from the destruction of the crops on their farms at Cumberland by bears, went out in the night of Tuesday to hunt for the depredators. In order to obtain a better position of observation and to be out of the way of the bears hunting them, they had caused three scaffolds to be built in different parts of the field that the bears frequented. After waiting nearly two hours, one of the hunters saw a dark object moving among the grain. It was at some distance and in the light of the moon it was not very clearly defined. He concluded that it must be a bear and taking deliberate aim he fired both barrels. To his horror, the report was followed by a human cry. He descended quickly from his perch and hurried to the spot. He was agonized to find that he had shot his friend, who had left his scaffold and gone down into the field to search for the bears. His aim had been only too true and the man was dead. He ought to have made sure before firing that the object he aimed at was a bear and not a man, for in that uncertain light, as the event proved, it was possible that a man might look like a bear. The same caution ought to be observed in society and especially in theological controversies. Sometimes hard blows have been dealt, inflicting grievous wounds, through a mistake. Though an opponent may have the manners of a bear it should not be forgotten that at heart he may be a brother. (Eph. 4 : 2.)

The Homeliness of a School Teacher has Caused her the loss of a situation in Connecticut. A press dispatch from Hartford states that a young lady, living in Ohio, was engaged to teach gymnastics in the State Normal School in New Britain. The engagement was made by mail, and on Sept 2, she went to New Britain and reported for duty. She was shown over the building, and her duties were explained to her. On Thursday, September 4, she was to commence her labors; but on Wednesday, her sister, who was living with her, had an interview with the principal, at his request. He informed her that her sister was considered "too homely" for the position. The Board of Education had therefore decided to pay her expenses home, and give her a month's salary as compensation for cancelling the engagement. Scarcely crediting that mere personal defects could have been the sole cause of the decision, the sister asked if there were not some other objections, but she was assured that there were not; her talents and acquirements rendered her quite competent to fill the position, but as soon as the authorities saw her, they concluded that "it would be for the best interests of all concerned that she should not be permitted to begin her work." It was a somewhat illogical decision, as the lady was there to teach, not to be a model. The Board, however, is not absolutely without a precedent for its decision. The rulers and priests of the Jews acted so when Christ came with divine authority as a Teacher; they found "no beauty in Him, that they should desire Him." (Isa. 53 : 2.)

An Antiquary's Disappointment is Described in a press dispatch from Milwaukee, Wis. A millionaire of that city who has given much attention to antiquarian studies made strenuous efforts, during a tour in Egypt last year, to purchase two mummies. The holders, however, would not sell; but since his return, the U. S. Consul at Cairo, has succeeded in purchasing them for him. Three weeks ago the antiquary's heart was gladdened by the news that they had arrived and were in the New York Custom House awaiting his orders. As Congress in its wisdom and concern for the protection of the infant industries of the country has fixed a duty on such articles, the Milwaukee antiquary had to pay $400 into the National Treasury before he could have the mummies. This sum, added to their original cost and the expenses of freight, made a total cost of $2,500. The antiquary took the mummies home and invited a party of scientific friends to witness the work of taking off the bandages which had been wrapped around the bodies thousands of years ago. The faces of the mummies, which were uncovered, showed strongly marked features and the party gazed intently as the bandages were removed from the bodies and limbs. But scarcely had they been unwrapped when the bodies crumbled to dust. It is supposed that the collapse was caused by exposing the mummies without their protecting wrappings in our climate. It is not surprising that the antiquary is chagrined that his treasures for which he paid $2,500 should have turned to dust. Many a man has had an analogous experience when he came to die. Only those have permanent treasures who obey the Saviour's injunction: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt." (Matt. 6 : 19, 20.)

An Insult to a Flag has Led to the Death of a citizen in Virginia. For some years past one of the most prosperous business men in Norfolk, Va., was a man who had been a Union soldier in the war and who was a post department commander of the Grand Army. Last spring, at the Grand Army Convention at Petersburg he moved a resolution that a petition be sent to Congress praying that a stop be put to the manufacture of the Confederate flag, which he stigmatized as "a contemptible rag." His speech was reported in the newspapers and when it was read in Norfolk it aroused popular indignation. He was ostracized socially, and finally the resentment toward him extended to his business connections and his business became worthless. He struggled hard to conciliate his neighbors, even going so far as to take part in a Confederate celebration, but all his efforts failed. Realizing that he was ruined, he fretted until he sank into a condition of utter despondency, from which he could not be aroused and on September 6th he died. It is strange that he did not foresee when he offered his resolution the animosity it would evoke. But he did not and he fell a victim to a spirit of patriotism exactly the counterpart of his own. No man clearly perceives his own disposition until he sees it in others, and in this case the Saviour's words were fulfilled: they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. (Matt. 26 : 52.)

A Silk Thread as a Burglar's Implement has done effective service in Georgia, according to a press dispatch from Macon. Four professional cracksmen, charged with robbing a safe, were confined in the prison of that city. As it was probable that they would be as adroit in breaking out as they had proved in breaking in, they were placed in the strongest cell in the jail, and they were carefully searched lest any of the implements of their profession should be concealed about their persons. On the day set for their trial the warden, on going to the cell, found only two prisoners remaining. The other two had escaped through the window, which was protected by bars an inch thick. These bars were cleanly cut, leaving an aperture large enough for a man to crawl through. The warden was curious to learn how the bars could have been cut without tools and without noise. The two prisoners told him that the escaped men knew a secret of softening iron, which they had used on the bars. The only implement required was a silk thread, which they had worked continuously for several nights in succession and with which they had at last severed the bars. The warden doubts the truth of their assertion as he does not believe that any amount of friction with a silk thread could saw through bars so strong as those. However that may be, we know that soft and gentle means often do effect wonders. When Satan's captives escape from the spiritual bondage of evil habit, of doubt or of despair into the glorious liberty of the children of God, it is generally by the realization of God's love and infinite tenderness, and not by the terrors of the law that their bonds are broken. (Rom. 8 : 3.)

The Two Sisters—Martha's Hospitable Plans—Mary's Spirit the One Christ had been Seeking—The Burden on the Housekeeper—Martha's Appeal to Jesus—A Fruitful Source of Domestic Trouble—The Revealing Presence of Christ—The One Thing Needful—Mary Protected by Christ—The Cure for Fruitless Activity—The True Waiting on the Lord.

JESUS in the home! It is this we see in the history of Martha and Mary. Of His public ministry we hear much, but the life of many of us is not spent in public, but in the daily round of home duties, the daily friction of home cares, the little, but important, schoolings which come to us through those who know us best, and with whom we have continually to do.

Jesus "entered into a certain village; and a certain woman named Martha received Him into her house." Martha had no question as to receiving Jesus, she prized Him as her guest. But, like many another housewife, Martha wanted to carry out her plans of serving Jesus, she wanted to show Him in her own way how much she appreciated the blessing and honor of having such a Guest in her house. "And she had a sister, called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet and heard His word." The elder sister, with a warm, generous heart, was ready to bestow any benefit upon her Guest, but she did not understand Him; she would wear herself out to serve Him, but she would not reciprocate the thoughts of His heart. Mary was receptive, she listened to and Understood Her Lord.

Among His disciples, Jesus had sought long for such an one, but they were all too occupied with their own ideas, their own plans, their own thoughts, their own devotion to Him. There was but one other of a kindred spirit; it was the mother of our Lord, who "kept these things and pondered them in her heart." God prizes above all things that which Solomon desired, "a hearing heart," (1 Kings 3 : 9., marg.) which will receive, understand, adopt and carry out His teachings.

Look at that busy Christian worker! She never loses a moment, never lets go an opportunity for usefulness. Her meetings are almost daily, her correspondence is immense, she has several institutions, and is perpetually on the go. And this is all for Jesus. It is her way of expressing how devoted she is to Him and to souls. But if all this activity were taken from her, she would be very miserable. She is by nature of an active temperament, and the energy, which once found its vent in the things of the world, is now at home in the service of the Master, and she little dreams how much of self-pleasing there is in it all. But she adds service to service, and work to work, without waiting to know whether He desires it, or whether this is His plan. She asks God's blessing upon it of course, but she makes the plans, and takes the lead, and then thinks it very hard after all she has done and after all the pains she has taken, if it does not answer, and she is sometimes inclined to reproach the Lord if things do not go on to her satisfaction. Just like Martha. "Martha was

She had got under pressure and was in a complete flurry. She had undertaken far more than she could accomplish. Jesus should know how much she appreciated Him, and so she would get the best dishes which were to be had and she did not wait to inquire whether this would please Him. Her fire was not equal to all the strain she put upon it, dinner-time was coming, and only half was ready, she was single-handed, and the irritability which is an accompaniment of such a state of things, made her look around for some one to blame—There was Mary—that lazy, self-indulgent Mary, just sitting at Jesus' feet, and enjoying His society, while she was putting herself to the strain in every way to serve Him. Indignation against her sister arose in her heart, and at last she could stand it no longer. Full of vexation with Mary, and indignation that her sister did not perceive how pressed she was, and that she showed no sign of sympathy, she appealed to Jesus. "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me."

It is thus that home trials come about. One sister broods over the relations of her sister to her, and finds her culpably wanting in sympathy and in consideration. She nurses in her heart the sense of wrong, and if she does carry it to Jesus, it is to dictate to Him the redress she sees to be the right one; "Bid her therefore that she help me." The husband sees so much lacking in his wife of the consideration which is due to him, or the wife in the husband; and bitter feelings arise between them. The presence of Jesus in the house makes all things come to the surface. In His presence, they can lurk no longer hidden in the heart. He is the Light, and "all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light." (Eph. 5 : 13.) Let no one be discouraged if, after a time of great nearness to God, he should see his own heart as never before. All things take their true form and color in His presence. How often little family squabbles and bickerings are hidden away in the presence of an unusual guest! But Jesus is a Guest whose very presence touches and brings to light all the hideousness of self within.

Martha had, no doubt, a strong persuasion that she had right on her side, she saw the matter as only between herself and her sister, and, if Jesus had not been there to claim Mary's attention, it would have been a sisterly duty to take her share, perhaps the largest share in the household. The answer of Jesus showed things from another standpoint, "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things." What is this? Does He not so much as blame Mary at all? No, not at all, the Lord had need of her, a higher duty had come before her, she had entertained Jesus in a way which did not manifest her devotion, but which satisfied the heart of Jesus, she took in what the twelve apostles could not understand, and before His suffering it was Mary who anointed Him for His burial. (John 12 : 3-8.) Martha had served Jesus after her thought, Mary after His thought. Martha's service was full of burden, Mary's full of rest.

"One Thing is Needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her." What is then the one thing needful for sisters such as Mary and Martha whom Jesus loves? (John 11 : 5.) Salvation it was not, for all the family was saved. Was it not that very waiting upon God which Mary practised and Martha did not? What is the result of Christian work which is done under the pressure of a sense of duty, of responsibility, of zeal, but in which the clear direction of the Lord is wanting?

We see around us hundreds of worn-out Christian workers, spirit-broken, disappointed, humiliated, mortified, bitter, because they are not in the work now; with shattered nerves and jealous spirits, no way recommending Christ! Why is all this? They once were so warm, so enthusiastic, so fresh in their zeal, how is it that all has withered? Alas! a great deal is explained in the words, "All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it." (Isa. 40 : 7.) Much of their work has been done in the energy of the flesh, and they and it must pass through death before they can be refined. They must die to self and to all hopes from themselves. It is in love that God has let them wither that they may know that they are nothing, and that He is all. O how long it takes for our self-reliant human hearts to learn that all our work which is not prepared before that we should walk in it (Eph. 2 : 10,) is but "wood, hay, stubble," which will be burned by the fire which is to try us (1 Cor. 3 : 12-15.)

What then is the cure for this fruitless activity of the flesh? Just that which Mary learned so well,—to sit at Jesus' feet and wait for orders. Many pray but do not with the firm persuasion that He wants to communicate His mind to them. Therefore wait the Lord wait that He may be gracious unto you." If we do not wait upon Him, we necessitate His waiting for us until He can be gracious. "Blessed are all they which wait for Him." Time is never lost in which we give God the opportunity to make known to us His mind. When Mary did get orders from her Lord, and she broke the alabaster box of ointment, and poured it on His head in the house of Simon the leper, "the house was filled with the odor of the ointment." Disciples did not understand her, but the same Lord who had justified her, her sister justified her before the disciples too.

This life of waiting upon the Lord is as necessary in the small trifles of family life as in the case of a parish, or the concerns of a kingdom. Irritability comes more often from overwrought nerves than from any other cause, but it is not therefore to be excused. We have no right to let others drive us into a pressure which it is impossible to be calm. They must learn to know as Martha must, that there are times when the sitting at His feet must take precedence of all else, however important. Nothing for which they would claim us, can must take precedence of our orders from the King. David says, "Wait on the Lord; be good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the Lord." (Ps. 27 : 1.) Nothing steadies the brain and strengthens the nerves of a child of God, like the being sure of His will. When we know the way in which we should go, all becomes so easy; but suspense, uncertainty, remorse, self-accusation these are the things which wear the whole frame. When we work with God, all we do strengthens us in soul and body; when we are out of joint, or out of step with God, we are always under a strain like poor Martha was. Therefore David says, "O my strength, I will wait upon thee." (Ps. 59 : 9.) It is a precious habit, in reading the word of God, to wait for God to apply it, and in prayer, to wait for God to speak back to us. Thus real intercourse established as a habit between God and us, and we have the one thing needful.

A CHINESE CHILD'S SUFFERING.

How great a boon the introduction of Christianity into China has been is shown in an incident related by Mrs. Edwards who is laboring at Shan-si, as an illustration of the cruel customs prevailing among the Chinese and heathenism. Mrs. Edwards says: "A little girl here now is a sad instance of the unkindness with which children are sometimes treated. She was one of the two little children who, the time the school was broken up and the children distributed, fell to our share. Hsiang was about six years old, and her father who did not care to keep her, because her right arm is paralyzed and deformed, yet would not give her up, except for money, which, on principle, we refused to give. She therefore went home about a year ago to her village. I can see her bright, laughing face now, as she trotted in her neat blue dress and pinafore, full of joy in the anticipation of seeing her mother-kind one, I believe—and all unconscious of the troubles before her. A sad contrast she presented when brought back a year after, maimed and in a filthy condition. It seems her father gave or sold her for a daughter-in-law, but her mother-in-law presently brought her back, and then they sold her for 18,000 cash (about $30,) to a mandarin's lady whose house every one ill-treated her. Her poor feet were frost-bitten, and afterwards they were beaten. After this you will not be surprised

"So He giveth His beloved sleep." disciples let Him sleep as long as they dare; the peril is too imminent now. So they e to Him and awake Him, saying, "Save, l, we perish." Though no concern for self would have disturbed His slumber, the cry of the disciples rouses Him at once to on. The resources of His human nature, nd which He never went for the purpose of inting His own personal needs, had been com- pletely exhausted; but there is no diminution of His power to save those who call upon Him. Without any trace remaining of weariness or rness, He hastens to relieve them. First, uietens the tempest in His disciples' hearts, uking their unbelief and calming their s; then He stills the storm without, uking the winds and the sea; "and there a great calm." blessed, there is no one to cry, "Hosannah to the Son of David!" His friends, if He has any, have gone back, and walk no more with Him; but His old enemies the Pharisees do not fail Him; and they are not alone now, nor, as be- fore, in alliance only with those naturally in sympathy with them, but have actually made a league with their great opponents, the two rival parties of Pharisee and Sadducee, finding in their common hatred of the Christ of God a sinister bond of union. This is the first time in this gospel the Sadducees are mentioned as coming in contact with Jesus. Some of them had come to the baptism of John, to His great astonishment; but beyond this, they have, as yet, put in no appearance. They were the aris- tocracy of the land, and held the most impor- tant offices of Church and State in the capital. It is, therefore, the less to be wondered at that up to this time the Carpenter of Nazareth should have been beneath their notice. Now, however, the news of His great doings in the north has, at last, compelled attention. The result is this combination with the Pharisees, who have already for some time been engaged in the attempt to put Him down. There is in- dication elsewhere that the Herodians had also united with them; so we may look upon this as the culmination of the crisis in Galilee, when all the forces of the country have been aroused to active and bitter hostility.

WILL JESUS COME?

Scripture the Only Source of Reliable Information—The Difference Between Speculation and Prophecy—Christ's Own Answer—The Answer of the Angels—An Apostolic Answer—The Personal Coming—A Blessed Hope.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

I DO not write on this sacred theme for critics, nor for cavillers, nor yet for the unteachable. Nor do I write for advanced prophetic students. My desire is to present to the general reader, clearly, simply, and briefly, an explana- tion and exposition of the subject, Will Jesus come again?

The Christian believer cannot admit nor al- low any human opinion or speculation concern- ing the future. Who knoweth of to-morrow? Who can determine the events of the next hour? There is but one infallible authoritative source of knowledge regarding the days before us, namely the sure Word of Prophecy. We may not accurately interpret the prophetic Scriptures, we may not clearly understand them, we may not easily arrive at their exact meaning. But of this we are persuaded, that outside of the Bible, all forecastings are speculations. Neither from the past history of the world, nor from its present developments can anyone form a basis of calculation whereby to determine fu- ture events. The question which concerns the true believer, first and last, is, Have we a "Thus saith the Lord?" If so, we bow to when it has spoken. Where it is silent, we may indulge in harmless guesses, but we must not proclaim them infallible decisions. What know we of future contingencies? Just so much as the Antediluvians knew of a coming flood be- fore Noah warned them, and even then they be- lieved him not. No Christian will deny the pro- phetic features of the Bible. Much that is now history was once prophecy, and the literal ful- filment of events as they had been predicted, is the "magic "Sesame," which opens the gates of the future to the devout and in- quiring mind. The spirit shows us things to come because He has already inspired holy men to write of them.

Let us now with becoming reverence, and gladness of heart, approach this most joyous hope which has impressed and influenced the church in every age. Will the Lord Jesus, the Eternal Word who appeared once on earth, re- turn again and touch its soil with His blessed feet? Will He who was born of woman, who became the Servant of all, come again in sovereign majesty and receive from the world the homage of universal worship, and the crown of univer- sal supremacy? Let each reader take his Bible and bear in mind that our study is, Will Jesus come again in person to our world?

Christ's Own Answer.

1. Our first quotation is a statement from His own gracious lips. (John 14: 2, 3.) "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and pre- pare a place for you, I will come again." No one surely will dispute the fact that when Jesus said "I go," He meant a personal, literal removal of Himself to the Father. The "I" is personal, not a personation; the "go" is literal, not figurative. Thus Jesus in His own person de- parted out of the world by ascension to the heavens. So, according to the simplest laws of language, the promise "I will come again," must be both personal and literal. The "I come," answers to the "I go." According to this pre- cious promise of Jesus, is it not right to expect that some time He will again return to earth? surely no past event can be construed into a ful- filment of this promise. Neither the coming of the Spirit, the destruction of Jerusalem, the dis- covery of America, the birth of the Republic, nor the claims of the man, Schweinfurth, that he is the promised Messiah, nor the article of death will satisfy the thoughtful mind, that in any or all of these occurrences Jesus has come.

Oh, my reader think of the promise and re- joice. He came and died for us. This is love bleeding for its beloved. He went on high to prepare an abode for us. This is love active for the beloved. He will not send a myriad of angels to convey the beloved home, but He will come Himself and receive His church—His bride to Himself. This is love satisfying itself; "that where I am there ye may be also."

The Answer of the Angels.

2. Turn we now to Acts 1: 9-11. "And when He had spoken these things, while they beheld, He was taken up." The first part of His own promise was then exactly fulfilled. He was taken up. Had He not said "I go?" Now hear the white-robed messengers address the disci- ples. (V: 11.) "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." How did He ascend? In His human glorified body. How shall He descend? In like man- ner. Who ascended? Jesus. Who shall descend? This same Jesus. How was He accompanied in His ascension? With a cloud. How shall He return? "And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud." (Luke 21: 27.) Surely this verse teaches on its very surface that Jesus is coming again personally, visibly, gloriously.

The Apostolic Answer.

3. One verse more. (1. Thess. 4: 16.) "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." Again we must admit that this passage refers to our Lord's personal return. He is now in heaven where He ascended, and will continue there in His priestly mediatorial office until the hour arrives when He shall return to claim His own. Then shall the dead in Christ rise first, and the living saints shall join them in their triumphal pro- cession, while they challenge the graves long occupied, but now empty. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

But keeping to the line of thought before us, we must not overlook the fact that the Lord comes not by deputy, but Himself. This then, is our assured hope. It is not a speculation, not a philosophy, not a supposition, not even a cal- culation, but an assurance based on the infallible promises of God. Oh, believer, are you tried now? Are you afflicted now? Are you sorely beset by many adversaries? Is your heart wrung with anguish as you see the wicked prosper, and the ungodly prevail? Fear not! Lift up your head for your redemption draweth nigh. Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober and hope perfectly for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus.

MORNING IN THE COUNTRY.

IT is never real morning except in the country. In the city, early in the day, there is a mixed color that climbs down over the roofs opposite, and through the smoke of the chimney that makes people think it is time to get up and comb their hair. But there is real morning in the country. Mornings! descending "from God out of heaven like a bride adorned for her husband." A few moments before I looked out and the army of night shadows were striking their tents. A red light on the horizon that does not make me think, as it did Alexander Smith, of the "barren beach of hell," but more like unto the fire kindled on the shore by Him whom the disciples saw at daybreak stirring the blaze on the beach of Genesareth. Just now the dew woke up in the hammock of the tree branches, and the light kissed it. Yonder, leaning against the sky, two great uprights of flame crossed many rundles of fire. Some Jacob must have been dreaming. Through those burnished gates a flaming chariot rolls. Some Elijah must be ascending. Morning! I wish I had a rousing bell to wake the whole world up to see it. Every leaf a psalm. Every flower a censer. Every bird a chorister. Every sight beauty. Every sound music. Trees transfigured. The skies in conflagration. The air as if sweeping down from hanging gardens of heaven. The foam of celestial seas splashed on the white tops of the spiræa. The honeysuckle on one side of the porch challenges the sweetbrier on the other. The odors of heliotrope overflow the urns and flood the garden. Springias with bridal blossoms in their hair, and roses bleeding with a very carnage of color. Oh, the glories of day-dawn in the country! My eyes moisten. Unlike the flaming sword that drove out the first pair from Eden, these fiery splendors seem like swords unsheathed by angel hands to drive us in.

We all need the refreshing influences of more out-door life. Almost every nature, however sprightly, sometimes will drop into a minor key, or a subdued mood, that in common parlance is recognized as "the blues." There may be no adverse causes at work, but somehow the bells of the soul stop ringing, and you feel like sitting quiet, and you strike off fifty per cent. from all your worldly and spiritual prospects. The immediate cause may be a northeast wind, or a balky liver, or an enlarged spleen, or pickled oysters at twelve o'clock the night previous. In such depressed state no one can afford to sit for an hour. First of all, let him get up and go out of doors. Fresh air and the faces of cheerful men, and pleasant women, and frolicsome children, will, in fifteen minutes, kill moping. The first moment your friend strikes the key-board of your soul it will ring music. A hen might as well try on populous Broadway to hatch out a feathery group, as for a man to successfully brood over his ills in lively society. Do not go for relief among those who feel as badly as you do. Let not tooth ache, and rheumatism, and hypochondria go to see toothache, rheumatism and hypochondria. On one block in Brooklyn lives a doctor, an undertaker and a clergyman. That is not the row for a nervous man to walk on, lest he soon need all three. Throw back all the shutters of your soul and let the sunlight of genial faces shine in. Besides that, why sit ye here with "the blues," ye favored sons and daughters of men, shone upon by such stars, and breathed on by such air, and sung to by so many pleasant sounds? You ought not to be seen moping: especially, if light from the better world strikes its aurora through your night-sky, ought you to be cheerful. You can afford to have a rough luncheon by the way if it is soon to end amid the banquetters in white. Sailing toward such a blessed port, do not have our flag at half-mast. Leave to those who take too much wine "the gloomy raven tapping at the chamber door, on the night's Plutonian shore," and give us the robin red-breast and the chaffinch. Let some one with a strong voice give out the long-metre Doxology, and the whole world "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." We all need to freshen up in our work, and a dose of the country is a mighty corrective.

FAINTING IN CHURCH.

THE best men and women will sometimes sicken in a meeting-house. There will be something in poor ventilation, or in dulness and protractedness of the sermon, or the ill-health of the auditor, to make him faint. Let there be all sympathy, and delicacy evidenced in removing the patient to an adjoining room and resuscitating him. If nothing better than selfish influence, let us be attentive and helpful, since our turn to faint may come next. But one thing we protest against, and that is that when a person faints in church all the curious people go out to see what is the matter, and hinder the resuscitation by standing close around the sufferer, when his or her chief want is not a gaping crowd but fresh air.

We were one Sabbath preaching in a village church in Northern New York. Whether it was our sermon that sickened her, or the heat of the day, we never knew; but a young lady excited all our sympathies by getting faint. Her father and mother and sister and lover and the sexton went out with her, as it was proper them to do. But in addition to that an old lady sitting beside the pulpit, and whose characteristic was inquisitiveness, glided down the aisle. This started all the old ladies, for it was uncertain now whether the old lady aforesaid had been taken sick herself, or whether she had gone out to administer to the first patient. The old ladies having departed, the old gentlemen felt as if it would be no more than gallant to go, too, and so they joined in the procession. The middle-aged people in the congregation, seeing the elderly people going, felt that it was more to let the old people go to so much work, while they, the middle-aged, sat indifferent, and therefore, many of them, urged by this peculiar circumstance, went out also. As the middle-aged men were departing they met the old ladies coming in to get their hats, the latter protesting in the aisle, in a low grumble of conversation, to rejoin the former on the grass.

By this time the children in church had begun to look after them, and as some of them had never seen anybody faint, they went out on a tour of discovery till we turned round the pulpit to the minister behind us and suggested that we go likewise. But as he protested, we tarried. We found out afterward that the maiden was only a little sick, but that she was crowded around her so closely that she had no chance at all, and so entirely succumbed to nervousness.

Let this be remembered, that six persons all that at such times can be serviceable in the most urgent and painful case, and that beyond that the people who crowd around are a hindrance and a nuisance. After you find that enough have offered their services, better retire. There are inquisitive people who go to funerals, and go early so that they can see the family take leave of the corpse, and that kind of people love to stand round a sick person, telling afterward how pale she looked, how her fingers clutched, and what words in her momentary dementation she uttered.

THE modern doctrine of evolution is one great mystery. It hatches out fifty mysteries, and the fifty hatch out a thousand, and the thousand hatch out a million. Why, my brother, not admit the one great mystery of God, and have that settle all the other mysteries? I can more easily appreciate the fact that God by a stroke of his omnipotence could make more than I could realize how out of five million of ages he could evolve one, putting on a life here and a little there. It would have been just as great a miracle for God to have turned our orang-outang into a man as to make a man out and out—the one job just as big as the other. It seems to me we had better let God have a little place in our world somewhere.

THE cylinder of the printing-press is to me one of the wheels of the Lord's chariot. The good newspaper will overcome the bad, and the honey-bees will outnumber the hornets. Instead of the three or four religious newspapers that once begged a living, sitting down one week on some good man's door-step to receive a thankful if not kicked off, now many of the denominations have stalwart journals that swing their scythe through the sins of the world, and are avant couriers of the Lord's coming.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Amended Tariff Bill was Passed in the Senate by a strict party vote: yeas, 40; nays 29; and a Conference Committee met on Wednesday 10th inst. The debate lasted six hours. Messrs Hoar, (Rep.) Hiscock, (Rep.) Vest, (Dem.) Turpie, (Dem.) Vance, (Dem.) and others participating. An amendment offered by Senator Plumb (Republican) imposing a tax of $1.25 a gallon on distilled spirits was defeated. The Senate will act on its amendments to the House bill. It is believed there is now an improved prospect of a new bill passing the House.

Mr. Chauncey M. Depew Returned from Europe Wednesday, his stay abroad having been somewhat shortened on account of the railroad strike. Speaking at a reception afterward he said: "I want to state just here that in no event of my life and in no utterance that I make in the presidency of the United States will I mind." He spoke pleasantly of Mr. Stone, Lord Salisbury, and other distinguished men he had met abroad this summer, and of the keen interest Europeans take in American politics and especially the McKinley bill, which seems to have excited a scare in some cities he found the people talking of—"McKinley" as some terrible person who was preparing to depopulate Europe and all of absurd things. He had nothing to say concerning the recent strike except that he approved of the course adopted by acting President Webb.

The Great Political Event of the Week was the election on the 7th inst, and the triumphant return to Congress of Speaker Reed with a plurality of 4,500. Mr. Reed's political opponents in his own State, and elsewhere had confidently predicted, if not his defeat, at least his election by a plurality so small that it would be equivalent to a rebuke of the methods he has adopted, as presiding officer of the lower house of Congress, to which they have so signally objected. Mr. Reed's friends, even, were by no means sanguine of any result beyond a narrow election—possibly by 1,500. Hon. Melvin D. Clark of Portland, his opponent in the field, avers that that the money influence, together with Mr. Reed's energetic campaign the two preceding elections, won the victory. Gov. Clark was re-elected by 10,000 plurality. Mr. Clark attributes the result to "the conservative influence the people have, in the ability of the Republican party to govern the country wisely."

Several State Conventions have been Held the week. The Kansas Democratic and Reunionist Conventions met at Wichita on the 1st, in different halls, and both adopted resolutions declaring against prohibition, and in favor of high license and local option. The Democrats nominated ex-Governor Charles Johnson for Governor. On the same day the Hampshire State Prohibition Convention at Concord, nominated Josiah M. Fletcher of Andover, for Governor, on a platform strongly denouncing the saloon power; and the Massachusetts Prohibitionists at Worcester named John Blackmer, of Springfield, as their gubernatorial standard bearer this fall on a similar platform. The Indiana Republican Convention at Indianapolis, endorsed the national administration after a lively fight. In Mississippi, the principal question before the Constitutional Convention thus far seems to have been Woman Suffrage, which some of the speakers advocated as a means of more firmly establishing the supremacy in the South.

Last Week the Grant Monument Association selected a design for the memorial monument to be erected to the late Gen. Grant. The designer is John H. Duncan of New York City, and the monument will be in the form of a wall of granite or marble, 100 feet square and 100 feet high, surmounted by a dome 75 feet in height. It will be in the Doric style of architecture, and the ornamentation will be very simple. Around the dome will be sculptured figures, including four of the Generals attached to Grant's staff during the war. The main entrance will be a gateless portico, fronted by a colossal equestrian statue of Gen. Grant. The crypt will be 85 feet by 75 feet, open to the top of the dome. On one side will be a granite sarcophagus for the body of the dead hero, and also ultimately for that of Mrs. Grant. In the crypt will be a memorial hall where fully 1,000 persons can assemble. The cost of the structure will be $500,000, exclusive of the sculptures. The designer will receive $25,000 for his work. The design is shown above.

At Last the Directors of the World's Fair have chosen a site for the Exhibition of 1892. It will be a dual site, partly on the Lake front and partly in Jackson Park. The Lake front is a spacious grassy common of ninety acres, on the margin of Lake Michigan, and near the business centre of Chicago. The grand entrance to the Exposition will be located there, and also the buildings for the fine arts. In Jackson Park, which is also on the Lake shore, the agricultural, live stock, and other natural exhibits will be displayed. There are over 500 acres available at the park. Both sides will be connected by rail and water accommodations, so that visitors can pass from one to the other in a few minutes. Chicago as a whole seems to be satisfied with the choice, and will now go to work energetically to prepare for the exhibition. The distance between the lake front and Jackson Park is about five miles, and while this fact, in the opinion of some, may be a serious drawback to the success of the fair, it is believed by the management, that transportation between the two can be made so rapid and frequent that it will be an attraction rather than otherwise. The picture given in this column shows the entrance to the proposed pavilion and panorama on the Lake shore. It will be one of the many architectural beauties already designed, and among which may be mentioned a "Fountain of Nations" with a grand central dome, and characteristic buildings to represent Spain, Italy, Salvador, France, the Aztecs, Arabia, Mexico, Egypt, Greece, India and the Argentine Republic.

The National Crop Report Just Issued Shows that the August droughts inflicted very general injury on corn, the average (70.1) being much lower than last year, and the lowest since 1881. Winter wheat is a disappointment, the average (73.5) being below that of July, and spring wheat has been reduced considerably. Rye is a smaller crop than was expected, (85.4 average) oats is the lowest ever reported (64.4) and other cereals are proportionately lower than in 1889. The Department of Agriculture says the September outlook for cotton is less favorable than August. The highest average is 95 in North Carolina, and the lowest 84 in Alabama. The boll worm has hurt the crop materially in the west.

With the Death of Rev. Henry Parry Liddon, D.D., D.C.L., Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, one of the most stirring and eloquent of modern English preachers passes away. Canon Liddon was born in 1829, educated at Oxford, and after taking orders was rapidly promoted, securing these advancements largely by his eloquence. He became a leader of the Liberal High Church party, and was three times chosen select preacher at Oxford. In 1866 he delivered the famous "Bampton Lectures," which secured him recognition as a leading thinker and scholar. In 1870 he was installed as Canon Residentiary of St. Paul's and about the same time Oxford honored him with the degrees of D. D. and D. C. L. It is told of Canon Liddon, that he offended the Queen on one occasion, when in preaching before her Majesty, he addressed her as "Madame." Her resentment is said to have interfered with the further preferment of the talented preacher. At all events he never preached before her again.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Talmage's many friends in New York City are indebted to the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the opportunity of hearing the great preacher in their own city. Mr. Klopsch has rented the New York Academy of Music for a series of Sunday evenings, commencing Sept. 28. From that date until the opening of the New Tabernacle, Dr. Talmage will preach in Brooklyn in the morning, and in New York in the evening. A plate collection will be taken up every Sunday evening, the total proceeds of which will be distributed among the hospitals of the city.

Fulton street Daily Noon Prayer meeting will celebrate its thirty-third anniversary on Tuesday next, in the chapel, 113 Fulton Street, and 58 Ann Street, New York. In all these years the meeting has been held daily; business men have frequented it and thousands of cases have been recorded of prayers offered there being answered in the most remarkable way.

Rev. Stephen Merritt has rented a house in Eighth Ave. for a novel kind of mission work. Continuous Gospel services will be held in the first floors, and on the other floors are a restaurant and sleeping accommodations. Mr. Merritt says that on the day of opening, the key will be thrown away, for the place is to be open day and night, so that men who desire to quit their evil lives may have the opportunity of avoiding temptations by living among Christian associates under Christian influences.

The following missionaries sailed from San Francisco Sept. 4, per steamer Oceanic: For North China, the Rev. M. L. Taft, wife, and child; the Rev. I. T. Headland and wife; T. R. Jones M. D., and Mrs. Stella B. Jones, M. D., Miss Rachel R. Benn, M. D., and Miss Ida Stevenson, M. D. For West China, J. H. McCartney, M. D., and wife. For Corea, Miss Rosetta Sherwood, M. D., and Miss Margaret Bengel. For Japan, Miss Kate A. Livingston, and Miss Grace Tucker.

William Lindsay, a young English missionary worker arrived here last week from London, for the purpose of continuing his missionary efforts among the laboring classes of this country. He was for ten years engaged in denominational work among iron-workers and colliers of Staffordshire, being associated with F. A. Homer, an English magistrate, who has been a voluntary mission worker for 30 years. Much of Mr. Lindsay's work has been done in Sedgely, near Dudley, where he had considerable success. He was also two years with Rev. A. G. Girdlestone of All Saints, Clapham Park, as lay reader.

THE HOLD-FASTS OF FAITH.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR
C. H. SPURGEON.

The Difficulty Abraham Felt—Isaac's Death Voiding the Promise—How His Faith Triumphed—Confidence in God's Power to Raise the Dead—I. The Time to Exercise Such Faith—When the Soul is Spiritually Dead—In Soul Trouble—In Temporal Trials—In Concern for a Dying Church—Confidence in God's Creating Power—II. The Basis of Faith—III. The Outcome—Looking at Things from God's Standpoint—Obeying—Justification Certain.

"Who is the father of us all, (as it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before Him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were."—Romans 4: 16, 17.

ABRAHAM had received an assurance from the Lord that he was to be the father of many nations. His faith in this promise underwent great trials. Where there is the sweet honey of promise, there the wasps of doubt will be gathered together. A promise calls for faith; but through our natural depravity, it awakens unbelief; and there is a struggle around the sacred promise, such as that represented in the prayer, "Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief." Satan, with slimy flattery, decoys men into a belief of his lie; but the God of truth gives us His bare promise, and bids us believe it; and when questions suggest themselves, He does not relax His claim, but bids us still believe. True faith, as the work of God, is not a thing to be put down: it is a conquering grace, and makes a brave fight against wicked unbelief.

While doing so, faith has her eyes open, and when she has discovered a helpful truth she makes immediate use of it as a holdfast, even as Abraham did in the case now before us.

Abraham's Difficulty.

The great difficulty with Abraham was death. Death was around him on every side. God had promised him life, and life more abundantly; for he was to be the father of many nations, and have as many as the stars of heaven for multitude; but as to all possibility of his being a father, his body was now dead. He believed that in Isaac should his seed be called, and therefore he looked that God should "raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure." The patriarch's faith settled down upon God's power to quicken the dead, and he found in that unquestioned truth a foundation for the firmest confidence. The truth of God's power to quicken the dead met all the difficulties of Abraham's position. He argued: What if my son, when growing up, should be dead on the altar? He that made me the promise can raise him up from the dead; for what He has promised He is able to perform. Abraham's faith was a nail fastened in a sure place. He knew Jehovah as "God, who quickeneth the dead;" and that resurrection word was, to his faith, a shout of victory. Thus, you see, in the hour of trial, Abraham's faith fell back upon the two facts of resurrection and creation, and there

It Rested in Peace.

I desire, at this time, without wisdom of words, in great simplicity, to teach this one lesson. It is a very plain lesson, but if it be well learned, it will be a well of strength and solace to you. God raiseth the dead, and created out of nothing, and therefore he can carry out the promises of His Gospel. Get this worked into your own souls, and you will be strong in faith. Once strong in faith you are strong everywhere, for as a man's faith is, so is he. If your faith shall learn to stay herself upon eternal principles, and find her rest in the omnipotence of God, you will become like Abraham, a prince among men; and this service will bring you a blessing.

I. The time for such a faith as this. To believe God unstaggeringly in the teeth of appearances—when is the best time for this? This day is not at its best when all goes well with us; for when we walk by sight, we scarcely walk by faith. When the soul is full of joy, there is wide space for gratitude, but narrower room for faith. "What a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?" The light of fleeting day is not for perceptions which deal with eternity: Faith's Hour of Prime is midnight. Even the horror of darkness affords her a better opportunity for communion with the covenant of God. Faith beholds her visions in the night: she wants not earthly light. A blind man loses nothing by the set of sun, and faith loses nothing by the removal of outward evidences. Faith has wrought many of her greatest deeds in hours which seemed least suitable for her undertakings. Sunshine-faith comes and goes; true faith stands sentry at all hours. Fair-weather faith is poor stuff; give me winter-faith, which has warmth within it when the blasts from the north freeze flesh and blood, even to the bone.

First, as to trusting God on account of the resurrection, we shall find it greatly in season when our soul is at first made to feel its spiritual death. I am addressing some who mournfully cry, "How can I be saved? I am as dead as the earth I stand upon. I feel nothing. 'Now is a special time, poor sinner, for believing in God that quickeneth the dead. Now is thy choice opportunity for testing the resurrection power of the Lord Jesus, who said, 'I am the resurrection and the life.' God can keep His promise of grace to thee, even to thee, if thou believest; for He quickeneth the dead."

Next, there is another notable occasion for faith, when the child of God is in apprehension of death through soul trouble.

Your Old Sins Rise

up and accuse you: your present evil tendencies, like a rotting body of death, surround you; you find no comfort or joy in life. It seems as though God had given you up, and left you to perish. Though once you rejoiced before Him, you are forced to sigh as one forsaken of his God, shut up for destruction. Now, even now, you are on a vantage-ground for glorifying the Lord by faith. It may be that, at this time, you enjoy nothing when you go up to religious services, and in reading or praying at home the chill of death makes every godly exercise a burden. You are so harrassed with fears, so worried with cares, so tortured with regrets, and so tried with temptations that you are forced to cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Come, my brother, look to the strong for strength! Thou canst do nothing, it is clear; therefore cast thyself on Him who is able to quicken the dead. Is there not foothold here?

One more case occurs to me. This is a very sad one to my own heart. When death crushes down the church, and there seems no sign of revival, then should we believe in the God of resurrection. The carnal man cares not for but the spiritual man takes pleasure in her stones, and favors the dust thereof. Some of us would sooner suffer personal calamity than see the cause of God and truth in a low condition. It may be that, in the church of which you are a member, you pine under a blight. Little prayer, no Christian fellowship, very few conversions, very little desire to win souls: your heart sinks within you, for death is all around. You look abroad, and there is the same state of things. We are sweltering in false doctrine and suffocating in worldliness. In many quarters, religion itself seems dead, and buried beneath a mound of rubbishing entertainments. What then? Where shall we turn for comfort? Here is our mainstay: God is able to quicken the dead. Of the stones of Jordan's river, He is able to raise up children unto Abraham. The Lord God is able, from the slums and dens of London, to call a people that shall maintain His truth.

I turn now to another ground of Abraham's hope. He had no child, and yet God tells him that he shall have a seed as numerous as the stars of heaven. How is the man of God to believe this? His second holdfast is the creating power of God: He calleth the things which be not as though they were. He can create as well as quicken. When can we use this fact as a reason for faith? Friend, look to this, when necessary graces are lacking in thy heart. Though thou canst not find one of the saving graces within thy soul, yet believe in the promise of the Lord. What if within thy bosom at present there seems to be neither repentance nor faith, nor hope, nor love, yet the Lord can create them all within thee. He can call things that are not and they will appear.

I spoke just now in reference to temporal troubles; there is a grand platform for faith when no help is visible. When you cannot see any friend who will assist you, nor any way, which you can help yourself, then trust in the Creator who can make a way. Our friends like swallows, soon quit us when our summer is over, but God's promise is not dependent upon man's faithfulness. We do not see how we can be delivered; but then the Lord's word is in the sea, and His footsteps are not known. My dear friend, do you not believe in God, you Maker, who calleth things that are not as though they were? He can deliver you.

Once again let me speak of

The Church in Evil Days.

Few men seem raised up to preach with power, and to lead on the host of God to victory. This is very sad: but suppose death were everywhere, death in the pew, and death in the pulpit, death among the prophets, and death among the people; yet the Lord would calleth things that are not as though they were, has but to give the word, and great will be the company of them that publish it. Our royal Leader has hidden forces at His command. Sir Walter Scott speaks of the highland chieftain, in the lone glen, who gave his whistle shrill, and straightway an army arose where none had been seen before—

"From shingles gray their lances start,
The bracken-bush sends forth the dart,
The rushes and the willow-wand
Are bristling into axe and brand,
And every tuft of broom gives life
To plaided warrior armed for strife."

Thus can our Lord garrison His church in the moment. The Lord can send martyrs if they be wanted, confessors, preachers, writers, a consecrated men and women of every sort. I have no timorous thoughts; but let us glorify God by firm faith.

II. Secondly, we will observe upon how the things are manifest to us, even resurrection and creation. We shall speak of

The Basis of This Faith.

If our faith is to be based on resurrection, what do we know about it? Paul seems to prefer every other resurrection, and to dwell only upon the resurrection of our Lord. Realize that resurrection more and more, for that lies your hope. God, who has raised His Son and thereby set free his people may well be trusted to fulfil every promise. To this I say that we know that all the dead will rise; surely on this ground we may rest in the mighty God. We have seen others spiritually quickened, and made to live unto God; more, in the case of many of us, we, who were dead in trespasses and sins, have been quickened; and therefore, knowing of a surety that God quickeneth the dead, we are persuaded that what He has promised He will perform.

If you desire another basis for your faith, and we hardly think you do—there is Creation. If you wish to strengthen your faith, believe in creation and you have not far to go: your body is full of wonders. See the fields their ripe harvest; wander in the woods and forests, mark the hills and valleys, the rippling brooks and flowing streams and the wide expansive ocean. Look up to the sun, the clouds, the sky. Go out at night and watch the moon and stars. Who made all these? Who laid them out in their order? Who built the pillared arch, which covers all things? Who created everything from the tiniest atom to the greatest world? Who but God? We are living the works of His hand all around us, and to believe in Him without a doubt.

When you have looked at creation, remember providence, which is a prolongation of the creative act. The Power which made all the ds them. The Lord keeps them in their, or they could not remain. They tell us that the universe stands because of God the captive of His own laws? I no such God. He doeth all things. Natural laws are but the summary of God's usual working; but the laws neither hinder anything, nor perform anything, as of themselves. He Himself causeth everything to be, or to change, as seemeth Him good. As everything upheld by the word of His, surely you have good ground for being in His power to keep His promise to you.

God in Grace.

Meanwhile, a creation work of grace is going on around you. If you do not feel it in your brother, you can soon see it in others. To the people of God, and they will tell and to new converts and they will show the story of what free grace has done is telling, yet untold. One will tell you, "I drunkard, and the Lord converted me." Another will confess, "My feet had almost been cut off, but the Lord preserved me." Another declares, "I was in the furnace, and the Lord walked in the fire with me." Another will testify, "I was brought low, and the Lord lifted me up." You will have abundant evidence that grace-creation is going on continually, and that God is working great wonders in the midst of His people; wherefore, be of good cheer, and put your trust in God.

You are holding on to anything but God in Jesus, let it go—let it go at once! You are hurt by falling into the unseen arms. You have heard of one who, wandering in the night, saw what he thought to be an awful precipice, and as he was about to fall, in sheer desperation he caught the root of a tree, and held on for dear life. His arms were weary; his legs were ready to fail him; but he held on to the death-grip. At last he was obliged to let go his hold, and when he had done so, he fell; and you expect me to add that he was crushed to pieces. No, he only fell a few feet upon a soft bed of moss, for he was not upon a precipice at all. When you let go all your trusts, you think it an awful thing to fall into our Saviour's arms; but it is not so: it is a dangerous venture, but a wise reliance. When she falls upon the bosom of her Lord, if you trust Him who loved you unto death, you are safe and happy.

But now, let us review

The Outcome of this Faith.

Abraham believed, and looked at things from a new standpoint. Now, faith has the wonderful property of becoming like the God in whom it rests, and of looking at things as God sees them.

How I wish, my dear, tried brother, you could see your troubles as God sees them—yours, as means to your advancement in grace! At affliction to-day as a process that is ending you. Sinner, when you believe in Jesus, God looks at you as saved, justified, forgiven, quickened into eternal life. If you believe in Jesus, see yourself as God sees you. It is a thing for a sinner, dead in himself, to say, "yet I live;" but assuredly he may say it. A great thing for one consciously guilty to say, "And yet I am justified;" still, it is true, and no presumption to believe it. Oh, this is to look at things from God's point of view! But you see that Abraham considered his own now dead. Our Authorized Version runs—"He considered not his own body now."

The Revised Version has: "He considered his own body now as good as dead." It is a curious fact that among the ancient manuscripts there are two readings of almost equal value: one with the "not," and one without it. Both mean the same thing. You say, "What is that?" He considered his own body dead, but he did not make any consideration of that fact, but believed in God all the time. He considered it so far as to be fully of it; but he did not consider it so as to make a question about the fulfilment of the promise.

O poor seeking soul, listen to this! Turn yourself to be spiritually dead. Think as badly of yourself as ever you like, for you are worse than you think you are; but after you have considered the fearful fact of your lost estate, do not go on to consider it as any hindrance to God in the work of His grace. Jesus is able to save you over the head of all your death, and guilt, and corruption.

Abraham, as the outcome of his faith, obeyed God in all things—a very essential point, this. Believing God, he left his estate in Ur of the Chaldees, and came to Canaan, to live in tents, and wander about like a gipsy, that he might dwell where the Lord had called him to sojourn alone, a stranger in a strange land. If you believe the promise of the Gospel, you will come out from the world, you will come out from sin, and you will become one of those strangers who follow Jesus whithersoever he goeth. God will be your Leader, Christ will be your Commander; and though in the world you will not be of the world. All true believers, like Abraham, obey.

Obedience is Faith in Action.

You are to walk in the steps of the faith of father Abraham. His faith did not sit still, it took steps; and you must take these steps also by obeying God because you believe Him. That faith which has no works with it is a dead faith, and will justify no one.

Best of all, because of this, Abraham was accounted righteous. And who accounted him righteous? Well, not the sons of men: they knew him as righteous only by his outward character; but God accounted him righteous because he had faith. The moment you believe in His risen Son, God counts you righteous; and as you keep on believing, God accounts you righteous. "Oh, but I am a poor, imperfect creature!" God counts you righteous. "I strive after holiness, but I am not what I want to be." God counts you righteous. God never makes mistakes; He never miscounts. If He counts a man righteous, that man is righteous, depend upon it—righteous in such a way that he may stand before the judgment-seat of God at the last, and none shall be able to lay anything to his charge. Believe, and you shall be accounted righteous. The Lord help you, for Jesus' sake; Amen.

CAPE HAITI'S GROWING MISSION.

AMONG the visitors to New York at the present time is a missionary from the West Indies, the Rev. Westmore S. Smith, of Cape Haiti, a clergyman of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Mr. Smith tells an interesting story of his experiences at Cape Haiti, in the North of the Island of Haiti, during the recent war between the North and South, when the followers of President Legitime and his rival Hippolyte, were arrayed against each other on the field and on the sea. The mission, where Mr. Smith has charge, is located on a beautiful bay and was within easy range of the shells from the cruisers, Toussaint l'Ouverture and Dessalines, which attacked the town. Fortunately the aim of the gunners was poor and they miscalculated the range of their steel Krupp cannon, shooting over the houses and far too high to inflict any serious damage, although they succeeded in badly frightening everybody. At the Cape, all the natives were "Nordists" or Hyppolite men, and for a time sympathy ran very high. At the conclusion of hostilities however, it rapidly quieted down and the peace of the settlement was restored.

The Mission at Cape Haiti was established about fifty years ago, since which time very little has been done towards improving the mission buildings and extending the facilities for the mission to keep pace with the growth of the work. One of the first incumbents of the mission was the Rev. Mr. Bird a Wesleyan preacher of great energy and devotion. There have been several since then, the two immediately preceding Mr. Smith having died of yellow fever. They are buried under the shadow of the mission-house and their graves can be seen from the porch, or wide verandah of the preacher's residence. Four years ago Mr. Smith took charge. For six years previous to that time, the mission had been temporarily abandoned, partly owing to the unhealthiness of the climate for white men. A small body of Protestants carried on the work during this interval and a most worthy preacher, Frere Du Que, filled the mission pulpit every Sunday. Still, the congregation was in sore spiritual straits and the want of a regular organization was greatly felt. Cape Haiti is the second town of importance on the island and has a population of about 13,000, almost all, Catholics, with the exception of a small colony of English-speaking people from Jamaica, the Bahamas, and St. Thomas.

"It was at the call of God," said Mr. Smith, "that I went there. At the time, I was engaged in mission work in Trinidad, St. Vincent, Barbadoes. On reaching Cape Haiti, I found a small, miserable little mission-house, not fit for anybody to live in. After being there five days, we rented a house for which I had to pay thirty dollars a month. Everything is very high there. Our first work was to build a respectable mission house, and we were enabled to accomplish this partly through the very kind assistance of President Hippolyte, who, during the trying period of the civil war, gave us one thousand dollars to help along. The building cost altogether about five thousand dollars, and is commodious and comfortable. The mission church and school, however, are wholly inadequate to accommodate the congregation, which has grown considerably since the close of the war. The church will not admit half the number who want to come there and hear the Gospel. It is absolutely necessary to have a larger building with a seating capacity of at least 300; the present church can only hold 200, and that with difficulty."

Since coming north, Mr. Smith has had an impression that it might be practicable to secure sufficient funds to transport to Haiti a church already built here, and which can be put together by native workmen at the Cape. Many good workmen are to be found there, but everything in the way of material is quite dear. He could pack it up and charter a schooner for the purpose. It would undoubtedly be a considerable saving.

Our pictures show the little church with the mission-school at the back. The latter is sadly dilapidated. Pastor Smith's idea, as explained to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is to take down the school building, and move it to the present church site, so that the new church will face the front and give free access to all the native Christians who desire to worship there. Immediately to the right of the church is the residence of the missionary. The portrait of Mr. Smith shows a man of rugged frame, and much determination—just the right sort of a preacher to make a success of mission work in a location, where there are obstacles that would drive many others off the field.

Another needed improvement in connection with the mission is the establishment of a school for girls. Part of the present school building is devoted to this purpose, but it is very difficult to get a good teacher. "Therefore" says the pastor, modestly, "I do what I can myself."

There are number of good, energetic friends who have been very helpful in this mission work at Cape Hayti. One of these—Mr. McKenzie, of Jamaica—has been the main instrument, in God's hand, in keeping the mission going. For several years past, he has lived at Cape Haiti, and has worked both week-day and Sunday in a most praise-worthy manner. Another who has been an ardent worker is a young lawyer, Auguste Albert, who eighteen months ago was converted under the mission ministry. He is quite a talented speaker and preaches regularly in the mission pulpit. The language everywhere used at the Cape is French. Since coming to New York, Mr. Smith has succeeded in securing the services of Miss Goetz, a German lady, who also speaks French, to teach the girl pupils. She was strongly recommended for the work by the Rev. A. B. Simpson, of the Missionary Training College.

The sum of $5,000 is needed to place the Cape Haiti Mission in a condition to do efficient service for the Master. With that amount, a church equal to the needs of the congregation can be erected and the good work of evangelization can go on unhindered. Any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who may wish to help the cause of the Gospel among the Haitians can do so by aiding this deserving mission. Contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be forwarded to their proper destination.

Mr. Smith wishes to explain that his statements, as occasionally reported in the American daily papers, have been inaccurately presented, and that in particular, the statement asserting the existence of cannibalism in Haiti, attributed to him, is entirely untrue.

THE GOSPEL IN ARMENIA.

THE field of Christian labor in Armenia is shortly to receive a valuable accession. The Rev. Bedros M. Krikorian, who was ordained at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church in this city in June last, will leave New York about November 1st, for the city of Orfa, in Mesopotamia, where he will begin clerical work at once.

Mr. Krikorian is a native of the city that is now to be the scene of his labors. He came to this country about four years ago and after a three years' course at Drew Seminary, was graduated last spring. Orfa offers an excellent field for missionary work. It is a city of great antiquity and is believed by many authorities to be the "Ur of the Chaldees" mentioned in Scripture. It has a population of between 45,000 and 50,000, of whom nearly 4,000 are Mohammedans and the rest Christians. Of the latter 4,000 are Armenians, with a large Christian church, and a strong, influential congregation. There are many native Christian teachers, yet there is abundant room for new helpers. There is at Orfa a self-supporting Protestant Congregational Church. Over twenty years ago, the American Board of Foreign Missions planted the seed which has since raised a grateful harvest of souls.

MRS. CECIL'S FAILURE.

A Story of the Sunday-school Lesson for Sept. 28. Mary's choice of the better part. Luke 10 : 38-42.

AT a brilliant social gathering in the home of a lady, who prided herself on being a leader of society, two ladies were sitting a little apart from the other guests, watching with amused interest the manœuvres of their hostess. As she moved around among her guests her attention was continually reverting to a girl of some eighteen years, who was evidently in such an assemblage for the first time.

"Mrs. Cecil's success is not very brilliant so far," said one of the ladies.

Mrs. Cecil was almost of the same opinion at the end of the evening. "You have positively no sense of what is best for yourself, Maud," she said to her sister, when they were alone together. "Do you think I should ever have reached my position, if I had acted as you have done. You don't make any effort. I noticed tonight that you seemed to take no interest in anything. When any one tried to talk with you, you had not a word to say. And it is not that you are dull; for when the curate was here the other evening you could talk charmingly to him about his wretched schools and clothing-clubs. It is sheer perversity and I consider you very ungrateful."

"Oh, do not say that, Gertrude," said the girl, the tears coming into her eyes. "I know you want to help me, but I cannot do what you wish. It is not in my nature to take interest in the matters that your guests think so important. They seem trivial to me beside the real business of life. All these questions of dress and amusement weary me."

"They are important to you. I want you to make a brilliant marriage, and you might do it with my help if you would take a little trouble. See what I have done, and you have more beauty than I and you have me to help you, while I had no one."

"But I do not care to make a brilliant marriage, Gertrude. I do not envy you at all; I think you are to be pitied. You live an empty frivolous life, and yet you have endless worries and annoyances; and what is the end of it all?"

"Is that your sincere honest opinion that I am to be pitied?"

"Yes; and I fear you will live to pity yourself, yet."

"Then I give you up. It is no use taking trouble for one who does not appreciate it. You may as well go back home and marry some poor curate, and be a drudge all your life." Mrs. Cecil went out of the room in a tempest of indignation. "Maud is a little idiot," said to her husband a few minutes after. "I can do nothing for her; she has no ambition."

"Beyond your power of development, is that he said."

"I fear so. I have talked plainly to her, given her a fair warning. Perhaps it may be her good, but I have not much hope."

"Why not let her go her own way? It is a very good way for the world. Such girls are the salt of the earth. If she does get the good things of life for herself, depend upon it she will make life better for other people. I never met a sweeter, more unselfish girl. I don't like to interfere, but upon my word, Gertrude, I am glad that you are not like make a worldly woman of her. I think she would be spoiled."

"What do you mean?" Mrs. Cecil asked sharply. "Would you have the girl sacrifice her chances?"

"Oh, I would have nothing to do with it is no concern of mine. All I contend that if Maud chooses to devote her life to good instead of to amusement and pleasure, those who come under her influence will be the better for it. Her choice will be a blessing of other people, and I am not sure it will be bad for herself. Your fashionable women are not always happy."

"Now you are talking nonsense. No one admires a charming woman of the world more than you do."

"Will you not let me admire the other too? I can imagine circumstances in which a woman of Maud's type would be much welcome to me than a woman of the type Maud is good and, after all, Gertrude, goodness is an excellent quality. The world would be a terrible place if all were intent on the advancement and careless of what became of others. I like a girl who is willing to sacrifice her own pleasure in order that some one may be made happier."

"Why that proves your own selfishness; you want to have people around you who will flatter themselves."

"Perhaps I may have had a selfish motive in the preference. I seldom analyze my motives, because I find it generally leads to the unpleasant discovery of some moral turpitude that I had not suspected before. But remember, I am not responsible for Maud's decision; I cannot ask her to sacrifice herself. If she has chosen the good part, I would not have her go away from me; that is all. I speak in the general interest. If you let her go her own way, there are some people who will be made happier by her, who may miss the good if you

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. LEANDER S. KEYSEK.

A Painful Decision.

AMONG those whose confidence in Howard's ability and earnestness had not been shaken by his first pulpit failure, was Dr.
Hamlyn, who knew only too well from his own experience how often a minister's power seems to desert him before an audience, and it was fortunate for the young novice that he had so kind and wise a mentor to advise him at this crisis. The next day was one of the bluest of "blue Mondays" for Howard. He was ashamed to meet his friends on the street, and so he kept himself in the seclusion of his own room until the afternoon, when he made his way to Dr. Hamlyn's study, and poured out his woes to the clergyman.

"I'm afraid I have mistaken my calling," he broke out. "My nature is too pliable, and I am too sensitive by temperament for the ministry. What shall I do?"

Dr. Hamlyn smiled at this, remembering only too well his own past experiences, and then said kindly: "You are not the first man who has had a blue Monday, and probably it is not the last you will have.
But, never mind, my dear sir, before many days your spirits will have are bound."

"Do you suppose I should ever have the courage to stand in your pulpit again after last night's experience?"
demanded Howard.

"Oh? yes Ha! ha!
I know how you feel,
sir. I have often felt so myself. Why, you'll want to redeem yourself sometime. The day will come when you will speak in my pulpit with such power as to silence every critic. But let me tell you where you have made a mistake. You have undertaken too much. While it is true that there is urgent need of personal work, it is also true that one man can't do everything. It is impossible for you to do so much outside pastoral duty and maintain yourself in condition for service in the pulpit. Spend at least the forenoon of each day in your study, and give only the afternoons to other duties. You are young yet, remember, and have not had a course of Biblical and theological training. You have to lay your foundation a little broader, my boy. You are not offended, are you?"

"Offended! I came here expecting a lecture and now you overwhelm me with kindness
You have saved me by your advice and sympathy, sir," he said, fervently. "I shall go to work again with renewed courage."

And taking several books with him that the Doctor had recommended for study, he withdrew, and when he got out on the street again, the sky was of a different hue, and the world had put on another garb. Our spiritual mood has everything to do with our interpretation of nature and man. The poor pessimist bewails continually the ills of life, the seeming cruelties of the laws of physical force, and cannot see the bright rifts in the cloud, simply because he is out of touch with God. Jeremiads are the strains of doubt; hosannas the outbursts of faith. And so Howard found it. A week of faithful work and study completely restored him to his normal spiritual condition, and never did he talk with more unction and cogent force than on the next Sunday evening as he stood in the pulpit of his own beloved mission.

Meanwhile he had been at Addie's side frequently, and, it must be conceded that an in-tangible coolness and constraint seemed to have come between them. By that subtle intuition peculiar to the human mind, Howard felt this, and her antipathy to the religion which had become his very life, partly revolted him, fight against the feeling as he would.
"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" kept ringing in his ears like a knell to his love.

The experience of the next few weeks was a very trying one to the young man. In the midst of his work, in the course of his reading, even in his devotions, thoughts of Addie More would intrude, in spite of his efforts. Everyone knows how an unsolved problem presents itself at all inconvenient times and asks for solution. It is like an unsatisfied and importu-nate creditor demanding that settlement which cannot be made. What ought he to do? What was his duty? On the one hand stood his honor, his word, the loving confidence of a good and beautiful woman. On the other the apprehension of a future in which his most cherished hopes, his burning enthusiasm, his highest, purest joys would be checkered and chilled by the companionship of an unsympathetic soul. Even now he felt a constraint in speaking to Addie of his work. He could not tell her of his joy over the conversion of a sinner, because she might hurt him by uttering a doubt of the utility or the genuineness of the change. When she was his wife, and he was laboring in the ministry and needing help and encouragement, her words would act like a wet blanket on the fire of his zeal and enthusiasm. The mere thought was dreadful. He went over the whole question again and again but could not see his way. Oh that Addie were a Christian! "Lord save her soul!" he cried continually.

As he carefully analyzed his feelings, Wescott realized that his love for Addie More was undiminished. If she were a believer—a Christian, she would be his ideal of a wife. He could wish nothing better. She would be perfect in her lover's eyes. But "one thing she lacked." Only one! But to a man intending to give all his life to the service of Christ, how much that one thing meant! Dwelling on these thoughts one day in his study in his sister's house, which he still made his home, he laid his pen down beside his manuscript and tilting his chair back, he clasped his hands behind his head in his favorite attitude when absorbed in thought. He had sat so for a long time, when he was aroused by a knock on the door.

"May I come in, Howard?" said the voice of Mrs. Bollis.

"Come" was the laconic answer.

"Howard," said Mrs. Bollis, taking a seat near him, "there is something I want to tell you. I hate to do it, but I think you ought to know. It is about Addie More."

Howard suspected from his sister's manner that her communication was in some way unfriendly toward Addie. He blushed and made an uneasy movement, with the irritation that a man feels when the woman whom he loves is criticized by some other woman. However he prepared to listen and his sister continued:

"I was sorry when you became engaged to her and I am still more sorry now that I hear of the way she talks. I am told that one of her friends spoke to her about your address the other evening and asked her if she believed what you said about there being no salvation except through Christ and she answered that she did not believe a word of it and wondered how you could make such a statement. Howard, I am afraid you cannot be happy with a wife so decidedly opposed to you."

"I have thought of that," Wescott answered; "but Addie is such a lovable girl, so pure and good that I feel sure she will become a Christian yet. I have had my own experience of doubt and I know how hard it is to shake it off. We must have patience and hope and pray. She is so good that she cannot hold out long."

"Is she?" asked Mrs. Bollis, dubiously. "There is something else that I have heard. The same person told me that she does not bear that character in her home. She does not behave to others as she does to you. She is peevish and irritable and fretful, I hear, and only the other day her brother said he pitied the man who dared marry her."

"I don't believe it; some one has maligned her to you," said Howard hotly. "Do not listen to such stories Mary; they are slanders."

"Well; I don't know. They seemed like the truth and I do not see what there was to be gained by slandering the girl. There was no motive. There, I have told you and it is off my mind. Howard, it was my duty to tell you. Do not blame me."

"Certainly not; but don't worry about the story. It is not true. I am sure of that."

Mrs. Bollis went away by no means convinced and though Howard had spoken so positively he was not so sure as his words implied. He asked himself what evidence he had that the story was untrue. It must be false, yet somehow he was troubled by it. If to the great obstacle of Addie's antagonism of Christianity must be added faults of disposition and temper, then indeed the prospect was dark and he must give her up. He sighed heavily and tried to put the subject away from him and resume his study. But it could not be done. He pushed away his books and went out, walking rapidly away into the country. It was an effort to recover equanimity of mind. To a certain extent it was successful. The exercise exhilarated him and his mind gained elasticity from his quickened pulses, but the weight was there still.

Circumstances about this time seem to combine, as they sometimes will, to precipitate a decisive act which might otherwise have been delayed or not taken at all. In the country church in which Wescott still preached on Sunday mornings, the congregation grew rapidly and a deep interest was manifested. Among the newcomers was a family of the name of Devan. A daughter about nineteen years old was the first of the family who came. The next Sunday her mother and father came with her. Then her brother and a sister accompanied her, and of late the whole family had attended regularly. They were more intelligent and more wealthy than the bulk of the congregation and Wescott felt that their coming so regularly was very gratifying. Clara Devan, who had been the first of the family to come, was a beautiful, bright girl of strong, deep nature. She paid close attention to the sermons and when one Sunday Howard announced that he would be in the vestry on a certain day to meet with any one who desired personal conversation on religious matters, Clara Devan was among those who came. She impressed him as being an earnest seeker after light. He took a deep interest in her and was much moved by the intense joy that shone in her face when she apprehended the great truths of the Gospel message. She would, he felt sure, become a fine type of Christian character. Wescott accepted an invitation from Mr. Devan to visit their house, and was much pleased with the whole family. They were extremely cordial, especially the mother, who had, as she told him, prayed earnestly for many years that she might live to see in Clara the change of heart that had now taken place.

No thought of love was in Wescott's mind. His interest in the family was purely pastoral, but as he returned home that night he thought of Addie More, and wished he could see that change in her. After that first visit he was frequently at the Devan residence where he always received the same hearty welcome. Mr. Devan treated him as a son, but with a respect and a delicacy that marked his sense of the pastoral relation. All the family loved him, and Howard spent his happiest hours at that period of his life, in their home. It is only justice to him to say that his feeling toward Clara was the love of a brother—never the love of a lover. That was still in Addie More's keeping, and he had no suspicion that his visits would be misconstrued.

A young man, especially a young unmarried minister, cannot, however, visit a house where there are daughters, as frequently as Wescott visited the Devan household, without causing gossip. Rumor was soon busy with his attentions, and it was not long before it reached the ears of Addie More. She would have disregarded it if it had not been that his visits had latterly become less frequent, and his manner, when in her company more constrained. Beside this it was unfortunate that the news of his visits to the Devan family was given her by Bradford Corrigan, who had his own reasons for desiring an estrangement between her and Wescott, and he enlarged upon the facts. It did not require long, after hearing the news, for Addie to decide on her course of action.

The interview that took place on the next occasional of Howard's visit to her, he remembered ever afterward as the most painful in his experience. Addie referred to his coldness, neglect, and asked him directly what was the cause.

"I am troubled," he answered. "We have drifted apart. I have become a believer and have consecrated my life to the service of Christ, while I fear you have become more confirmed in unbelief. I confess to the coldness you speak of, to the constraint. How can it be otherwise? One subject fills my mind. It is one supreme object in life that absorbs all my thoughts, and of that I cannot speak to you. You do not sympathize with me in it; you most despise it. I have lost my interest in subjects that interest you, and which used to interest me when first we became acquainted. I do not know what to do. The difference between us is breaking my heart."

"I fear that is not the only reason for your coldness," Addie said. "You have formerly more congenial tie, I hear. Don't you think that is a more potent cause? Do not be dishonest."

"What do you mean?"

"I have been told that you are already engaged to Clara Devan. It is not honorable of you, if that is true, to attribute the difference to religious grounds."

"Oh Addie, you do not believe that?"

"Have you not been a constant visitor at home? I think you have been there more frequently than you have been here."

"Who has been spying upon me?" Wescott asked, angrily.

"Do not trouble about that; tell me, is it so?"

Howard felt the blood surge to his face. Dignation did that, but to Addie it seemed to be the expression of guilt. Howard in consequence would not defend himself, and Addie was too much incensed at his apparent inability to choose her words. She spoke quickly and scathingly in language not unmixed with contempt.

Howard sat silent until she ceased from agitation, and then he said sadly, "I fear there is no healing of this breach. You are my Addie, but I will not retort. We must give up the engagement."

"I am willing" said Addie, and she took her ring from her finger and flung it on the table.

Howard picked it up and walked out of the room without a word. At the outer door he hesitated, and turned back to say a tender word, but as he returned to the room he saw Addie fling herself on a couch, and burying her head in the pillow burst into a fit of convulsive weeping. He knew that it was not in his power to comfort her, so he went out silently with a heavy load on his heart.

(To be Concluded.)

"JOSIAH DEAN'S BAR."

A Splendid Temperance Story to Begin in Next Volume of "Christian Herald."

WITH the next issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish the opening chapter of a new intensely interesting Temperance story, titled "Josiah Dean's Bar," which has been written expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Miss A. M. Muzzy, a talented Christian author.

In "Josiah Dean's Bar," the reader is acquainted with a respectable family, the head of which resolves to better his position in the world by opening a hotel and bar-room in a western town. The evils that result from this decision are vividly described. After a series of exciting experiences, the family is provisionally saved from ruin and the transformation from misery to happiness is fitly celebrated by the demolition of the once glittering snare known as "Josiah Dean's Bar."

The story will run in three numbers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and will be worth reading. It abounds in striking incidents and clever portraiture, and breathes the Christian spirit throughout.

"LORD, GIVE ME SLEEP."
(from a Sermon by Dr. Talmage.)
In words, in sweet trust spoken,
In, bruised, we dare not weep;
Soul so near the portal,
Hears, "Dear Lord, give me sleep."

With these arms enfold thee —
Keep thee from thy rest?
Saviour knows thou 'rt weary,
And clasps thee to His breast.

Changed for thee to rapture,
Sighs for scenes so blest;
Ever; and our darling
Sleeps on Jesus' breast.

Makes many lives miserable, and often leads to self destruction. Distress after eating, sick head-ache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depression, etc., are caused by this very common and increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla tones the stomach, creates an appetite, promotes healthy digestion, relieves sick headache, clears the mind, and cures the most obstinate cases of dyspepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. In an hour after eating I would experience a faintness or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced. It relieved me of that faint, tired, all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better since I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am happy to recommend it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass. N. B. Be sure to get only

TO-DAY.

"While it is said to-day if ye will hear His voice."—Heb. 3:15.

"To-day if thou wilt hear His voice,"
O heart,
Whom He hath called by name, He speaks to thee;

The manna gathered yester-morn could not
To-morrow's needs supply, nor will the oil
That fed thy lamp last night, give light this eve,

Nor last year's fires keep out this winter's cold.

'Tis not enough that once His voice said
"Seek"

And thou didst answer, "Lord I seek thy face"

And rise up quickly—not enough that thou Hast followed far into the wilderness

Beneath the cloud and through the sea, and drank

Of heaven-born streams, and tasted angel's bread.

If thou wouldst see thy Maker's face in peace,

And in the day of wrath be found in Him,
Forget thy yesterdays of gain or loss,

Boast not thyself of morrows yet to come,
But choose each morn His gentle yoke afresh,

Each evening prove His gracious promise sweet,

And do thy work by the unsetting Sun
That sees all other suns arise and fade.

So shalt thou run with no uncertain feet,
Nor fight as one that beats the air, but keep Thy hope unclouded, and thy pilgrim tent
Pitched every sunset nearer to thy rest.

The past may know sad failures, sinful falls;

His love makes all things new, and saith
"To-day"

His goodness is the same as yesterday—
"If thou wilt love My statutes, keep My law,

I am thy Father and thou art My child."

The yet untravelled wilderness hath snares,
And thorny slopes and passes dark and wild;

Take heart! each sunrise as He wakes thine ear

With whispers far and sweet, the Spirit saith,

"To-day if thou wilt put thy hand in Mine
And follow as I bid thee, thou art safe."

And so the wastes are traversed; one by one

The fearful shadows melt from off the years,
And heaven is reached while still He saith
"To-day."

A CONVERTED KOREAN MAGISTRATE.

A MISSIONARY writing from Seoul, the Korean Capital, to The Gospel in all Lands, relates the following interesting story about a preacher now in the Presbyterian Church in Seoul. He had been for some time with a missionary in China studying the word.
At last the missionary and his wife took this brother into their room, prayed with him, and then commissioned him to take the Gospel to his own people. Loaded down with Christian books this pioneer started for the Hermit Nation. His load was heavy, the road long, and foot-sore he sat down by the road-side when two Kore-ans overtook him. "Have you any prohibited goods in your load?" He said,
"No." Seeing the books they both cried out, "Catholic works—Catholic works."
"No; these are not Catholic books, but works teaching about the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ." They travelled together for some time, nearing Korea. Suddenly they heard the cry of the soldiers who always run ahead when an officer goes out in state. The Magistrate of Aichiu was coming. The comrades suggested his running away, leaving the books with them, and getting back to Korea secretly and disguise. To be found smuggling Christian books into the country might be punished with death. He refused to run or conceal his books. The magistrate came to the village. The runners saw our brother's package, opened it, and seeing the books reported him. He was brought before the magistrate, confessed he had Christian books, was severely reprimanded, and his books the magistrate took. The official knew this Christian, and cautioning his attendants not to report this seizure of prohibited goods, dismissed the man.

Books might be taken from him, but not a loyal heart. He returned to his native land empty-handed. His home was then in Aichiu. Some days after his return there called on him a man in citizen's clothing, and began to draw from his coat-sleeves, and pile on the floor the very books taken from him on his way to Korea. The bearer of them was no other than the magistrate himself. When the brother told this story in Seoul he was preaching from the text "Be strong in the Lord." Having told his experience he told his congregation that if he had run away he would not only have been disloyal to his Master, but would have lost his books in the bargain. "Therefore, be strong in the Lord."

AN ANCIENT CITY UNEARTHED.

IN the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, Mr. Flinders Petrie gives a short and condensed report of his recent excavations at Tell Hesi, which have already proved of the greatest interest and importance. A wall twenty-eight feet eight inches thick, of clay bricks, unburnt, which has been uncovered, is believed to be that of the ancient Amorite city of Lachish, erected 1500 years before Christ. Phenician pottery of about 1100 B. C., was found above its level. Later constructions found on the spot are the supposed walls of Rehoboam, and remains of the fortifications, made in the reigns of Asa, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, Jotham and Manasseh. In one building, probably of 900 B. C. or 1000 B.
C., was found a curious form of decoration
—a shallow pilaster, with very sloping sides, resting on a low cushion base, and with a volute at the top. "We are here, Mr.
Petrie writes, "face to face, at last, with work of the earlier Jewish kings, probably executed by the same school of masons who built and adorned the temple of Solomon."

THE WANDERER SAVED.

At a recent meeting of the National Band of Hope Bazaar, in Exeter Hall, London, Vice-Chancellor Blake, of Toronto, told the following incident: "A man went to the Southern States of America, a distance of two thousand miles from our city, and the secretary of the Association wrote and said:
'You will find so-and-so in your city. Look him up and see if anything can be done for him.' He was so low down, that, although the son of wealthy parents, he was found in one of the fish markets cleaning fish.
'Young man,' said the delegate who found him, 'you have got pretty near the husks.'
'Yes,' said he, 'I have; it was painted very bright as I entered, but I find it a very dark and miserable place where I have got.'
'Do you want to leave it?' 'I do,' 'Then come to my warehouse, and I will give you a place. I will expect you at my Bible meeting.' 'I will come,' he said. At our Sunday-school Convention last year in the city the young man came as a delegate."

THE OBELISKS OF CLEOPATRA.

ALTHOUGH the Egyptian Obelisk in the Central Park, New York, is slowly disintegrating that on the Thames Embankment in England, seems to be bearing without injury the vicissitudes of the English climate, so unlike that of Egypt. This seems to be due to the peculiar composition of the granite of which it, as well as all the other known obelisks were cut, and which is marked by the total absence of mica. In all other granites this readily destructible material exists. Centuries have passed away since this ancient monument was erected by Pharaoh Rameses II. at the main gateway of his great temple at On, the Heliopolis of the Greeks. There it stood for eighteen centuries, and was about twenty-three years

B. C. removed by order of Cleopatra to the palace she was erecting at Alexandria for her friend and constant visitor, Julius Cæsar. The architect appointed by her was Pontius, the father of Pontius Pilate, the Governor of Judæa. The rounded corners of the bases of these two obelisks had doubtless been chipped off by the gatekeepers at On and sold to the pilgrim visitors. Pontius Architeus had eight bronze crabs cast and placed them under the rounded corners of the stones, and on the big claw of one of the two crabs which alone remained, was, when the pedestal was cleared of its surrounding sand, found this inscription: "In the sixth year of August-us Cæsar, I, Barbarus, Perfect of Egypt, caused these obelisks to be erected by Pontius the architect." Since then another nineteen centuries are passed, and even this 3700 years of weathering has not erased one single portion of the hieroglyphs.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

CROOKED THINGS.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED LAST SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 21, 1890.

The Origin of Geometry—Its Abhorrence of Crooked Lines—The Effect of Moral Earthquakes—Universal Crookedness—In Social Inequalities—The Beneficent Capitalist—A Redistribution of Property Inevitable—How It is to Come—Moneyed Men to Become Generous—Poor Men More Alert—Business Men Trusting in God—Allston's Prayer for Bread—Prayer Influencing the Weather—A Congregation Saved from a Wetting by Prayer—Crooked National Affairs Straightened—Napoleon Called to Account—Crooked Domestic Affairs—Advice to the Despairing.

"The crooked shall be made straight." Isaiah 40 : 4.

GEOMETRY, from the time it was discovered on the banks of the Nile, which, by its overflow annually obliterated the landmarks, and the restoration of these landmarks made such a science necessary—I say, Geometry, ever since then has been busy with lines, straight lines, curved lines, lines in angles and cones and spheres, but has never been able to evolve any beauty from a line that was merely crooked. The circle and the square were always considered admirable. Isaiah recognizes the circle and says: "The Lord sits upon the circle of the earth." The altar of the ancient tabernacle was "four square," and the breastplate of the priests "four square," and heaven, according to St. John, is "four square." But the Bible has no admiration for lines that are merely crooked. Indeed, my text in prophesying the world's complete rectification declares: "The crooked shall be made straight."

There have been so many moral earthquakes that many things have got into

A Terrible Twist

—crooked laws, crooked governments, crooked fortunes, crooked dispositions—and many of the efforts to straighten things have only made them more crooked. And some good people sit down in despair and become pessimistic and give up life and the Church and the world as dead failures. With such lachrymose behavior I have no sympathy. It is a promise of the Lord Almighty, "The crooked shall be made straight." I propose, as I may be divinely helped, to mention some of the crooked things that are going to be straightened.

Much of the wealth of the world is in the hands of the profligate, while many of the best people are subjected to distressing privation; and there is going to be a redistribution of property. If it were possible, it would be a bad thing to have things divided equally. Some men are able to endure more success than others, and prosperity that might not unbalance you might destroy me. The Declaration of American Independence declares that all men are born equal, but the opposite is the truth, for they are born unequal. In no respect is this more evident than in their capacity to endure success, financial or social. I have seen men by the acquisition of fifty thousand dollars made arrogant and overbearing, and I have known others with their millions of dollars child-like and unassuming and Christian.

We Would All be Affluent

but the Lord cannot trust us. I am glad there are those He can trust. Much is said against capitalists, but the world would be a very shaky world without them. Who built the great railroads which, while they give such facilities of travel, employ tens of thousands of laborers supporting them and their families? Capitalists. Who built great ships that stir the rivers and bridge the ocean? Capitalists. Who reared the thousands of factories all over the land in which hundreds of thousands of employees earn their daily bread? Capitalists. Who endowed your colleges, and opened free libraries, and built asylums for the orphan, the crippled and the insane? Capitalists! But for them there would not be an Academy of Music, or a picture gallery, or a free library or a steamboat, or a railroad in America. Who put the world on seventy-five years beyond what it would have been in enterprise, in comforts, in educational advantage, in good things without number? Capitalists! The more money a man gets the better if it come honestly and is employed righteously. Nevertheless we all see that there needs to be a redistribution of property. Communism proposes to make that distribution by torch and dagger and dynamite. Throw the midnight express train off the track and put the factory into conflagration. Disrupt society. Buglarize. Assassinate. Such people believe neither in God nor man nor woman and they know how to make things worse but never have made and never can make anything better.

I tell you how there will come

A Redistribution of Property, good people will get more alertness and acumen and assiduity. Many good people are kept in straitened circumstances because they have been indolent, or lacked courage to take honest advantage of circumstances, and were too stupid to get on. With the very same surroundings others went on to competency. In the better days to come good men will have their faculties awakened, and will in consequence rise to larger share of prosperity. On the other hand, estates wrongfully accumulated, will dissolve. If not the sons, then the grandsons will make the money fly, and it will gradually scatter in their hands, and become a part of the general wealth. Then, as to vast properties righteously gathered—and there are thousands of them—such estates, will contribute toward helping the unfortunate, not more by charities than by helping struggling people into lucrative business, and the man who has amassed enough and a surplus will say: "There is a young merchant without any capital, I will start him on Fulton Street," and "there is a young mechanic who has no means of his own, and I will put him on the career of prosperity," and "There is a farmer with too big a mortgage on his land, and I will help him lift the encumbrance." The fact is that if the kindness and generosity manifested by moneyed men toward the struggling during the last fifty years, increases in the same ratio for the next fifty years, there will be a condition of society paradisaic. We are going to have a multiplication of William E. Dodges, and Peter Coopers, and James Lenoxes, and George Peabodys. So will come redistribution, and the crooked will be made straight.

Mind this: God never yet undertook a failure. The old book which is worth all other books put together, makes it plain that God has undertaken to regulate this world by Gospel influences, and if He has the power He will do what He says He will, and no one who amounts to anything will deny His power. God has said a hundred times "I will," but never once has said "I cannot." We may with our tack-hammers pound away, trying to mend and improve and straighten the financial condition of the world, and be disappointed in the result, because our arm is too weak and the hammer we wield too small, but the most defiant difficulty will flatten and disappear when God with a hammer made of summer thunderbolts strikes it, saying, "The crooked shall be made straight."

In your business concerns there are influences perplexing. Your affairs may seem all right to outsiders, for business firms do not advertise their private troubles, but where one firm has everything just as they want it, there are a hundred firms at their wit's end, what to do with that partner who draws more than his share of the profits, or with that stockholder who comes in just often enough to upset things or with that disappearance of funds which you cannot account for, although you have suspicions you cannot mention, or with that investment which was made contrary to your judgment because there was a determination to push it through, or because you are going behind month by month without any prospect of extrication. The trouble is putting a wrinkle on your forehead that ought not to appear there for ten years yet, and you will be forty years old when you ought to be only thirty or when you ought to be fifty, or sixty, or seventy when you ought to be only thirty or sixty. Stop worrying. Either by the dissolution of that firm, or readjusting matters you will be brought safely through it, and put your trust in God. When commercial houses fail the suspension is averted, but the tens of thousands of men, who are everyday extricated no public mention is made. Yesterday was Saturday and I warrant that at the windows of banks, and in counting-rooms, stores and on every street of every city, God appeared for the deliverance of good men, certainly as when with His right foot He trod Lake Galilee, into placidity and made Daniel safe among the lions as though they had been house dogs asleep on a rug before a winter fire. Throw yourself on the promise of the text, or a hundred other texts meaning about the same thing.

I never yet asked God to do anything but did it, if it were best, and in all the cases where my prayer has not been answered, I have found out afterward that it was best not to have been answered in my way. But none of us have tested the full power of prayer. It is a force very like some of the forces of nature that were in existence but not employed. In ages electricity was thought good for nothing but to burn barns, and kill people with a stroke. The lightning rod on the top of houses was the spear with which the war was charged on the thunderstorm, as much as say. "If you dare to come this way I will throw you into the ground." But now electricity lights homes, and churches, and cities, and continents, and moves rail cars, and he is a man who mentions anything as impossible this natural energy. So was to the world rather a frightful power if it was any power at all. But that has changed, and men begin to use it in a thousand things, and the time will come when it will be used in all things and there will be a Bible every counting-room and supplication will send from every commercial establishment and when business firms are formed the question will not only be asked as to how much one and that one put in of capital, but the question will be asked "Do you know how to pray? Mightier agent than any natural force yet developed will be this Gospel electricity, flashing heavenward for help, flashing earthward for divine response. God in business life. God in agricultural life. God in mechanical life. God in artistic life. God in every kind of life, religion for the most part is hung up so high you cannot reach it. It is hung up on the clouds, snatch it up as you finally go through heavenly residence. Oh, have your religion within easy reach now! Religion is no heaven, but for this world. Once in heaven we will need no prayer for we shall have everything we want. We will need no repentance for we shall have forever got rid of our have no need of comfort, for there is no trouble. The Christian religion is heaven where everything is all right, and this world where so many things are all ington Allston, whose name you recognize as that of a great American painter, was in extreme poverty, and one day got up and asked for a loaf of bread for himself and his starving family. While he was waiting for that prayer there was a knock at the door and a man came in and said: "How about painting the 'Angel Uriel,' that received at the Royal Academy? Has it been painted?" "No," said Allston. "How much do you want for it?" Allston replied: "I am done with it for I cannot get it." "Will four hundred pounds be enough?" asked the stranger, "that is more than I asked," said Allston. The four hundred pounds (two thousand dollars), were paid and the purchaser introduced himself as Marquis of Stafford, who was one of the most liberal patrons of the great artist. "Oh, that all just happened!" Did it? Tell that to some ignorant, some benighted woman, who has never heard the promise: "Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee," or that other promise: "The crooked shall be made straight." "Yes, I do. Take the most unkind thing on earth—the weather. The Bible says that Prayer Controls the Weather.

In 1740 and 1741: "Elijah was a man after the fashion of men, and he prayed that it might not rain, and it rained not for three years and six months; and he prayed again and the rain came." Do you say that was the power of olden time? There have been instances of divine interference with the weather in modern times just as marvellous as those of olden times. I remember a Christian ship captain but could not find the name of the vessel. It has been many times in answer to prayer. They leave their vessels in the morning and join us in worship. There are enough of them present this morning to take a whole fleet in safety across the Atlantic. Whenever I have heard them testify mightily confirmed me in what I believe, that God answers prayer concerning the weather. And there have been cyclones sent up from the Caribbean sea, down every sail and every smoke-stack, every mast in their course, which in answer to specific petition have been diverted to curve around some particular island, and then return to their original path of destruction. The probabilities again and again have answered a tempest and we were all ready for it, the surrounding atmosphere had it its effect. The problem is it is prayer that affects the weather. The prayer of the people of Palestine should have a prayer that would affect it for of days.

John Easter was many years ago an evangelist in Virginia. A large out-door meeting was held in that State. Many thousands had gathered in the open air and heavy storm-gales gathered. There was no shelter and the multitudes could retreat. The rain suddenly reached the adjoining fields when

John Easter cried out: "Brethren, be still while I call upon God to stay the storm till the Gospel is preached to this multitude." Then he knelt and prayed that the audience might be spared from the rain and that after they had gone to their homes there might come refreshing showers. Behold the clouds parted as they came near and passed to either side of the crowd and then closed again, leaving the place dry where the audience had assembled, and the next day the postponed showers came upon the ground that had been the day before omitted. Do you say it only happened so? I cannot see what you keep your Bibles for, and the God you worship is not my God. Your God is an autocrat, and He is so far off and so far up that the world cannot touch Him, and His throne is an eternal iceberg. My God is a father, here and now, and a father will give his child what he asks for, if it is best for him to have it. Pray about everything that concerns you, secularities as well as spiritualities. Take to God all your annoyances and perplexities. The crooked shall be made straight. Some people talk as though God controlled things in general but not in particular; that He started everything under certain laws and then let it take care of itself, as an engineer might start his locomotive on an iron railroad track and then jump off. What would happen to such a locomotive is what would long ago have happened to our world if God had started it and afterward allowed it to look out for itself. There is no such thing as a general providence. It is

A Particular Providence.

God has no general care for a forest. It is a care of every cell of every leaf and root in that forest. God has no general care of the ocean. It is a care of every drop of water in the liquid magnitude. God has no general care for the human race. It is a care of every individual of that race and of every item of individual history. I preach Him, a God in infinitesimals, an every-day God, a God responsive, and one breath of earnest prayer, though that breath should not be strong enough to make a candle flicker, will absorb more of the divine attention than if the archangel standing at the foot of the throne should flap both wings.

It is remarkable how many crooked things are in the providence of God being made straight. About thirty years ago our national affairs were as crooked as depraved American politics and bad men, and Satan could make them. From the top of Maine to the foot of Florida, the nation was red with wrath. It was wrangle and fight all the way through, and one of the mildest things that the North and South promised each other was assassination. During this summer I have travelled through New York, and Ohio, and Illinois, and Indiana, and Minnesota, and Kansas and Nebraska, and Missouri, and Texas, and Louisiana, and Georgia, and North and South Carolina, and Virginia, and Pennsylvania, and I have shaken hands with tens of thousands of people, and talked with men of all sections and degrees, and I have to tell you and in all the States of the Union you could not now marshal a military company of one hundred soldiers to fight against the United States Government, unless you got your men out of the penitentiary. Did the corrupt and gangrened political parties do this work of rectification and pacification? No! It was by Divine interposition that the crooked has been made straight.

On the second of December, 1851, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte rode down the Champs Elysee of Paris, and under the hoofs of his horse a Republic was trampled as the rider went to take a throne. It was the outrage of the century. For nineteen long years the wrong triumphed. The will of one man who wanted to remain emperor kept down a nation who wanted a Republic. But September, 1870, arrived, and Sedan unrolled its crimson scroll. The Emperor surrenders with 83,000 troops, 419 field guns, 6,000 horses, and 60,000 muskets. From that day the ballot-box was up and the throne was down. Free institutions have been substituted for an infamous monarchy. Thank God! The crooked has been made straight.

But why go so far to find fulfilment of my text. In all our lives there are crooked things that need to be made straight, and each hearer or reader will enumerate for himself or herself. With one it is dilapidated physical health and you are saying: "Why cannot I be in good health when I have such opportunities and such responsibilities?" Alas for the sick headaches and the rheumatic joints, and the neuralgic thrusts, and the lame foot! But you will be well soon. Life at the longest is an abbreviated duration. There is a black doctor that will cure you. Some people call him Death. No disease was ever able to stand before his touch. Use all the means afforded for physical recuperation but if they fail the hour of release is not far away. There need be no incurables. There is no sorrow that heaven cannot cure. Those who in this world have always been well will not get the best part of heaven. They will not have the advantage of contrast. They were well before they left this world and why should they be so gratulated at being well in the next world. But to those who on earth were hindered or broken down in health, what a contrast as they step into that domain where there has never been an aching brow or lame foot or inflamed muscle or disordered nerve! For forty years there may have been a stooping in the back, or a twisted muscle, or a curved spine or a crooked limb, but the promise has been fulfilled "The crooked shall be made straight."

In many a domestic life are difficulties to be removed. There are thousands of matches that were not made in heaven. Some of the loveliest women have been united to some of the meanest men and some of the grandest men to the most worthless women. There may be no sufficient cause of divorcement, but there has never been any accord. For them the wedding march ought never to have been played. The twain divergent in sentiment, the north pole and the south pole might just as well have been married. A twist of nettles would have been more appropriate than a garland of orange blossoms. The unutterable mistake was made to please parents, or for the acquisition of estate, or for heightening of social position, or through thoughtlessness. I call the attention of such to the rapid dissolution of families. This thought, which is a sadness to a happy marital state, might be consolatory to Those Unequally Yoked.

A very short path is the path of this life. The rolling years will give quick emancipation. Everybody, for discipline, must have some kind of trouble and that is your trouble. Put in a song now and then to cheer your spirit. Make the best of things. Find in God that peace which no one else can bestow. The days and months and years are crowding past and the last of the procession so far as you are concerned will soon have gone by. Remember that some of the best men and women who ever lived have had the same lifetime of misfortune. They bore up under it and so can you. The expiration of the life of one of you will, after a while, remove the affliction. Let the one that remains make no hypocritical mourning at the obsequies of the one that goes, or imitate those whom we have all noticed who fought like cats and dogs all their married state and then could not get organs to sound dirges doleful enough, or furnishing stores to prepare weeds black enough, or tombstone cutters to chisel epitaphs eulogistic enough. It is a matter of congratulation that the unhappiest conjugal relation will terminate. The crooked shall be made straight. In the ages of the world when people lived five or six or eight or nine hundred years, such consolation for any kind of trouble would have been inapt. It would have brought no relief to some of those old patriarchs to say "you will have only seven hundred years more of this." But life has been abbreviated by the cutting off of century after century until we can console people, whether their trouble be financial or social or domestic, by saying it will not be long before the crooked shall be made straight.

A Wrecked Bell.

But to those who were once happily united on earth, and are now separated, the same thought comes, in a good cheer. Not long separated! Tradition says that two bells were molded and sent from Spain for a distant land to chime in a church tower. But while in a storm at sea one of these bells was wrecked and only one reached the shore and was hung in the church tower. And some people thought that, when standing on the land, they heard that bell ringing for worship or in a wedding peal, they could at the same time hear from the sea the lost bell ringing as if in response. Some of our friends and kindred have crossed the stormy sea and are in the tower of God on high. But we are still in the tempest, and sometimes the surges beat over us, but our souls are still in accord with those who are gone, and they ring down to us and we ring up to them and a sympathy is between us that can never die.

"Oh," says some one, "the crook in my lot you have not mentioned, and I sit clear outside of all the consolations you have offered." Well, I will take after you with Gospel comfort and reach you before I close. Do you think your wound is so deep the divine Surgeon cannot treat it? Have you a trouble that overmasters God? Is your annoyance of such a nature that you must suppress it? Ah, that is what is killing you. Trouble must be told or it stings to death the one who carries it. If there is no man or woman that you can trust with the secret, you can trust God.

Hie Away to Him.

Tell Him all about it. Lock your door and tell Him aloud, and if you do not get relief you will be the first soul in the six thousand years of the world's existence, and the only one of the hundreds of millions of the human race who ever called on God for help and did not get it. In all the universe, in all eternity there is not an exception. Stop brooding and commence praying. I bless my God that, while there are so many crooked things in life, there are some things so straight God Himself could not make them straighter. Divine help comes straight to those who will have it. The angels of mercy fly straight when they undertake a rescue. The hour of your final deliverance marches straight out of the eternities. And as the carpenter puts down his rule on a piece of timber, and with his axe hews away until the last inequality and irregularity disappears, so when God in the last great day shall put down His unfailing measuring-rule beside that event which seemed the most twisted in our lives or in the world, it will be found out that the last discrepancy has vanished, and the last wrong has been righted, and the last crooked thing has been made straight.

A DESPOT COMES TO GRIEF.

KING M'WANGA, the Despot of Uganda in Central Africa, the slayer of Bishop Hannington, and the persecutor of missionaries ever since he ascended the throne of King M'tesa, has at last come to grief. Letters from Uganda say he has been stripped of his power, and although still nominally king, all his chiefs, his army and his court officials are under white influence. Native Christians are no longer slaughtered to gratify his taste for murder, and no heathen is permitted to hold an office.

MR. WANAMAKER'S MISSION.

HOW HE FOUNDED THE BETHANY MISSION WHEN HE WAS TWENTY YEARS OF AGE.

A Christian Work which God has Prospered Amazingly—Started in a Shoemaker's Shop and Developing into a Great Field with Thousands of Souls Under its Care—The Postmaster-General's Class in the Sunday-school—Cabinet Duties do not Prevent him from Prosecuting his Mission Work—Bethany's New Pastor—An Example of Christian Activity.

ONE stormy evening in February, 1858, a number of men assembled in a little shop belonging to a shoemaker in the neighborhood of 22nd and Bainbridge Streets, Philadelphia. It was not a very imposing gathering, for many of the men were shabby and out-at-elbows. A few were like sober industrious workmen, and almost all were young. In the shop were three men who busied themselves in the seating and caring for the comfort of the others, most of whom had been gathered in from the streets. One of the trio was about twenty years of age—a fine young fellow, with a serious cast of face and yet with so winning a smile and withal so cheery a tone that when he moved about among the strangers, they felt that he spoke from the heart.

This young man was John Wanamaker, and the two others with him were friends who had consented to act as teachers under his superintendency in the new enterprise on which he had embarked. The meeting was the initial gathering of the Bethany Mission, whose fame and good works have since become known to a nation. Like many other godly projects, its beginning was a very humble one. Chairs were at a premium and so the twenty-seven guests of the three young Christians were seated, for the most part, on planks, laid on bricks. After a few simple words of welcome from the young Superintendent, services were begun and conducted with such fervor and heartiness that the strangers felt drawn to their hosts. God's grace lighted up the dim shop, just as it has illuminated other humble places where true worshippers gather, the world over.

It did not need much persuasion to induce them to attend regularly. Soon the shoemaker's rooms were found too small for the increasing numbers, and a few weeks after the first meeting, saw the young Mission established in other and larger quarters. Spring was coming along and the boyish-looking superintendent, and his two assistants rented a lot near by, and put up a big canvas tent upon it. This tabernacle, as the cold weather returned, gave way to a plain little brick chapel, which served the now rapidly-growing Mission, until a much larger building was erected.

THE BETHANY TABERNACLE—1859-60.

Early in 1865 this chapel was dedicated on the site of the present Sunday-school building, on 22nd and Bainbridge Streets. It was designed to accommodate 1,000 scholars, and when this fact became known, there were many who declared it to be a foolish venture on the part of the young missionary, "for," said these cynics, "it will never be half filled." Like its predecessor, it was soon not only filled but was too small, and several years later was rebuilt, and enlarged to accommodate 2,000. Still it proved inadequate to seat the throngs that attend the services, so, in 1865, a church was organized with a small membership; the intention being to accommodate the overflow. Its growth also, has been almost as rapid and phenomenal as that of the Mission itself.

From the beginning, the people who have attended at the Bethany Mission have been of working-class. Mr. Wanamaker is himself a working-man. As a boy, he had carried clay brickyard, earning two cents a day, while with his Huguenot parents at Chambers Pa., where he was born in 1838. Next, at sixteen, he had worked in a clothing store in Philadelphia, and his sterling honesty and energy—the result of Christian training—had made at last a large employer and prosperous merchant. At the time of the opening of the mission, Mr. Wanamaker had already entered a career of business prosperity, and he was secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of the Quaker City. Between such a worker and his audiences at the Mission sprang up that has strengthened with the passing years. The extraordinary growth of the mission, under the Divine blessing, has been to the simplicity of its services, the earnest industry of its conductors and the sincerity which from week to week, the Gospel message has been delivered to the thousands who thronged its gatherings. Like the seed on good ground, that which was sown two years ago in the shoemaker's humble room has born fruit not a hundred thousand-fold.

Since entering President Harrison's Cabinet, Mr. Wanamaker has relatively given more and attention to the Bethany Mission and Sunday-school than previously. The mission reaches its highest point in West Philadelphia, about A. M. Sunday, and rarely before since, not even the time of the lunch. The services are always earnest and interesting. The opening and closing addresses made by Mr. Wanamaker himself. The closing remarks do not usually extend quite so long a time. After the opening address, the partitions dividing the class are lowered and the class lessons heard entire school, while thus engaged, a very interesting scene. Mr. Wanamaker sides superintending the school in it. It numbers 400 to 500 pupils of most of the classes, is made up about of adults and minors. Mrs. Wanamaker has a class. When the last report was there were over 2,600 names on roll and the average attendance during months of the year is about 1,800.

While not a striking orator, Mr. Wanamaker talks to the school, like his address to the Mission, are always full of interest and energy. He is perhaps more of an orator than anything else—a tireless worker whose abilities have been turned to good account in the service of Christ, and who look same time to the material welfare of his people. The plans for the future include the opening of evening schools at the Mission. Savings Bank, which now occupies a large corner building, a square below Bainbridge Street, was started about a year ago by Mr. Wanamaker, who is President with a view to educating the school children and the people of the neighborhood in habits of saving. De-one cent are received and there are often of barefooted youngsters in line, books, waiting to turn in their small amount. Not alone by children that this bank is used. Adults figure prominently in the names, and some of them, who once all their earnings for liquor, have been to save by this institution and now have and sums to their credit. The concern run to enrich its officers or other s, but the poorer classes. There are no stock. The bank has no connection with, being a separate and distinct institution managed chiefly by Bethany members. Rev. Dr. J. R. Miller, pastor of Bethany, decade 1869-1879, is now Editorial Superintendent of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. J. Wilbur Chapman was lately from Albany, N. Y., to fill the pulpit at Church. Dr. Chapman was born in Ind., in 1859, studied at Oberlin College later at Lake Forest University. His charge was the Reformed Church of Arville, N. Y., and this was followed by a the First Reformed Church of Albany, he labored successfully for five years, along evangelistic lines. He does a manuscript, yet all his sermons are prepared and the style is purely istic. He succeeds the Rev. Arthur son, D.D. The Mission thus secures a, earnest preacher and Mr. Chapman is the spiritual leader of one of the most sive congregations to be found anywhere in the United States. Counting all the connected with the Church and Sunday-school with the families to which they belong, many parish contains not less than 8,000 to 10,000 Souls.

1 of membership is still swelling and no the present school and church, worth 300,000, will have to be still further enlarged. They occupy a plot of ground extending 135 feet on Twenty-second Street and on Bainbridge, and are modest-looking residences. The school is on the corner, and passer-by it looks like a number of small rooms joined together. The original structure radical Gothic in style, but as the need for room arose, and alterations and additions were made, the school gradually departed from Gothic, until now it is a somewhat style of architecture. It is built of and has an abundance of windows. It is all provided with entrances, there being more than ten of them, two of which lead to a very reserved for visitors. This gallery, the one above, is used by members of the and extends about two-thirds around the school proper. All told, there are forty-rooms in the building, of which thirty-one is rooms; a few are used for the dispensing a large room on the southern end for s. Mr. James H. Coyle is Associate Superintendent of the Sunday-school.

Bethany Mission is still growing. Al- its founder is now a statesman and a r of the President's Cabinet, besides being official head of one of the largest and important departments of the national ment, and having vast business interests own, involving the handling of millions ars every month, he never forgets the a he founded in his young manhood in emaker's shop that winter evening. Of nvestments none has paid him with such interest as this has done. None has t him such golden return as the moneys, and effort expended in bringing within the the Gospel those who, but for the Beth- mission, might have wandered till now in the

as given to Bethany, and the wondrous rity He has bestowed upon its founder ose associated with him, should encourage in the work of the Master. With Vanamaker, it was not a question of money that was canvassed when he set about starting those meetings in the shoemaker's shop. All that the Christian need ask is the opportunity; God can always be depended upon to furnish the means, where the necessity for the work really exists.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Knotty Pension Question was Decided by Secretary Bussey on Sept. 9. The question turned upon what is the "line of duty." It appears that on April 1, 1863, a corporal obtained a pass to attend church service across Green River at Mumfordsville, Ky., at which point his company was stationed. While crossing the river on a log, he fell, fracturing his left knee. He suffered severely at the time and has found the injury a detriment to him ever since. The liberality of the present Administration has encouraged him to apply for a pension. His claim was at first rejected on the ground that the soldier at the time of the accident was not in line of duty. Assistant Secretary Bussey takes a contrary view, and allows the pension sought. He says: "If the claimant had, by authority of his superior officer, been crossing the river for the purpose of obtaining necessary physical sustenance, he would certainly have been in line of duty, it being a necessary incident to the service. A similar mission for spiritual sustenance, which is also necessary placed him also in the line of duty." The Secretary's decision seems logical. It is much to be wished that the presumption to which he refers, of spiritual sustenance being necessary, was more generally recognized than it is. Though men's souls are languishing for lack of it, they neglect the invitation "Come ye buy and eat: yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." (Isa. 55: 1.)

A Boy was Rescued from the Grasp of a Snake in Canada on Sept. 10. A press dispatch from Ottawa says that a farmer living near Selkirk sent his nine year old son to the pasture to bring home the cows. As he went through the brush he jumped over the low bushes and in doing so he alighted, after one of his leaps, on what he supposed to be the limb of a tree, but which proved to be a black snake, five feet long. The snake, irritated by the unusual pressure, coiled itself so tightly about the boy's legs that he was unable to free himself from its embrace, and there is no doubt he would have been killed outright had it not been for the assistance of a large dog which accompanied him. The dog seized the snake in his teeth, and the boy, by bracing himself in an opposite direction, allowed the dog to tear the snake loose. So great was the shock to the little fellow's nerves that he became temporarily blind, and would in all probability not have reached home that night had it not been for his dog. Placing his hand on the back of the dog, he was piloted safely to the house. He has recovered his sight, but is still suffering from the effects of his fright. The double need of the boy, which the dog supplied, is like that of the victims of Satan, the great enemy of souls, who in the Bible is likened to a serpent. They need, not only rescue from the grasp of their enemy, but guidance to their heavenly home and both are offered to them. (Luke 10: 18, 19—John 10: 16.)

A Wicked Prayer Book is in the Possession of a correspondent of a New York daily journal. He says that among the relics treasured by his family is a prayer-book printed in 1628, which was brought to this country from England by an ancestor. Looking over the volume recently his eye was caught by the epistle appointed for reading on the fourteenth Sunday after Trinity. It includes the passage Gal. 5: 19; 21. which is printed thus: "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: Adultery, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like, of which I tell you before, as I have also told you in past time, that they who do such things, shall inherit the kingdom of God." This blunder appeared so remarkable that he wrote to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to inquire if any record existed among the archives in his palace at Lambeth, of the error having been noticed. He was informed that the printer of the book had been fined $7,500, for making the false quotation in that book, and for another erroneous reading in a Bible that he had printed. The error in the latter case was in 1. Corinthians 6: 9. where the word "not" was left out with the same result. Only two copies of that edition of the prayer-book and very few of the Bible are known to be in existence, and they are in public libraries and museums. This fact is well-known; otherwise we might have inferred from the lives led by some persons, who hope to go to heaven when they die, that they used one of those Bibles. Whatever ground such men have for their hope is false, for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as He is pure." (1. John 3:3.)

An Electrical Tree Attracted Many Visitors in New York last week. During the heavy and continuous rains, some boys, who, on their way home from school passed an old oak tree in Stuyvesant street, were astonished by a strange sensation that was experienced on touching it. A curious pricking was felt when the hand was laid on the wet bark. They talked about it and older people went to see the tree, and experienced the same sensation. The cause was soon apparent. Two electric wires, one of them a heavy light-wire, passed through the tree. The friction of the waving branches had partially worn away the insulating covering from the wires and the saturated trunk formed a conductor. The next day a man was observed leaning against the trunk, and he explained that the electricity was curing his rheumatism. A woman came and stood with one hand on the tree and the other on her swollen face hoping that it would cure her neuralgia. Others with various ailments visited the tree, while the wet weather continued, and all professed to have derived benefit from it. Probably they did, if they had strong faith in its healing virtues, for cures of all kinds are helped by subjective influence. There were not wanting some scoffers to laugh at their credulity but they did not mind the ridicule if they could get relief from their sufferings. We can but wish that the same earnestness were manifested to gain admission through Christ to that land, of which the Apostle had a vision, in which he saw, "In the midst of the street of it... the tree of life... and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." (Rev. 22: 2.)

The Abduction of a Bride-Elect has Caused some excitement in Jefferson County, New York. A popular young lady, the daughter of a farmer, was to have been married last week to a young man, who earns a good livelihood from visitors and hunters as a guide to the woods. The wedding was to have been celebrated with enthusiasm, as both parties were well known, and liked, and the parents approved of the match. But, a short time before the day fixed for the wedding, the bride mysteriously disappeared. Search was made for her, but without avail. At length a clue was obtained in the simultaneous disappearance of two men, who worked on an adjoining farm. They were traced to St. Lawrence County where they had been born and reared. It was ascertained that they had the missing girl with them. Her father, and her lover hurried there, taking the sheriff with them. It was found that partly by force, and partly by intimidation they had taken the girl away, and were holding her a prisoner in the hope of her consenting to marry one of them. On Sept. 13, she was found, and joyfully returned home with her father, while her abductors were taken back in the custody of the sheriff. The deferred wedding is now to take place. There is reason to fear that something like this will be found to have occurred when the cry is raised, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." Many who should be waiting and looking for Him have been carried captive by Satan through love of the world and will have to go through much tribulation before they sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb. (Rev. 7: 14.)

THE PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD

S. S. LESSON BY MRS. M. BAXTER FOR OCT. 5,
LUKE 20 : 9-19; GOLDEN TEXT, ISA. 53 : 3.

Why the Upper Classes Opposed Jesus—His Scorn of their Claims—Jealousy of His Popularity—Their Challenge of His Authority—Their Dilemma—Rebuke by a Parable—The Lord's Vineyard—The Owner's Rights—How His Servants were Treated—The Divine Ambassador—Their Culminating Rebellion—The Vineyard to be Given to Others—The Stone that Breaks Men—The Question of the Sadducees—The Children of the Resurrection.

FROM the commencement of His public ministry until its very end, Jesus was subject to the insulting, unkind and unjust criticisms of the Pharisees, the chief priests, the elders, and the scribes. All the men of note and position in His time were against Him and His Gospel, because there was nothing in it to glorify man. No place for any display of Creature Superiority.

Their prestige arose, not from any intrinsic merit, but either from the accident of their birth, on account of superior education, the accident of wealth, or some such cause, all of which manifestly had no weight with the Son of Man. If only they could reduce Him to conformity to their ideas, and get Him to accept some kind of license from them, then they might patronize Him, and they would get glory instead of contempt through His ministry. Oh, how many attempts men have made, and how futile they have been, to reduce the movements of God to a system which men can dominate! Thus they came upon Jesus in the midst of His teaching, and said, "By what authority doest thou these things, and who is he that gave thee this authority?"

It is not necessary to answer every question which is asked us. Jesus, instead of answering, put a question to them in return. "The baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men?" If their question was one which at that moment He was unwilling to enter upon with them, His question to them was still more difficult for them to answer. It was a matter of complete indifference to them whether John's ministry was, or was not, divine; what affected them most was how their judgment should affect themselves. So, instead of praying over the matter, and asking counsel of God, "they reasoned with themselves" as to the answer which should best suit their purpose. "If we shall say, from heaven, He will say, why then believed ye him not? But, and if we say, of men, all the people will stone us; For they be persuaded that John was a prophet." They refused, therefore, to give an answer, and Jesus, in His turn, refused to give His authority for His divine works, and so He put it out of their power to offer or refuse Him their insolent patronage.

In the parable which follows, He gives them a rebuke, which, perhaps, few of them were spiritual enough to perceive. "A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen, and went into a far country." "The vineyard of the Lord of Hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah His pleasant plant." (Isa. 5 : 7.) "And at the season, He sent His servants to the husbandmen that they should give Him of the fruit of the vineyard," but the servant met with nothing but persecution, the owner's rights were not respected, "they sent him away empty." It has been history ever since the fall, that have been repudiated by him. Patriarchs and prophets have pleaded the cause of God, and have come in the name of the Lord seeking fruit for Him from His vineyard, but to no avail; persecution of God's messengers has grown in intensity through the ages. The first servant was "sent away empty;" the second was "shamefully treated;" the third "wounded" and cast out. Then the Lord of the vineyard said, "what shall I do?" There was open mutiny, extreme measures must be resorted to. "I will send my beloved Son: it may be they will reverence Him when they see Him." O, if the scales would have fallen from their eyes at that moment, and they could have seen in the meek, gentle, unresisting Man that stood before them the only begotten Son of God, surely they must have fallen upon their faces ashamed before Him! But then they were, at that very moment, questioning His authority. They did not reverence the Son. Jesus was painting and they began to be conscious of it as He continued: "But when the husbandmen saw Him they reasoned among themselves, saying, this is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours." God sought from His vineyard the fruit of His own planting—love. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength." But His vineyard bore "wild grapes." (Isa. 5 : 4)—selfishness, which is the exact contrary to love. "The inheritance shall be ours;" it was the self-seeking spirit, which will sacrifice Christ and His interests for personal interests, Christ and His name for petty reputation, Christ and His people for our own family distinction! God has planted His vineyard with divine plants, but only human and carnal fruit is brought forth!

"So they cast him out of the vineyard and killed him. What therefore shall the Lord of the vineyard do unto them? He shall come and destroy those husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard unto others." There is no waste in God's economy. If the Jews do not respond to Him, and work out His purposes, He calls in the Gentiles. If ordained ministers are not small and humble enough to be the instruments of the Holy Ghost, God will not be at a loss, He has laymen ready. Where laymen are too great in their own eyes to be used by Him, He has women ready. When educated men and women give Him place, He can use them, but where they assume authority or superiority because of their education, He will not be at a loss, He will use the uneducated.

His hearers answered, "God forbid," and He beheld them and said, "what is this then that is written, the stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner? Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be but upon whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." God has made His Son a touchstone for every man, every man is tested by his relations to Jesus, and he takes his place in one of two classes: either he lets himself be broken by falling upon Jesus, or the time comes when Jesus as Judge must fall upon him. When Jesus breaks a man, all his ideas of his superiority go to the winds, all his own righteousness vanishes away like smoke, all hope in himself perishes. But the chief priests and scribes were in no mood to be broken; pride and self-interest possessed them, and by fair means or foul, they would conquer Him whose words galled them, and stung them to the quick, because they would not yield up their miserable life of pride and self. They "sought to lay hands on Him," but "they feared the people."

Now they bethought themselves of another plan, worthy of such as they were, "they sent forth spies which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of His words;" a strange work for priests! Their first attempt was to draw Him into committing Himself, about the payment of tribute to Cæsar, a vexed question of the day, on account of God's word. (Deut. 17 : 14, 15.) If it should not be lawful to set a stranger over them, how could they serve God by paying tribute to Cæsar, a foreign potentate? Jesus leads them to higher ground; "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things which are God's." Jesus will only touch politics as far as it will serve God's purpose.

These hired spies having failed, the rationalists of the day, who bordered on agnosticism, and who denied the resurrection, came to Him with a question regarding a woman whose first husband died childless, and who, according to Jewish law, should become the wife of her brother, that posterity might be secured, family lands remain in possession. How, if it be in the resurrection, if seven brethren, one after the other? Whose law would she be? It was an extreme case, but was no doubt, intended to bring the question of the resurrection into prominence. Again Jesus leads His hearers on to new ground. They have only earthly concerns, and see everything from their own low point of view. Jesus teaches them that marriage itself is a provisional thing, a relationship which belongs to "the children of this age," which shall be accounted worthy to oblige, and the resurrection from the dead, whether they marry nor are given in marriage, can they die any more: for they are equal to the angels; and are the children of God.

The Children of the Resurrection.

"Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." (1. Cor. 15 : 50.) The materialism of the Sadducees could not grasp the idea of the resurrection, as "children of the resurrection," right dignity of our position, even while we are in "this age," "waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body," (Rom. 8 : 23) all the necessities which our present existence entails, let us not be held in bondage of things of time and sense, but "use the world as not abusing it, for the fashion of this world passeth away." (1. Cor. 7 : 31.)

One question the Lord Himself put to the questioners, after He had silenced them: "say they that Christ is David's son? And himself saith in the book of Psalms, 'The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right till I make thine enemies thy footstool.' Therefore calleth Him Lord, how is he David's Son?" There was no reply to His question, it was a question which answered itself; it was to their satisfaction. Things must come to the worst; they had wilfully rejected Jesus, now the hardness upon their hearts must come judicial: first, they would not, now they could not see in Jesus, God's Messiah. All things ripened, and so the great Sacrifice for our redemption was made ready.

AN UNSUCCESSFUL SUITOR

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Oct 5 : "Spised and rejected of men." Isa 53 :

"WHAT a dreadful flirt you are, Julia," said Julia Mentor, as she looked at her friend, a lady, who had been school-mistress, and were still warm friends, sat chatting in the firelight of a room in the Mundane. "I plead not guilty," said Ella. "I want to make any matrimonial blunder." "What is your ideal of a husband?" asked. "I have heard twice of your ideal, and did not think either need study. What kind of man would you choose?" "Well, he must be rich; I want a carriage, my own and jewels and good clothes. He must be handsome; I do not want to marry a man around who is not good-looking. He must be well-born and well-bred; I should always be undergoing humiliations if he were not. Wealth and good-looks would be nothing if the man were a boor."

"And you have not had a suitor yet who combines all three requisites?"

"No; but I do not despair. I am not looking and I am fairly intelligent and more than all—there is papa's money. The day will come along some day. Until he does, I must afford to wait."

"Yes, there is no doubt that you are a fortune-hunter, Julia admitted; "but I suppose the more money increases the difficulty. It attracts the tune-hunters."

"They are the plague of my life. I am coming the prey of one of them. I was loved for myself. And there is another reason why I dread marrying a fortune-hunter. I tell you about it, but I should not like to to know. Papa's fortune is not quite secure. We may lose it; there is but one chance in a hundred of doing so, but there is that one chance. I do not know the details. All I know is that there is some dispute as to whether the property is leasehold or freehold. I do not understand the difference. Papa contends that it is freehold and he will not pay what they call ground-rent. We had quite a scene here one day when a man was sent to collect it. Papa told some of the gardeners and stablemen in the house that he had turned out."

"That looks as if Mr. Mundane felt pretty sure he was right."

"Oh, I don't know. That is his way. He always puts on those high and mighty airs when he wants something that he is not quite clear about his right to. He says, 'There is nothing to bluff when you haven't proof.' Oh, he's smart."

"Do you know the people who claim the estate?"

"Well, yes, one of them," said Ella, laughing. "The son is one of my suitors, as you call them."

"Not a favored one, I judge, by your manner."

"Not at all. When I heard who he was and that he was coming to pay his court to me, I was quite elated. It would have been such a good thing, you know. I expected to see a fine aristocratic young man, handsome and distinguished, with a troop of servants and living in the best style. But when he came, he went to court with quite common people and made a lot of low acquaintances—miserable people that my very servants would not associate with. They made a great fuss over him and I guess he is good to them. But that was no way to win a love."

"What do you think was his motive for acting like that?"

"I don't know. He is very eccentric. Has all kinds of notions about social equality, and all the duties of the rich to the poor. Papa says there is no better than a socialist. I think so, too. He is so unconventional. He does not pay the slightest regard to the customs of good society. He is quite blunt in saying what he thinks. He offended Papa by speaking disrespectfully to the clergyman. Told him he ought to think more about his pew-rents and the offerings, and more about the souls of his people. It was quite shocking. He was just as insulting to the lawyer. He told him if he did his duty he would not spend his time in splitting hairs and jabbling about the technicalities of the law, but in seeing that justice was done. I think such ways very bad form; don't you?"

"Still," said Julia "if he is really the son, you know that is a great thing."

"Well, we doubt whether he is. We know it was to be here about this time; but he is so queer and he acts so strangely, and he does not seem to have much money, nor any of the style one would expect from one in his position. Papa feels sure he is an impostor."

"Do you think he loves you?"

"Oh yes, there is no doubt of that. He told me so, frankly and, I think, sincerely; but he is very independent about it. He did not plead, as the others do. I should have no trouble in getting rid of him."

"Would it be wise to do that till you know whether he is what he claims to be?"

"Oh I don't know. Papa says if he is really the son and heir, it would be a good thing if something happened to him. If he were dead that would stop all further proceedings about the estate. It seems wicked to wish for a man's death, but I suppose, as Papa says, it would be a good thing."

"It would be much better if you could bring yourself to marry him."

"And give up all my plans in life, and all the pleasure I mean to have? No, that is not my way. Why, if I married him I would have to associate with his low friends, and perhaps have to give away all the money to the poor, and go into almshouses and jails looking after his unfortunate companions, and every one I care for would look down on me. No, it costs too much to be entertained for a moment. I write 'rejected' against his name in the list. I am sorry, but it has to be done. He does not woo me in the right way to win me."

"Do you remember," Ella wrote to her friend a year afterward, "my telling you of a suitor whom I had decided to reject? I did reject him and it has brought us to ruin. We have lost the estate and everything besides. Oh, if I had only accepted him, then I might have been always happy, and now there is no happiness for me! He was so good and so tender and loving, but, foolish girl that I was! I did not love him because he was so humble. Oh, if I had known him when I had the opportunity!"

WILL JESUS COME AGAIN?

A Well-Grounded Hope—Its Characteristics—The Blessings it Promises—The Christian's Attitude Toward it.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

FAITH looks upward; hope looks onward. Whatever meaning we may put on the prophetic event introduced in the Scriptures as our Lord's second coming, we notice that it is frequently specified as a Hope. And as hope implies expectation, the Church should wear the onward look. The believer should be an expectant.

Hope is the antipode of despair. It has a definite object in view, and as that object is perceived at hand, or remotely, the soul is swayed by deliverance or discouragement. The blessed hope and appearing in glory of our Lord Jesus Christ should not be relegated to the regions of mystery or mysticism. How can it be a hope of any value, if it be some uncertain, indefinite, mystic and far-away and non-essential theory which happened to drop into the Bible? In fifty-three places where hope is referred to in the divine word, it has special relation to future blessings which are to crown the Christian believer at the appearing of Jesus Christ. A few of these we might examine.

It is a Blessed Hope.

(Titus 2: 13.) Looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ. A blessed hope means a happy one. The word refers to inward enjoyment apart from external environment. The expectations implied in such a hope make all present circumstances of trial or depression "not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 18: 19.)

It is a purifying hope. "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure." As linen bleaches under the sun, the light of this hope cleanses the life from world-stains. It loosens the grasp from things of earth. The man who has a magnificent home in some beautiful locality, and is only tarrying in a city hotel for a few days till he can journey home, will not care to spend time and money and thought in elaborately decorating that itinerant lodgings in the strange city. He may buy beautiful articles of ornament, but his intention will be to take them home. So the Christian, who reckons himself a "pilgrim and stranger" here, will have little heart to spend his energies on things pertaining to the merely earthly. His city and his home lie beyond. His great concern will be to "lay up treasures in heaven." (Col. 3: 1, 4.) It is a pacifying hope. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will "make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God." (1 Cor. 4: 5.)

"Be Patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient; 'establish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.'" (James 5: 7, 8.) In the power of this hope all questions of provocation can be patiently laid aside for the Lord to settle on His arrival. The child of God who is pervaded with this hope will be willing to waive all rights of self-vindication; knowing that his "labor of love and patience of hope" will not go unrewarded. (1. The 5: 1: 3.) It is a comforting hope. "But I would not have you to be ignorant brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope." (1. Thess. 4: 13.) The lustre of this hope shines most conspicuously in the consolation it brings to those who are called to part with their loved ones by death. The unbelieving bury their dead without any certain or definite expectation of reunion. For in no other so-called sacred book but the Bible is the truth of a resurrection even hinted at. But the Scriptures do definitely promise this. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." (1. Thess. 4: 14.) The Apostle Paul, after explaining all this to the Thessalonian Christians, and showing them the immense advantage they had over the heathen who believed nothing about the return in majesty of Jesus Christ, adds finally "Wherefore comfort one another with these words." It is a glorious hope. "For our conversation is in heaven: from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself." (Phil. 4: 20, 21.) "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure . . . Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection." (Heb. 11: 17, 19, 35.) This hope would be meaningless apart from the locality and the circumstances where it anchors itself. It leaps over time and space to the period when Jesus Christ shall Himself be glorified as King of kings according to the eternal purpose of God. It embraces

Several Promised Facts.

We shall be with Christ. Not as at death when we are said to be "unclothed," and "waiting to be clothed upon with our house from heaven." (II. Cor. 5: 1-3.) In an actual sense we shall "see Him as He is," and be ourselves like Him personally and morally. We shall be beyond sinning. Now we groan for deliverance. Pain and the curse encompass us. The consummation of that hope will bring full redemption to the body. (Rom. 8: 22, 23.) We shall know as we are known. "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face: Now I know in part; but then shall I know as I am known." (1. Cor. 13: 12.) What joy to have the hope of one day being masters of all knowledge; to understand the mysteries of science; the marvels of astronomy; the secrets of nature, and the profound depths of the soul.

The Christian Attitude.

(1.) We are to be looking for it. (Titus 2: 13.) That is, expecting it with desire. (2.) We are to be hastening it. (II. Peter 3: 12.) That is, urging on its consummation by our attitude of personal faithfulness toward all that it involves. (3.) Loving it. If we love the seed of Abraham, if we love the burdened brute creatures, if we love the heathen Gentile nations, who know nothing of a Saviour, we shall joyfully anticipate this hope. For it is the hope that shall bring to the Jew his Messiah; to the creature his emancipation from man's exacting dominion; to dumb creation her freedom from thorns and thistles; to the heathen idolater a knowledge of the true and living God; and to the waiting Bride the personal presence of the heavenly Bridegroom.

HOW LONG TO STAY.

THE question is discussed, "How long ought a minister to stay in one place?" Clergymen and laymen and editors ever and anon are wagging tongue and pen on that subject—a most practical question and easy to answer. Let a minister stay in a place till he gets done; that is, when he has nothing more to say or do. Some ministers are such ardent students of the Bible and of men, they are after a twenty-five years residence in a parish, so full of things that ought to be said, that their resignation would be a calamity. Others get through in three months and ought to go; but it takes an earthquake to get them away. They must be moved on by committees, and pelted with resolutions, stuck through with the needles of the Ladies' Sewing Society, and advised by neighboring ministers and hauled up before Presbyteries and consociations, and after they have killed the Church and killed themselves, the pastoral relation is dissolved. We knew of a man who got a unanimous call. He wore the finest pair of gaiters that ever went into that pulpit, and when he took up the Psalm-book to give out the song, it was the perfection of gracefulness. His tongue was dipped in "balm of a thousand flowers," and it was like the roll of one of Beethoven's symphonies to hear him read the hardest Bible names, Jechonias, Zerubabel and Tiglath-Pilezer. It was worth all the salary paid him to see the way he lifted his pocket-handkerchief to his eyelids. But that brother, without knowing it, got through in six weeks. He had sold out his entire stock of goods, and ought to have shut up shop. Congregations enjoy flowers and well-folded pocket-handkerchiefs for occasional dessert, but do not like them for a regular meal. The most urbane elder was sent to the minister to intimate that the Lord was probably calling him to some other field, but the elder was baffled by the graciousness of his pastor, and unable to discharge his mission, and after he had for an hour hemmed and hawed, backed out. Next, a woman with a very sharp tongue was sent to talk to the minister's wife. The war-cloud thickened, the pickets were driven in, and then a skirmish, and after awhile all the batteries were opened, and each side said that the other side lied, and the minister dropped his pocket-handkerchief and showed claws as long as those of Nebuchadnezzar after he had been three years eating grass like an ox. We admire long pastorates where it is agreeable to both parties, but we know ministers who boast they have been thirty years in one place, though all the world knows they have been there twenty-nine years too long. Their congregations are patiently waiting their removal to a higher latitude. Meanwhile, those churches are like a man with chronic rheumatism, very quiet, not because they admire rheumatism, but because there is no use kicking with a swollen foot, since it would hurt them more than the object assaulted. If a pastorate can be maintained only through conflict or ecclesiastical tyranny, it might better be abandoned. There are many ministers who go away from their settlements before they ought, but we think there are quite as many who do not go soon enough. Study the best time to quit.

TEMPERED PRAISE.

WE have just now been reading a column of obituary notices. They read well, but we stopped several times to ask ourselves whether all this was true. When our acquaintances die, we are apt to remember only their good qualities, and, taking pen in hand, to sketch them, we make a picture all sunshine and no shadow. Let us be a little more cautious in our eulogiums. When you are in funeral sermon praising the deceased Christian man, who was in his lifetime fond of trading horses, there may be in your audience a man who got from the aforesaid saint a horse with "the heaves," the disease not discovered until a week after the bargain. Therefore do not make out the departed man too angelic. Hold up a little in obituaries and funeral orations. We know and have felt the temptation to exaggerate on the favorable side of our departed friend's character, but do not let us yield to the temptation. Falsehood on tomb-stones, and "In Memoriam" is as reprehensible as anywhere else. If we want a complimentary notice of ourselves after we are dead, let us by a decent, and upright life prepare the way for such obituary.

THE SUPPRESSED COUGH.

THERE are some of the best Christian people who do not know how to carry themselves in religious assemblage. They never laugh; they never cough; they never hiss. Yet, notwithstanding are disturbers of public worship. There is, for instance, the coughing brigade. If any individual right ought to be maintained at all hazards, it is the right of coughing. There are times when you must cough. There is an irresistible tickling in the throat which demands audible demonstration. It is moved, seconded and unanimously carried that those who have irritated wind-pipes be heard. But there are ways with hands or handkerchief of breaking the repercussion. A smothered cough is dignified and acceptable if you have nothing better to offer. But how many audiences have had their peace sacrificed by unrestrained expulsion of air through the glottis! After a sudden change in the weather, there is a fearful charge made by the coughing brigade. They open their mouths wide, and make the arches ring with the racket. They begin with a faint "Ahem!" and gradually rise and fall through all the scale of dissonance as much as to say: "Hear all ye good people I have a cold! I have a bad cold! I have an awful bad cold! Hear how it racks me, tears me, torments me. It seems as if my diaphragm must be split. I took this awful bad cold the other night. I added to it last Sunday. Hear how it goes off! There it is again. O, dear me! If I only had some troches or the syrup of squills, or a mustard plaster, or woolen stocking turned wrong side out around my neck!" Brethren and sisters, who took part by sitting in the same draught, join the clamor, and it is glottis to glottis, and larynx to larynx, and a chorus of scrapings and explosions which make the service hideous to the preacher of sensitive nerves. We have seen people, under the pulpit, coughing with the mouth so wide open, we have been tempted to jump into it. There are some persons who have a convenient ecclesiastical cough. It does not trouble them ordinarily, but when in church you get them thoroughly cornered with some practical truth, they smother the end of their sentences with a favorite paroxysm. There is a man in one church, who is apt to be taken with one of these fits just as the contribution box comes to him, and cannot seem to get his breath again till he hears the pennies rattling in the box behind him. Cough by all means, but put on the breaks when you come to the down-grade, or send the racket through at least one fold of your pocket-handkerchief.

LAYMEN IMPROVED.

ONE of the encouraging signs of the times is the large number of Christian conventions being held. Laymen are not content that the clergy shall have the only opportunity of preparing for effective work. Hence the more promising members of our churches are coming together, for the purpose of gathering information and sharpening their views. Such conventions are valuable grindstones, putting an edge on dull faculties, and the more we have of such grindstones, and the more rapid their revolutions, the better. There are Sabbath School teachers who spend the time before their classes in talking infinitesimally, trying to explain that which they do not understand themselves, demonstrating by their behavior that they have more interest in the style of their glove, or the style of their hair, than in the eternal destiny of their children. Such people need a course of conventions, and to be thundered at by men who have appreciated the magnitude and urgency of Christian work. Go on, then, with all kinds of healthy conventions. A convention of church sextons would do good. A convention of church officers would be well, with lectures on how each should visit the sick, and deacons on the care of the poor. Conventions by all means, but let their results immediately be felt. Unless they have practical bearing, they are mere places of useless gab. What are you going to do with all you learned this summer about the different styles of Christian work? You have heard how to drive, now take your place on the box, gather up the reins, loosen the bridle, crack the whip, and be off. In our schools, prayer-meetings and churches we shall find in the winter whether the religious convention amounted to anything.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Mormons Must Go," Was at One Time a cry heard pretty generally all over the United States. That they have not gone down by the report of the Utah Commission, forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, declares that not only has the Mormon no intention of abandoning the doctrine of plural marriage, but it everywhere engages the crime. The Mormon hydra is a menacing monster than ever. Wilford Muff, a disfranchised polygamist, has chosen "Prophet, Seer and Revelator," successor of John Taylor, and the church organization is strong and compact. Converts are increasing in numbers and polygamous marriages kept secret. The Utah Commission further powers to enable it to cope with evil, and recommends the passage by Congress of a "test law," similar to that in force in Iowa, and of such other stringent legislation as circumstances warrant.

Week Abroad has been Prolific of Inter-est. In China, great floods have rendered four millions of people homeless and destitute in the Yangtze and Shantung districts. The Yellow river destroyed the crops. Cholera is raging in Shanghai. Emperors of Germany, and Emperor of Austria, at Rohnstock, on September 16th, and embraced and kissed each other as did their respective chancellors. John and William, the Irish agitators, were arrested near London, on the 18th, as they were about to start for this country. Mr. Den's portrait is given below. They were released. The obsequies of Victor Ericsson at Stockholm, on the 16th, were very imposing and largely attended. Twenty-five miners were killed by an explosion at Maybach. Camille Flammarion, the celebrated astronomer, records some new and reliable observations on the planet Mars, particularly the existence of what seems to be a dividing line across the Martian oceans, from shore to shore. Several of these mysterious divisions have been noticed this season.

Incipient Revolutions are Disturbing peace. In Portugal, the Republican movement is alarming the monarchists. The counsels resolved to follow the example of King D. A pretext for trouble was found in the Portuguese African agreement which was very unpopular. This agreement has been fully explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at the time of the negotiation. The king resigned on the 15th, and the king was unable to organize another. In Switzerland, a revolt against the provisional government has been followed by its resignation. The movement was for the purpose of reinstating a conservative government, which was demanded by the cantons whose wishes for revision of the constitution had been opposed by the provisional government. Armed conscripts assembled at different towns, determining war, but thus far no important collision occurred. The vote for revision of the constitution takes place October 5th.

The Tragic Close of a Ruined Life was Reached when Robert Ray Hamilton, the son of General Hamilton and grandson of the famous Alexander Hamilton, the American statesman, died while attempting to ford the Snake river, near his cattle ranch, in Idaho. His body was found a few days ago, after it had lain three days in the water. His wife, Evangeline Steele Hamilton, is in the New Jersey State Prison, undergoing punishment for stabbing Mary Donnelly, a nurse. Mr. Hamilton was at one time prominent in New York politics, and was exceedingly popular and successful until low associations dragged him down. He was the victim of a conspiracy, the exposure of which created a profound sensation in New York at the time.

Forty Lives Were Lost in a Frightful Accident on the Reading Railroad, at Shoemakersville Station, Pa., on Friday evening. A coal and freight train collided at a curve and a passenger train shortly after dashed into the wreck, the passenger coaches being hurled down a twenty-foot embankment into the river. Many were drowned, and others were crushed out of recognition.

Mary Buckley, a Weak Minded Girl of Fifteen, attended a parade of children connected with a Roman Catholic Church Society in New York City lately, and saw the little ones pouring their pennies into the collection box. Her face suddenly brightened and she ran home and took all her elder sister's savings $750—and brought the money across the street and dropped it into the box. When the priests found the roll of bills they were surprised and delighted. Miss Buckley soon ascertained where her money had gone, but application thus far has failed to restore it, and legal measures may have to be adopted.

Two Painful Tragedies Occurred During the week. At Portsmouth, N. H., Frederick Hein, a hard-working cooper, killed two of his daughters, fatally wounded a third, and shot Charles W. Taylor who had estranged his wife. Then he sent a bullet through his own brain. Thus one woman's waywardness broke up a happy home and caused a five-fold murder. The other took place at Jersey City on the 17th inst. Albert Possell, a Protestant, and Mary Tierney, a Catholic, were at the altar of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church, about to be married, when Henry Possell, father of the groom, fired point-blank at his son whose life was saved by the interposition of the priest. The bride fainted, and in the confusion the would-be assassin walked out and disappeared. After some delay the wedding went on. A union celebrated under such trying circumstances and in the face of bitter parental opposition, illustrates the regard a majority of parents probably entertain for matches where the principals are of different religious creeds.

The Extraordinary Financial Stringency, which at one time during the present month, threatened to produce a panic, has been partially relieved by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Windom, who concluded that the quickest way to help matters would be to purchase a round amount of 4 per cent. government bonds. Accordingly the Secretary paid out, within the month, $65,000,000 as a contribution to the money now in circulation, the largest operation being on Wednesday, Sept. 17, when $21,000,000 were paid out, principally in New York City. After this heavy payment, the money market became normal, and the banks were stronger than they had been for weeks. Thus far no serious failures have resulted from the temporary stringency. The suspension of the banking house of R. Gardner Chase & Co., of Boston, with $2,000,000 liabilities, was announced on Wednesday, Sept. 17, but it was quickly traced to unfortunate investments in railroad stocks, the recent depreciation in which had "squeezed" the bank. These circumstances, added to the prevailing money stringency, forced the bank to an assignment. Mr. Windom's portrait is given above.

Chicago has Chosen Col. Geo. A. Davis as Director-General of the World's Fair. He will have a salary of $15,000 a year, the President of the Fair Commission will have $12,000, and the Secretary $10,000. Col. Davis was a strong favorite with the Fair Directors, and is a man of wide public experience.

Sir John McDonald, the Canadian Premier, has surprised his friends and Canadians generally by a very liberal expression in favor of reciprocity with the United States. He declared at a recent social gathering near Ottawa, that his government has been and still was, desirous of close trade relations with the United States, but the feeling was not reciprocal. All the stumbling-blocks in the way had been raised by the United States, and he regarded the McKinley bill, now under consideration in Congress as an inimical measure. He would like freer trade relations, and if these were not granted, he believed in looking for new markets. London would be a better market for Canadian eggs than New York. China, Japan and Australia were all open to more intimate trade relations. Canada must meet the hostile spirit of the United States by opening up new markets.

BRIEF NOTES.

Persons contemplating sending mail matter to Dr. Talmage will please read announcement on the second page of the cover.

Dr. Talmage will commence on Sunday next, a series of sermons on his recent tour in the Holy Land and neighboring countries, describing what he saw and what he learned. Each sermon, carefully revised by him, and appropriately illustrated, will appear in this journal on the Wednesday next following its delivery.

The American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions will meet in Minneapolis, Minn., Oct. 8-11.

Dr. Grattan Guinness says: "There are 250,000,000 in India, 250,000,000 in Africa, 250,000,000 in China, who are redeemed and do not know it."

Bishop P. F. Stevens D. D. of the Reformed Episcopal Church, who was an officer in the Confederate Army, is now devoting himself exclusively to work among the colored people of the South.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding services at Lockport. There was a large attendance at the Sunday meetings. At his visit to the town some years ago, over one thousand conversions were reported.

The World's Women's Christian Temperance Union now numbers thirty-three auxiliaries, in as many different countries and provinces; the latest organization being in Bermuda, where a society has been formed.

Rev. A. J. Gordon, D. D., of the Clarendon Street Church, Boston, Mass., will deliver a course of lectures before the students of the Moody Training School, in January next and Mr. Moody will preach for Dr. Gordon during that month.

Mr. Pearson has been holding services at Hickory, N. C. Over six hundred persons made a confession of faith during the three weeks he has been there and many church members renewed their vows of consecration and promised to engage zealously in Christian work.

The expenses of Missionary Societies in India and China have been seriously increased by the rise in the price of silver, which has followed the silver legislation in our Congress. It is estimated that the Methodist Episcopal Society will need $40,000 a year more to maintain the same work than it has done up to this time.

Mrs. Amanda Smith has returned home after an absence of twelve years, most of which has been spent in Africa, preaching and teaching and helping the missionaries. A few days ago, she conducted services in the Hanson Place M. E. Church, Boston, Mass.

Earnest efforts are being made for the rescue of France from the infidelity which she seems disposed to accept in her recoil from Romanism. On a recent Sunday the Rev. M. Baxter distributed over five thousand evangelical tracts at Dieppe. Residents and visitors accepted them gladly.

Rev. Somerset Gardner, an English clergyman who has been laboring in Mr. Frederick Charrington's Mission in the east end of London, is now visiting this country. Mr. Charrington speaks in the highest terms of the blessing that attended his services in his Mission. Mr. Mark Guy Pearse also commends him heartily to the Methodist Churches in this country. He will gladly undertake mission work, or conduct revival services during his stay. Letters for him to this office will be forwarded.

The fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been neglected during the past six months. Many colored ministers, who formerly derived great benefit from the paper, which they received through this fund, have written lamenting the deprivation. Their libraries are small and their incomes very limited. In order to encourage our friends to help them, and their congregations through them, we will send the paper for a year to as many colored ministers as we receive dollars for this purpose. Any person interested in the progress of the colored race, may thus benefit an entire congregation, at the cost of one dollar by giving the minister this journal for a year. Every person sending a dollar will be notified by mail of the name and address of the minister who benefits by his contribution.

THOUGHTS LOW AND HIGH.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Man of Gentle Mould—Humility Combined with Faith—I. A Sense of Unworthiness Commendable—Because it is True—Makes a Man Kind to Others—Lowly Toward Christ—Ready for Blessings—II. A Sense of Unworthiness Wrongly Used—In Making Men Doubt their Salvation—Doubt God's Mercy—Doubt the Promises—Deny Christ Pleasure—III. Is a Fit Companion of Strong Faith—Produces the Vacuum that Faith Fills—Is Content with a Word.

"The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." Matt. 8: 8.

THIS centurion was a worthy man from the human point of view; but he called himself unworthy when he turned towards our Lord. He was so excellent a man that the elders of the Jews, who were by no means partial to Roman soldiers, pleaded with Jesus that he was worthy. Had he been personally there, he would have repudiated their plea; and he did so by the second party of friends whom he sent to our Lord. As one set of friends had said, "He is worthy," another set of friends was bidden to say, in his name, "Lord, I am not worthy." The worthiest men in the world do not think themselves worthy; while the most unworthy people are generally those who boast of their own worthiness, and, possibly, of their own perfection. We should not have wondered had this man been proud; for he was one of the conquering race, and the representative of a tyrannical power. If he was not a very great officer, but only the captain of a hundred men, yet it is not unusual for petty officers to be more haughty than their superiors. If a man is placed in a very high and responsible position, he is frequently sobered by his responsibilities; but a mere jack-in-office is usually greater than the emperor himself. However, this centurion was a man of gentle mould, and said of himself, "I am not worthy."

An Unassuming Man.

He might have been proud of his popularity among the Jews. Few can bear to be surrounded with an atmosphere of esteem without beginning to esteem themselves much too highly. He had built for the Jews a synagogue. That is a good thing to do; but it is very possible to build a synagogue, and to become a great man in one's own opinion, and stand several courses of bricks higher in pride. Not so, however, this good man, who had built a synagogue, but did not presume upon the greatness of his own generosity. He never mentioned it: but said, "I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof."

Beloved friends, my point this morning is this—I would call your attention to the happy blending of this beautiful humbleness with an extraordinary degree of faith. In his confession of sin he is unsparing—"Lord I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof;" but in his confession of faith he is equally clear. "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed."

I. First, then,

is very desirable and commendable. Some of you are destitute of it. I dare say you think it a mean and miserable thing. You suppose it would injure your manliness, lower your self-respect, and damp your courage. Dear friends, the manliness which feeds on sin is a poisonous fungus, which grows out of the rottenness of a corrupt heart. May it be taken away from us!

I commend a sense of our unworthiness because it is a sense of what is true. When a man thinks himself unworthy before the Lord, his thoughts are right. When he feels that he could not be saved by the merit of his own works, for his works are faulty and defiled, then he judges according to fact. Whatever result a thought may have upon us, whether it makes us happy or makes us sad, this is a secondary matter; the main point with an honest mind must always be—Is it true? If it be a truthful thought, I ought at once to entertain it, cost me what it may.

In the next place, note that a deep sense of unworthiness is no proof that a man has grossly sinned. It may be viewed in quite the opposite light: if the man had been heinously wicked, his conscience would have lost its sensitiveness, and he would not in all probability have felt his unworthiness so keenly. Do not judge men by their estimates of themselves; or if you do, take this as your guide, that he that humbleth himself is to be exalted, and he that exalteth himself is to be abased.

He that is Great, is Little:

let him that is little to himself be all the greater with you. God loveth not those who boast: He hath filled the hungry with good things, but the rich He hath sent empty away.

I commend this sense of unworthiness, because it has a tendency to make a man kind to others. He who thinks himself everybody thinks another man nobody. If a man be proud, he will say, "I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I am not to be worried by having sick boys to look after." Sympathy, tenderness, and the valuation of others are strangers in the house of the proud; but they take up their abode with those who think themselves unworthy. Beloved, it is well to think little of yourselves, for then you will have more thought to spare for the sorrows of others. The great man, the very great man, the highly-deserving man, the person who is a right honorable and worshipful personage, rides roughshod over his fellows and crushes them without compunction, if they lie in his way and may hinder his design; but the consciously unworthy man, the man who feels that he owes everything to the mercy of God, and must still depend upon that mercy and that mercy only, will be tender and gentle towards his fellow-sinners, and speak comfortably unto them.

We commend again this sense of unworthiness, because it makes a man lowly towards the Saviour. Of all things that are contemptible, a proud bearing towards the Lord Jesus is the most hateful; yet it is by no means unusual. Some seem to fancy that Jesus is their servant, at their beck and call; and they talk about His salvation as though He ought to give it, and they could claim it for themselves and all mankind. Our right state of heart, when dealing with our Lord Jesus, is that of the penitent, washing His feet with tears, or of the leper who fell at His feet and worshipped Him. If we would come to the Saviour of sinners, we must come as sinners. We must come as humble petitioners, and not as those who proudly fancy that they have a claim upon the grace of God.

A sense of unworthiness is exceedingly useful, because it puts a man

Where God can Bless Him.

"Oh," say you, "where is that?" The Lord will only act in conformity with His own attributes. God will always be God; and as He will be God alone in creation, so He will certainly be God alone in the new creation. Our only right position before God is to know that we are undeserving and unworthy while He is holy and glorious. We must hear Him say, "I am God, and beside me there is none else," or we shall never look unto Him to be saved. If I am somebody, and I stand up with my rights and my claims, God cannot bless me without conceding that which He never will concede.

This state of mind, once more, makes a man in love with the simple Word of God. This man, because he was not worthy, did not ask of Christ any mystic words or imposing ceremonies, nor even so much as a visit to his house. No, he was content that the Lord should speak the word. It is our proud human nature that so much sighs for finery and pomp: we would fain go to heaven by some royal road, or glittering way; we want to be saved to music, and perfected by paraphernalia. We would like to be forgiven: but we must needs have a visible priest in full canonicals; and we must have a decorated altar and a show of candles in the daylight. Gewgaws are wanted to conceal humiliation of being saved by pure grace, a soul that feels its own unworthiness cries, "Lord save me in thine own way. Thy word is enough for me. Speak the word of command, and it suffices me."

Now, beloved friends, I leave that point, putting it thus—Do you know your own worthiness? I do not ask you whether you have been racked with terrors, nor whether you have been tormented with doubts, nor whether you have been drowned in despair—that may be or may not be. But are you willing to subscribe to this, that you are not worthy, that sentence of condemnation may fitly be passed upon you if you are saved it must be of free grace alone?

II. But now, secondly, I have to show that this sense of Unworthiness can be Wrongly Used,

and is often perverted to ruinous ends. I have often seen this evil come up in the form of doubt as to the mercy of God. When a man's sin appears very great, he is apt to say, "God cannot have mercy upon me." Now you shall be allowed to be the chief of sinners; if you feel yourself to be so; but you can be allowed to deny the omnipotence of God. You are sadly unworthy; but it is in the uncertainty that grace finds its sphere of operation, and you must not limit the power of that grace, which comes to men through Christ Jesus. Your unworthiness must not be allowed to be used as an argument for the denial of the glorious attribute of mercy. Doth He not say—"Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him turn unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon?"

Poor creatures have even gone the length of doubting the power of the blood of Jesus to cleanse them. If you talk so, I must put my hand on your mouth; you must not say any word of that sort. Is it not enough that you have bespattered yourself with sin? Must you now asperse your Saviour? Will you turn on the blood of Christ? Will you deny the cleansing power? O sirs, if you perish, it will not be because the blood has too little effect; it will be because you have not believed on the name of the Son of God, and will not come to Him that you might have life.

The Promise Doubted.

We have known persons under deep distress doubt the promise of God. A great and precious promise which obviously belonged to them, they have set aside, saying, "It is too good to be true. I cannot believe it, because I am unworthy." Dear heart, do take the promise of God to mean what it says, and believe it. Take the promise as coming from God, and therefore as assuredly true: simply believe it, and be happy.

Some, because they are unworthy, would not receive the Lord Jesus the pleasure of saving them. When Cato committed suicide, Cæsar was so angry that Cato should envy him the glory of his life. Perhaps if Cato had known that Cæsar would have said, he had not been swift with his sword. Beloved, will you not receive Christ the pleasure of forgiving you? I can believe it. Surely you are not such a man. Come, come, man! I will let thee use the best language about thyself: thou mayest call thyself as almost a fiend, and little better than the devil, if this will please thee; though I sweep up hell itself for epithets, if thou wherewith to set forth thine own sin and misery; but, I pray thee, touch not God, deny His mercy, doubt not His faithfulness, doubt not His love, but submit to His saving grace.

Alas! there are some whose sense of unworthiness turns to sullen rebellion. I do not speak harshly of them; but I do know of a few who frequent these courts, of whom I may say they are their own jailers and tormentors. Like one of old, they must confess, "I refused to be comforted." There is a passage in the Psalm, which says, "The Lord abhorreth all manner of meat." Where these? David says they were fools. I do not say so much as that, dear friends, of any of you; but I am solemnly afraid it would be true, if I did say it. He that refuses all manner of meat is like to be starved; and who is to be blamed for it? If you refuse the bread of life, can we pity you if you die of hunger? Will you be lost because you do not feel worthy to be saved? Man alive, if I were you, I would say nothing against the grace which would save me, but I would gratefully accept the loving pardon and the tender mercy of my Lord. The evil and I have had many a skirmish; and if there is anything to be said against my being saved, I have no doubt whatever that he will be particularly sure to say it. Therefore I do not go into that line of business: there is no room for me; Satan will do all that can be done in that direction. I find it far more profitable to be picking up all the crumbs of comfort I can find, in the form of reasons why I should be saved.

III. But now, thirdly, and I am glad to proceed to this much more pleasing subject—a sense of unworthiness finds a fit

Companion in Strong Faith

In Christ. For, look you, first, when you have no faith in yourself, there is the more room in the soul for faith in Jesus. If you have confidence in yourself, that bit of self is filled; but if you have no confidence in yourself, your soul is one great vacuum, and you can hold the more of Christ. The greater the emptiness, the more room for that which is to be the fullness. If thou hast no reason whatever why thou shouldest be saved, except the free grace of God in Christ, than take that free grace here and now. God help thee so to do, and may nothing hinder thee! Believe the more in Christ, because thou canst not, in any degree, believe in thyself.

This man, again through his being so lowly, had not the conceit to question and doubt. Doubt is, in most cases, the daughter of pride. Think of a man criticising God! Job might possibly have done that while he heard of God by the hearing of the ear; but when his eye saw Him he abhorred himself in dust and ashes. How dare we cavil at God's way of saving the guilty! It is impertinence! It is insanity! Let us have none of it.

This lowly estimate of himself brought the centurion away from dictating to Jesus how the blessing should come. A great many persons we meet with are always mapping out courses for the Holy Spirit. They are willing to be saved, if they can be saved, by a certain mode. They will believe if they see signs and wonders, but not else. Their peace must come in the way they have selected, and in no other: their mind is made up as to how it ought to be. Lots of you here are waiting till you feel some singular feeling, or see some strange vision, or undergo a special experience; you cannot you are too proud to be saved by that only. O my hearers, if the Lord shows you your utter unworthiness you will be willing to be saved in the simplest manner. You will then ask nothing but this one thing, "Lord, save, or I perish." You read biographies, or you hear Christian people tell how they were saved, and you put your finger on certain memorable points, and you say, "If ever I feel that, or see that, I will believe in Christ; but not else." Thus it seems that the Lord must bow to your will, and not do as He thinks fit. Truly, the wind bloweth where it listeth, and none of our dictation will have weight with the free Spirit or with the sovereign Saviour.

If Christ had come to the man's house, there would have been great joy in it; but he did not ask for that joy. Some will not believe in the Lord Jesus, unless they feel great transports; but, dear friend, is it right to resolve that if you feel no joy, you will not believe in Him? Nay, rather, if you walk in darkness, and see no light, trust in the Lord. If all within seems to be contrary to the fact of your salvation, believe you in Christ, and you are saved: and if every power and passion of your nature should vote you lost, you are not lost if you are simply hanging to the bare word of the Lord Jesus.

And after all, such faith is the greatest of faith, for the Lord Jesus said, "I have not found such faith, no not in Israel." One man stands up and tells you the ground of his confidence, and you learn that at such a time he heard a voice, or in such a night he dreamed such a dream, or during certain months he had an awful experience of fear of hell, or at another period he felt such joy that he was carried clean away. Do not think less of the believer who says, "My experience is only this:—

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all.
But Jesus Christ is my all in all!"

This last man's experience has least of dross about it. I find written in the infallible Book that if I trust the Lord Jesus

He Will Perform

His office of Saviour upon me. I have trusted Him, and He has saved me. "Is that all the witness you have?" says one. What more witness do I want? I may be able to mention certain incidents which attended my conversion; but these are not my hope. I place no reliance upon what I have thought, or seen or felt. If anybody could prove that I never saw, and never felt and never heard anything of the kind, I should not be troubled about it, for one thing I know—I know that I heard that text, "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of earth;" and I did look, and I was saved. What is more, if I did not then look, and was not then saved, I do not care twopence to contest the point, for I am looking now, and therefore I am saved.

That is the comfort: we have not to rely on a past faith, but still to go on believing. Looking unto Jesus ever: coming to Him always: that is the true position for peace. If I rest in Christ every day, the fruit of that believing will be seen every day. I must not only believe in Jesus, but keep right on believing. God help you so to do! Set side by side with a deep sense of unworthiness a high appreciation of the power of Christ to cleanse you from sin, and to make you holy, even as God is holy. Make progress in these two things. They will not be like the legs of the lame, which are not equal; but they will be much alike in their happy effect upon your life. Down with self, and up with Christ.

"Thus while I sink, my joys shall rise Immeasurably high."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Napoleon's Bride.*

JOSEPHINE was at that time thirty-four years old (seven years older than Napoleon). Her somewhat brown and faded complexion was disguised by rouge and powder, which she employed with great skill; the smallness of her mouth concealed the badness of her teeth; she remedied her natural defects by art. The elegance of her figure, her graceful movements, her refined expression, her soft and gentle voice, her dignified bearing, and all the harmony of her person gave her an exceptional charm. Moreover, an air of coquetry which was all the more attractive because it seemed natural and involuntary; an indolence which was but another fascination; her unpretending, but always pleasing conversation; her unfailing kindness; manners that recalled the best traditions of the Court of Versailles: great taste in dress; toilettes and jewels that even Queens might have envied—all these things enable us to understand the power which so attractive a woman was able to exercise over Bonaparte's intelligence and heart. He was absolutely faithful to her; and this at a time when there was not a beauty in Milan, who was not setting her cap for him. His loyalty to her was partly a matter of love, partly of calculation. As he himself said, "his position was most delicate; he commanded old generals; jealous eyes spied his every movement; he was extremely circumspect. His fate depended on his conduct; he might have forgotten himself for an hour, and how many of his victories hung on that brief space of time!"

* From Citizeness Bonaparte, by Imbert de Saint Amand. Translated from the French by Thomas Sergeant Perry. A graphic portrait of the fascinating woman whom Napoleon loved in the days of his struggles, and cast aside in the day of his triumph. Incidentally many interesting facts are told for the first time, of the great General. Pp. 306; Price $1.25; Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

Many years later, at the time of his coronation at Milan, the celebrated singer Grassini, attracted his attention; circumstances were less austere; he sent for her, and after the first moment of introduction, she reminded him that she had made her first appearance at exactly the time of his first exploits as commander of the army of Italy. "I was then in the full flower of my beauty and talent. Every one talked of me. The young general alone was indifferent, and he alone interested me. How strange! When I really was somebody, and all Italy at my feet, I scorned it all for one of your glances and could not win it."

A Dog's Reproach.

Napoleon said at St. Helena that once he was passing over a battle-field in Italy on which the bodies of the dead were still lying. "In the moonlight and the unbroken quiet, suddenly there sprang from under the cloak of a corpse, a dog which ran toward us and then returned at once, uttering doleful cries; he licked his master's face a few times and then ran at us again. He was asking aid and seeking vengeance." The Emperor went on, "was it my state of mind, the place, the hour, the act itself? Whatever it was, I can truly say that never has anything on the battle-field made such an impression on me. I stopped involuntarily to gaze on this spectacle. This man, I thought, has friends in the camp perhaps, in his company, and here he lies abandoned by all except his dog. What a lesson given us by this animal! What is man? How mysterious are his impressions? I had without emotion, given orders which were to decide the fate of the army; I had watched dry-eyed the execution of the movements which were to cause death to a great many of us; and here I was moved and deeply touched by this dog's howling! What is certain is that at that moment, I would have been very gentle to a suppliant foe, and I understood clearly how Achilles restored Hector's body when Priam wept."

Josephine's Pet.

Josephine had a little pug dog called Fortune, of which she was extremely fond, though he reminded her of a time of great sorrow. When she was imprisoned in the Reign of Terror, she was separated from the Viscount of Beauharnais (her first husband) who was incarcerated elsewhere. Her children had permission to come to see her at the office with their governess, but the jailor was always present at these meetings. It occurred to the governess to take Fortune with her: and he made his way to Josephine's cell, carrying concealed in his collar a letter with all the news. After her release Josephine would never be separated from her pet. One day, at Montebello, he was lying on the sofa with his mistress. "You see that fellow there," said Napoleon to Arnault, pointing at the dog; "he is my rival. When I married I wanted to put him out of my wife's room, but I was given to understand that I might go away myself or share it with him. I was annoyed, but it was to take or to leave, and I yielded. The favorite was not so accommodating, for he left his mark on my leg." Insolent like all favorites, Fortune had great faults; he was continually barking and used to bite everybody, even other dogs. At Montebello he had the imprudence to bite the cook's dog, a surly mastiff who, with one turn of the head, killed the little fellow. Josephine was in despair and the unhappy cook thought himself ruined. A few days afterward he met Napoleon walking in the garden, and fled in terror. "Why do you run away from me in that way?" asked Napoleon. "General, after what my dog did—" "Well?" "I was afraid you would hate the sight of me." "Your dog! Haven't you him any longer?" "Excuse me, General, he never sets a paw in the garden, especially since Madame has another." "Let him come in as much as he wants; perhaps he will make away with him, too. The gentlest and most indolent of women intimidated the most wilful and despotic of men. Bonaparte might win battles, create or destroy States, but he could not put a dog out of the room.

In his memoirs, Marmont records an incident that came near having serious results for Napoleon and his fortunes. Accompanied by Josephine and a few friends he had reached Aix-en-Provence on the hurried journey to Toulon. Though it was nightfall they pushed on, taking the direct road through Roquevaire, avoiding Marseilles, where they might have been detained. The road was a highway, but one less frequented than the other. For some days the postillions had not been that way. Suddenly, as they were rapidly going down the slope of a hill, the carriage was stopped by a large branch of a tree stretching across the road. Ten steps farther, at the foot of the descent, a bridge crossing a torrent, over which they had to go, had fallen down the previous evening. No one knew anything about it, and the carriages would have gone over the precipice, had not this branch stopped them at the edge.

JOSIAH DEAN'S BAR.

BY ALICE M. MUZZY.

PART I.

IN a certain Western town, which we will call Brewster, lived not many years ago, a family by the name of Dean.

Josiah Dean, the head of this household, after making some money in the lumber trade, conceived the idea of increasing his gains more rapidly, by buying out the one only hotel the town of Brewster afforded.

His family consisted of his wife, two boys and a girl.

There were frequent misgivings on the part of Josiah Dean and his wife, when they thought about the influence of a hotel life on the education of their children.

"I don't mind anything so much as I do the bar, father," remonstrated Mother Dean.

"Yes, that is bad," rejoined her husband, "but then almost every calling has its drawbacks. There's the minister's children, for example, when they are not being picked to pieces, they're being flattered to death."

"I suppose it would not do to have no bar, eh, Josiah?" asked Mrs. Dean, timidly.

"Of course not, mother, who ever heard of a hotel without a bar? Nobody would stay with me. Another house would be started, and I should not make a cent. A hotel without a bar would be a wasp without a sting. A very convenient state of affairs for other people, but how is the wasp to defend itself?"

Mr. Dean's will was the stronger of the two; and the bar was fitted up, and all his wife could do was to look after her children as carefully as possible.

She was led to say, however, a short time after this conversation, when a large and wealthy family left them to take board elsewhere, on account of the influence of the sale of liquors on the premises:

Josiah Dean Takes his Boys Out of the Bar-Room.

"Well, Josiah, seems as if the 'wasp's sting' injured himself as much as it protected."

"That's true, mother, and I wish I had not fitted up the bar; but now I cannot afford to throw away all the money, and we must make the best of it."

As time wore away, the Dean children, being exceedingly bright and forward, it grew more impossible to keep them from evil influences.

One day when the assistant was left in charge, Mr. Dean heard an unusual sound of hilarity, and went to see what was the matter. To his surprise and vexation, he found his two boys being coaxed to drink. Their boyish grimaces and sputterings, as the vile, strong, scorching liquid passed their young and tender throats, was the occasion of the merriment.

"Joe and Robert," exclaimed Mr. Dean sternly, "what are you doing here?"

"Having a drink with the other fellers," replied Joe, the elder, pertly, while the tears stood in his eyes, from the effects of the drink.

This reply was greeted with a coarse roar of applause from the men sitting round. "He's a bright one," "I wish I owned such a trump," were the exclamations heard on all sides. But as Mr. Dean tried to make them leave the room, one burly fellow spoke up and said:—

"So, ho! your lordship, Dean, you think your children are too good to associate with us fellers, do you? Perhaps you will feel too high and mighty to take our money that we spend on you so freely. Well it don't make no difference, Jim Mahoney's going to start something that'll beat you all out."

"Let Jim Mahoney start as soon as he pleases, and as many places as he pleases; these children cannot stay in here."

Everyone looked their surprise at these words, coming from the usually quiet Mrs. Dean, who had followed her husband into the room, unknown to the latter, and unnoticed by most of the men.

Mr. Dean was thoroughly annoyed and vexed by this time, and he said in a harsher tone than anyone had ever heard him use to his wife before:

"Maria, I do wish you would stay in your own part of the house, and not meddle with what does not belong to you."

"Josiah, I know I am right. These children ought not to be here," answered, she took Joe and Robert by the hand, and amid cries and lamentations led them to the other part of the house.

But the two boys were flattered by the applause their speeches received, and Mrs. Dean's endeavor to keep them from temptation were of very little avail. Mr. Dean was as anxious as his wife to have them out of the reach of evil influences, but fear of injuring his business prevented him from seconding his wife, and gave rise to many family disagreements.

No daughter could have been more helpful and sympathetic with a mother than was Kate Dean during these early days of trial and struggle with her brother. She was very obedient and respectful. She tried the best of her poor ability to influence her brother and help her mother.

But as time wore away and she developed into a beautiful girl of which childhood gave the promise, she had many lovers and among them a handsome fellow by the name of Richard Murdock.

This young man was the only child of his mother. Young Murdock had not called on Kate three times, before her other lovers to a man, realized that there was no hope for them. Handsome, brave, and generous, he had all the qualifications to win a man's love; and what was better still, his position to truth and constancy, was such that it seemed that after winning he might retain her.

Ah, what happy days those were! The days of their courtship when they had no disagreements, and the one thought just as the other; if for no better reason than that the other thought so.

After a while, in coming to see Kate, Richard would say "Good night," and then step in to bar-room "just to see who was there." So times there would be a merry crowd, and Richard's stay was prolonged till the early morning hours. This habit led him to taking a little something to keep him from feeling so exhausted on his way home.

Kate soon heard of this, and to quiet her postulations, Richard replied:

"Kate, I must say I do not think you are doing the right thing by your father to be so ashamed of his business. It seems to me a daughter would try to increase the popularity of her father's work, and so make it easier for him. Now you and your mother, by your steady opposition to this branch of his calling, hinder him greatly."

"Well, Richard, that is a side of the case never stopped to think of before. Mother and I have only thought of my brothers, what a terrible thing it would be for them to get a taste for liquor; and then thinking other mothers and sisters might have the same feeling, we have not wanted father to sell anything of the kind on the premises."

"Oh, well! that is because you are both so tender-hearted. If a young man is not able to overcome the temptation to excess, he is a poor stick and not worth the powder to blow him up, much less the effort to save him. Now you do not mean to say you think there is the slightest danger for me?"

THE FIRE AT THE ALHAMBRA.

(See Illustrations.)

T was almost startling to read in the cable dispatches of last week the prosaic announcement that an extensive fire had broken out the Alhambra, and a large part the historic palace had been consumed. In our youthful ys the old palace, under the busy work-a-day life has been relegated to the gions of romance and rgotten. Yet the anient, rambling ructure still ex-

mountains and watered by two noble rivers, ie climate and vegetation, almost tropical, but ooled by the winds that blow over the snow-ad mountains. This is Granada, the fairest provice of Spain, rivalling Switzerland in pict-resque majesty, and Italy in luxuriant beauty.
The Alhambra was almost a city in itself in ie days of its glory. Its name means red case, from the color of its stones, which take at color as the oxide of iron they contain is posed to the action of sun and air. Its walls around an area of several acres and within em the Moorish kings erected palaces of surassing grandeur, until the vast enclosure was lled with edifices such as only that luxurious ce could conceive of.

The Alhambra has fallen into decay in these
ays. Its magnificent staircases are broken, its mosaic pavements fractured, and its delicate sculptures and traceries defaced. Yet its pillars and Moorish arches, its symmetrical courts, and graceful fountains remain beautiful in decay.

Efforts have been made spasmodically for a century past to restore it; but the very reason for such palaces has passed away before the march of modern ideas, and the work has been sluggish and to a large extent ineffectual.

The fire reported last week started in the court of Albacera, a picture of which is here given. All the inhabitants of the surrounding country went to the rescue, but the means of fighting the fire were antiquated and ineffectual.
Before it was subdued, the Arab palace, the wonderful Mirador de la Reina, and all that portion of the Alhambra was destroyed. The bulk of the buildings were saved, but the loss of the burnt property is irreparable.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. LEANDER S. KEYSER.

Light at Last.

FOR nearly an hour after her lover's departure, Addie More continued to weep bitterly. It was not regret for what she had done that caused her tears. She still felt that she had done right in giving back the ring.

She ceased weeping, sat up and pushed her disordered hair back from her face with both hands. She must face the future. Oh, that God would give her strength! If she was a Christian she would pray for it. Well, God could see into her heart. He must know her difficulties, her doubts, her sorrows. Why should she not pray? Her doubts were mental, they were not moral obliquities. She would believe if she could. Why should she not pray? She knelt and poured out all her soul as she had never done in all her life before.
She prayed for light and strength—the great needs of every human soul. In some way, undefinable to herself, a new feeling entered her soul. After her prayer was ended she remained on her knees trying to analyze it.
It was relief—the relief that comes to a child who has received from a parent the promise to undertake a task too difficult for the child. Whence came it? What did it mean?

Others might argue about the subjective and objective effects of prayer, but to Addie More it had only one reason and one lesson. God is;
and He is a Hearer and Answerer of prayer. What a vista opened from that one position.

Addie did not go to bed at all that night. She opened her Bible and read.
She prayed again and again, and before the sun rose she had given her heart to God. She told no one for some days, but her joy was too great to hide and finally she went to Dr.
Hamlyn and told him of that night's experience.

Wescott too, was sad and anxious.
The gloom hung very heavily about him one morning,
when, after a night

of broken sleep, he entered his study and sat down listlessly at his desk. A letter lay there which at once attracted his attention.

"I know that writing," he said, "yet I cannot remember the writer. I am sure I have some association with it. Ah!" opening the letter and looking at the signature—"Heritage's brother. Good news." This was the letter:

"MY DEAR MR. WESCOTT: I am sure it will afford you pleasure to learn that my brother
Robert has recovered from his mental apathy.
The manner in which it came about suggests a study in psychological phenomena that might well test the wisdom of the schools. One day he was sitting in the open yard, when one of the inmates of the institution, whose madness made him fierce and dangerous, broke from control, and rushing out upon Robert, struck him a blow upon the head with a club. Fortunately, several employees in the infirmary saw the maniac's intent, and sprang forward in time to break the violence of the blow."

"Robert says that he has no knowledge of the descent of the club upon his head, but suddenly a light seemed to break into his brain, as if he had been awakened from a long sleep of unconsciousness, and then he was as sane as he had ever been in his life.* He is now well and rational, and expects to come to your city in a few days. He sends his regards.

"Yours faithfully, SCOVIL HERITAGE."

"How strange!" Wescott exclaimed. "What a marvellous means of recovery. But it is like our spiritual experiences. How often an afflic-tion, like a crushing blow, brings light into the soul! Well, thank God, however it comes."

Wescott's surprise and joy were shared by all Heritage's friends, and not least by Robert, himself. The first thought that occurred to him when the light broke into his temporarily darkened mind was: "Yes, I will write to Metta this evening." He seemed to take up the thread of his life at the point where his mental aberration began. Then he recalled having been hurled from the street-car upon the stone heap, and wondered whether he had been hurt. When he saw the commotion around him, the raving maniac trying to break from the grasp of those who held him, and the massive court, he was quite dumbfounded. It was only after he had heard the whole story from vention, the author desires to say that he has simply made use of described to him by a friend.

his brother Scovil that he emerged completely from his dazed condition, so that his surroundings began to seem natural again.

His first impulse was to write to Metta and explain all. But what changes might not nine months have wrought? She might be betrothed to another and even married; and so he decided that he must go to see her or make inquiries of her acquaintances. This could not be done without going to Crawley, and he resolved to do so. A longing came over him to visit the great falls at Niagara on his journey westward. Bidding his friends good-bye, he stepped aboard the train one morning and arrived in the afternoon at the spot that had so great a fascination for him. It was a beautiful May day, and as he was alone, he decided not to hire a carriage, but loiter at his own fancy about the place.

The sun was near the horizon when he ascended to Prospect Park, and the moon, which was nearly full, was just lighting her wan globe over the eastern gorges and cliffs. He stood in the gloaming leaning over the masonry at the edge of the American Falls, and looking down at the wild, ceaseless turmoil below, the awful impulse momentarily prompting him, as it does so many visitors of that spot, to hurl himself over into the watery abyss.

At length he turned about, scarcely knowing what his next move should be, as it was now too late to visit Whirlpool Rapids. Suddenly he gave a start. A familiar form and face were before him. For a moment he was too agitated to speak, and then he exclaimed:

"Miss Chapman!"

"The girl was looking at him, her face as white as the seething, foaming waters at the foot of Niagara.

"Mr. Heritage, you have surprised me. I did not know that—" she hesitated.

"You did not know that I had recovered?" he finished for her. "Yes, I was completely cured a month ago."

A vivid blush suffused her fair cheeks, and her bright blue eyes became brighter with the tears that gleamed in them. To Heritage her blushes and her tears told a story of hope.

"Miss Chapman, if your friends will excuse you, I should be glad to speak with you. Shall we take a turn about the park?"

Metta, recovering herself, introduced him to the friends with whom she was travelling, and informing them that he was an old acquaintance, excused herself. The couple did not walk about long, but at Heritage's suggestion found a rustic seat beneath the trees.

"Metta—Miss Chapman," he began, at length, his heart palpitating wildly, "are you still free? Have I a right now to make the explanation you asked for in that letter so long ago?"

"You have," she whispered.

"And no one else has a claim on you?"

"No one," she replied. "I have been waiting for your explanation all these months."

"Thank God!" he said fervently.

And there, in the wan moonlight, with the music of Niagara ringing in their ears, Heritage told the story of his dealings with Dolly Pressley in his college days.

"There," he said in conclusion, "that is the whole truth. It was painful for me; and Dolly has suffered, too. I am deeply sorry for that, but honestly I believe I did the really wise thing for her and for myself. There was no other course to take in the circumstances. Ah, Metta, if we could only recall words spoken under fleeting impulse! But we cannot and we cannot undo the wrongs we have done. We can only repent and amend. The past is irrevocable. Now you know all. May I now ask that question again that I asked you before? Will you be mine, Metta?"

What need to give Metta's answer. There could be no doubt in the mind of any one who saw Robert's beaming face, and Metta's bright eyes when they rejoined the party that their interview had been eminently satisfactory to both. The cloud between them had been dispelled and perfect confidence established.

The next day, after visiting other points of interest, they separated, Metta going East to visit friends, and Heritage taking the train for Basserine. The city that he had learned to love so well had a familiar look when he reached it, and brought a desire to make it his residence, a desire that was destined to be gratified, for when he went to the School Board, he found that his former position had only been filled temporarily by a supply; and so in another week he was installed in the old place.

The first person to greet him at the station was Howard Wescott, to whom he had written from Niagara. Their old friendship was renewed. Heritage's joy almost amounted to transport when he heard from Howard's lips the story of that young man's conversion and subsequent career as a preacher of the Gospel.

"And it was through you that the barriers first began to fall away," said Howard.

"But you seem to have trouble, Wescott," said Heritage. "Your face is pale and you sigh heavily at times. What has gone wrong?"

Howard, feeling that his companion was a faithful friend, took him into his confidence, and gave him a concise history of his recent troubles.

"You have made a mistake," said Heritage, when the recital was ended. "In the first place, you should not have believed those disparaging whispers about Miss More. It was unkind of you to give them a moment's credence. Then I think you should have tried to trace them to find out their true source. Who told your sister, for instance, that Addie was of an irritable temperament?"

"Mrs. Barbor, I believe."

"Bah! She's the most unconscionable gossip-monger in the city. And who told her?"

"I'm not certain; I think it was a young man by the name of Welding, who has his home with the Mores."

"Will you give me the privilege of ferreting out this matter? By the way, why don't you go back to Miss More and tell her how you feel?"

"That is out of the question. I have learned that she is engaged to a photographer by the name of Corrigan."

"Corrigan! ejaculated the other in amazement. "Why, that's the man"—then he checked himself. "Wescott, the clue to the whole mystery has been found. My word for it, Corrigan is the fabricator of those vile reports. I know something about his wiles. Sometime I will tell you what I refer to. Leave it to me, and if I can help you out of your perplexities, I will."

Accordingly Heritage went to Mrs. Barbor, and, as he expected, found that she had been merely Corrigan's instrument in carrying out his plot of alienating the lovers. He had learned from Metta that Corrigan had meddled also in his own affairs, and had instilled doubts in her mind about himself. It seemed, therefore, in the circumstances the right thing to see Corrigan himself and if possible force him to a confession of his plots. Heritage shrank from meeting him, but in his friend's interest, as well as his own, it had to be done.

Accordingly the next morning early, Heritage presented himself at the studio, and sent in his card. Corrigan would have avoided the interview had it been possible. Indeed, his aversion to meeting Heritage was as great as Heritage's, and he was, besides, being a coward at heart, alarmed at this bold attack. He thought, however, that the best course was to assume the courage he did not feel and invited his visitor into his private room.

What occurred there, during the two hours that the door was shut upon them, Heritage never told, and Corrigan was little likely to tell. That the interview was a stormy one at the outset may be inferred, but when Heritage left the studio he carried in his pocket a full confession signed by Corrigan himself, which he took triumphantly to Wescott's rooms.

Howard was surprised beyond measure when his friend Heritage described the result of his little experiment at untangling the knotted threads of his difficulties. "Now, sir," pure Heritage, "you must go to Miss More with delay."

In spite of his friend's urgent advice, Howard allowed a week to slip by before he could summon courage to speak to Addie, for he could not persuade himself that she would forgive his tergiversation; and he might have delayed still longer had not chance thrown them together. He was passing along Main Street on a rainy evening, when he happened to glance and saw Addie standing in the door of a store, with a woe-begone and puzzled expression on her face. Although he feared he might regard even a word from him as an impertinence, he obeyed the impulse to stop and speak to her. She greeted him with a smile, her pale lips, though she evidently felt strained.

"Miss More, you seem to be halting between two opinions. I suppose you don't know whether you ought to venture out into the rain or not," he said.

"I am a little puzzled what to do," she confessed.

"Why, have you no umbrella or rubber cloak?"

"No, I left home this morning, and the weather was so pleasant then that I made no preparation for rain."

"If you will wait here a few minutes, I will borrow a rubber cloak for you. A friend across the way will loan me one, I am sure."

He soon returned, and helped her to put on the cloak, and then said: "If you are alone, I will walk home with you; you need the protection of an umbrella as well as a gossamer."

She hesitated in an embarrassed way, then took his proffered arm, upon which she noticed that her hand trembled. The rain pattered gleefully on the umbrella over their heads. Fortunately there was no wind, so they could keep dry. They had gone over half-way to home, their conversation becoming more and more constrained when by a sudden impulse he clasped the hand which lay upon his arm.

"Miss More—Addie," he said, "what makes your hand tremble so?"

She tried to withdraw it from his clasp, but did not reply, and only the rain, pattering pæan on the protecting umbrella above them, broke the silence.

"May I ask you one question?" he said.

"It depends on what the question is."

"Are you engaged to Corrigan?"

"What makes you think that?" she asked, glancing up at him in surprise. "No, I am not."

"Then it is proper for me to speak. Addie, can you forgive my cruel treatment of you? I have been wretched since the night our engagement was broken. My ring is in my pocket—will you wear it again?"

She stopped suddenly as if riveted to the spot, unconscious of the staccato of the rain drops above her head.

"Howard!" she exclaimed.

"My darling. I can love no one but you. Perhaps I was a little vacillating for a while, but my heart has come back to you, its first and only true love. Will you wear the ring?"

She trembled like a leaf, tears which could not be seen in the darkness sprang to her eyes, and then with a sob of joy she withdrew her glove and held her hand toward him. The rain continued its musical patter, patter on the umbrella, as if rejoicing in the reconciliation of the lovers. Howard placed the ring upon her finger, and then lifted the hand that was to wear it to his lips and kissed it fervently, saying:

"Addie, God bless you! It is a mercy that you have taken me back. You have saved me by doing so. It will require a life-time, dear Addie, to atone for the wrong I have done you."

After reaching her home they talked over their plans for the future, arriving without dissent at the following conclusion: Howard would take a course of theological training at Yale, and then they would go to some humble country or village pastorate and begin their life-work together.

THE END.

THE CHILDREN WAIT.
(Try A. Barr in the Chicago Standard.)
The chamber of the house,
Up in dim, uncertain light,
Stood an antique chest of drawers,
Of reign wood with brasses bright.
Upon a woman, frail and gray,
Who tottered across the floor;
"said she, "the light of day;
Jean, unlock the bottom drawer?"
In all youth's loveliness,
Down with eager, curious face;
As she dreamt of Indian silks,
Of velvet, and of rare old lace.
When the summer sunshine fell
On the treasures hoarded there,
She rushed to her tender eyes,
And heart was solemn as a prayer.
"Grandmamma!" she softly sighed,
As a withered rose and palm;
The elder face was naught
Of sweet content and peaceful calm.
Upon her staff she gazed
As a baby's half-worn shoe—
Of rock of finest lawn—
With tiny bows of blue—
Made fifty years ago—
A glove, a tasseled cap—
One long divisioned sum—
School-books fastened with a strap,
Which shed them all with trembling lips;
"How much," she said, "the heart can hold."
"I thought that I should die
The day that first I laid them there."
Now it seems so good to know
That all throughout these weary years
Her eyes have been untouched by grief,
Her eyes have been unstained by tears.
Now, we see with clearer sight,
That earthly love is almost o'er;
The children wait me in the skies Whom I locked that sacred drawer."

A RUSSIAN BOY'S FAITH.
HATFIELD, at a recent meeting in told this anecdote: "A family of sons—a father, mother, son, and daughter—settled in a house near St. Petersburg, Russia, where there were no near relatives. The parents soon died, and the son waited for two days in hope of their coming to their help, but nobody came. The little girl then began to weep, and boy was at his wits' end to comfort her, taking a bit of paper, he wrote on it,
"I'll give me one copeck to buy bread sister!" Going to the church to where his father had once taken him, he put the paper into the slit of the box where the contributions were deposited.
He saw him, and thinking the boy lying, chased him till he was caught.
The boy told his story artlessly, and the father came home with him, gave him immediate relief, and the next day related the story of the assembled congregation, who gave $1,000 for them. In this manner the father answered the lad's prayer for a loaf to buy bread for his sister."

SKILL CAME FROM GOD.
Good gifts are from the Master, Hand or brain. A young painter was called by his master to complete a picture on which the master had been to suspend his labors on account of growing infirmities.
"Mission thee, my son," said the master, "to do thy best on this work."
"Best." The young man had such faith in his master's skill that he felt content to touch canvas which bore the name of that renowned hand.
"Do thy best," was the old man's reply; and again and again, to repeated solicitation, he answered; "Do thy best."

The youth, trembling, seized the brush, and kneeling before his appointed work,
he prayed:
"It is for the sake of my beloved Master that I implore skill and power to do this deed."
His hand grew steady as he painted.
Slumbering genius awoke in his eye. Enthusiasm took the place of fear. Forgetfulness of himself supplanted his self-distrust, and with a calm joy he finished his labor. The "beloved Master" was borne on his couch into the studio to pass judgment on the result. As his eye fell on the triumph of art before him to burst into tears, and, throwing his enfeebled arms around the young artist, he exclaimed, "My son, I paint no more!" That youth, Leonardo da Vinci, became the painter of "The Last Supper," the ruins of which, after the lapse of three hundred years, still attract annually to the refectory of an obscure convent in Milan hundreds of the worshippers of art.

What is Scrofula
It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces unsightly lumps or swellings; which causes painful running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or many other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors."
It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the worst possible features of both. Being the most ancient, it is the most general of all diseases or affections,
for very few persons are entirely free from it.
How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished, often when other medicines have failed, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. For all affections of the blood Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some of the cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial.

Four women, all told

The first told how much easier it was to wash with Pearline. She saved half her labor, and the work was better done.

The second told how much longer the clothes lasted, since she'd used Pearline. The rubbing that wore them out wasn't necessary.

The next told how many things she did with it; she washed the kitchen floor, or the finest china—the most delicate lace, or the coarsest fabric. Whatever she did with it, she saved money by it.

The fourth told of the harmlessness of Pearline. She had used it for ten years, and she knew nothing that was washable could be hurt by it.

These are only four out of millions who use Pearline, but the others say the same things and more. Try it yourself; then you can tell about it.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—send it back. 187 JAMES PYLE, New York.

MY FIRST DAY IN PALESTINE.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED LAST SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 28, 1890.

"The half was not told me." 1. Kings 10: 7.

THIS is the first sermon in a course of Sabbath morning sermons on "My Recent Journey Through the Holy Land and Neighboring Countries—What I Saw and what I Learned." Out of the sixty-four millions of our present American population and the millions of our past, only about five thousand have ever visited the Holy Land. Of all those who cross to Europe, less than five per cent. ever get as far as Rome, and less than two per cent. ever get to Athens and less than a quarter of one per cent. ever get to Palestine. Of the less than a quarter of one per cent. who do go to the Holy Land, some see nothing but the noxious insects and the filth of the Oriental cities and come back wishing they had never gone. Of those who see much of interest and come home, only a small portion can tell what they have seen, the tongue unable to report the eye. The rarity of a successful, intelligent and happy journey through the Holy Land is very marked. But the time approaches when will be much more common. Thousands will go where now there are scores. Two locomotives were recently sent up from Joppa to Jerusalem and railroads are about to begin in Palestine and the day will come when the cry will be, "All out for Jerusalem!" "Twenty minutes for breakfast at Tiberias!" "Change cars for Tyre!" "Grand Trunk Junction for Nineveh!" "All out for Damascus!" Meanwhile the wet-locks of the Atlantic Ocean and Adriatic and Mediterranean Seas are being shorn, and not only is the voyage shortened, but, after a while, without crossing the ocean you or your children will visit the Holy Land. A company of capitalists have gone up to Behring Straits where the American and Asiatic continents come within thirty-six miles of meeting. These capitalists or others will build a bridge across those Straits, for mid-way are three islands called "The Diomedes" and the water is not deep and is never disturbed, with icebergs. Trains of cars will run from America across that bridge and on down through Siberia, bringing under more immediate observation the Russian outrages against exiles and consequently abolishing them, and there are persons here to-day, who, without one qualm of sea-sickness, will visit that wonderful land where the Christ-like, Abrahamic, Mosaic, Davidic, Solomonian and Herodic histories overlap each other with such power that by the time I took my feet out of the stirrups at the close of the journey, I felt so wrung out with emotion that it seemed nothing else could ever absorb my feelings again.

A Journey to Palestine

Future Explorers.

The chief hindrance for going to Palestine with many is the dreadful sea, and though I have crossed it ten times it is more dreadful every time, and I fully sympathize with what was said one night when Mr. Beecher and I went over to speak in New York at the Anniversary of the Seamen's Friend Society and the clergyman making the opening prayer quoted from St. John: "There shall be no more sea," and Mr. Beecher, seated beside me, in memory of a recent ocean voyage said "Amen, I am glad of that." By the partial abolition of the Atlantic Ocean and the putting down of rail-tracks across every country in all the world, the most sacred land on earth will come under the observation of so many people, who will be ready to tell of what they saw, that infidelity will be pronounced only another form of insanity, for no honest man can visit the Holy Land and remain an infidel. This Bible from which I preach has almost fallen apart, for I read from it the most of the events in it recorded on the very Places Where they Occurred.

Some of the leaves got wet as the waves dashed over our boat on Lake Galilee and the book was jostled in the saddle-bags for many weeks, but it is a new book to me, newer than any book that yesterday came out of any of our great printing-houses. All my life I had heard of Palestine and I had read about it, and talked about it, and preached about it, and sung about it, and prayed about it, and dreamed about it until my anticipations were piled up into something like Himalayan proportions, and yet I have to cry out, as did the Queen of Sheba when she first visited the Holy Land: "The half was not told me."

In order to make the more accurate and vivid a book I have been writing—a life of Christ, entitled, "From Manger to Throne," I left home last October, and on the last night of November we were walking the decks of the Senegal, a Mediterranean steamer. It was a ship of immense proportions. There were but few passengers, for it is generally rough at that time of year, and pleurists are not apt to be voyaging there and then. The stars were all out that night. Those armies of light seemed to have had their shields newly burnished. We walked the polished deck. Not much was said, for in all our hearts was the dominant word "to-morrow." Somehow the Acropolis, which a few days before had thrilled us at Athens, now in our minds lessened in the height of its columns and the glory of its temples. And the Egyptian pyramids in our memory lessened their wonders of obsolete masonry, and the Coliseum of Rome was not so vast a ruin as it a few weeks before had seemed to be. And all that we had seen and heard dwindled in importance, for to-morrow, to-morrow we shall see the Holy Land. "Captain, what time will we come

In Sight of Palestine?"

"Well," he said, courteously, "if the wind and sea remain as they are, about daybreak." Never was I so impatient for a night to pass. I could not see much use for that night, anyhow. I pulled aside the curtain from the port-hole of my stateroom, so that the first hint of dawn would waken me. But it was a useless precaution. Sleep was among the impossibilities. Who could be so stupid as to slumber when any moment there might start out within sight of the ship, the land where the most stupendous scenes of all time and all eternity were enacted, land of ruin and redemption, land where was fought the battle that made our heaven possible, land of Godfrey and Saladin, of Joshua and Jesus.

Will the night ever be gone? Yes, it is growing lighter, and along the horizon there is something like a bank of clouds, and as a watchman paces the deck, I say to him, "What is that out yonder?" "That is land, sir," said the sailor.

"The Land!" I Cried.

Soon all our friends were aroused from sleep and the shore began more clearly to reveal itself. With roar, and rattle, and bang, the anchor dropped in the roadstead a half mile from land, for though Joppa is the only harbor of Palestine, it is the worst harbor on all the coasts. Sometimes for weeks no ship stops there. Between rocks about seventy-five feet apart, small boat must take the passengers ashore. The depths are strewn with the skeleton of those who have attempted to land or attempt to embark. Twenty-seven pilgrims perished with one crash of a boat against the rocks. Whole fleets of crusaders, of Romans, of Saracens, of Egyptians, have gone to splinters there. A writer eight hundred years ago, said he stood on the beach in a storm at Joppa, and out of thirty ships, all but seven went to pieces on the rocks and a thousand of the dead were washed ashore.

A Rock-Bound Coast.

Strange that with a few blasts of powder like that which shattered our American Gate, those rocks have not been uprooted the way cleared, so that great ships, instead of anchoring far out from land, might sweep up to the wharf for passengers and freight. But must remember that land is under the Turk, and what the Turk touches, he withers. Hammedanism is against easy wharves, against steamers, against rail-trains, against print presses, against civilization. Darkness is ways opposed to light. The owl hates the dawn. "Leave those rocks where they are, practically cries the Turkish Government; want no people of other religions and other habits to land there; if the salt seas wash them, let it be a warning to other invaders, away with your nineteenth century, with its thought and its modern inventions." The Turkish Government ought to be blotted from the face of the earth, and it will be. Of many of the inhabitants of Palestine, I asked the question, "Has ever been here?" "No." "Why don't he come when it belongs to his dominion?" And, at the man interrogated looked this way, and that, so as to know he would not be reported, the answer would invariably be, "he dare not come." I believed it. If the Sultan of Turkey attempted to visit Jerusalem, he would never get back again. All Palestine hates him. I saw him go to the mosque for prayers in his own city of Constantinople and saw seven thousand armed men riding out to protect him. Expensive prayers. Of course that government wants no harbor at Joppa. May God remove that city of nations, that old hag of the centuries, Turkish Government! For its everlasting insult to God and woman, let it perish! And those rocks at the harbor remain the jaws of repeated destruction.

As we descended the narrow steps at the side of the ship, we heard the clamor, and quarrel and swearing, of fifteen or sixteen different races of men of all features, and all colors all vernaculars, all different in appearance, but all alike in desire to get our baggage and ourselves ashore. The men having charged us, pushes and struggles, with a heavy sea, and the violence of the waves would not be tolerated in our country, but which must be the only manner of making any impression there, clears our way into one of the boats which heads for the shore. Within fifteen minutes of the Christ-land, we hear shouting from the beach and in minutes we will be landed. The prow of our boat is caught by men who wade out to help us in. We are tremulous with suppressed excitement, our breath is quick, and from the deck of the boat we spring to the shore, and Sunday morning, December 1, 1889, about eight o'clock

fect touch Palestine. Forever to me and e will that day and hour be commemorated, that pre-eminent mercy. Let it be mentioned prayer by my children and children's chil- 1 after we are gone, that morning we were nitted to enter that land, and gaze upon e holy hills, and feel the emotions that rise, fall, and weep, and laugh, and sing, and tri- h at such a disembarkation.

n the back of hills one hundred and fifty high Joppa is lifted toward the skies. It is picturesque as it is quaint, and as much un- any city we ever seen, ough it were t in that star rs, where a night's ago very Septem- astronomers ough unparal- d telescopes a snow-storm ing. How we were to Joppa! Why, is the city re Dorcas, queen of the lle, lived and and was resurrected. You remember that the people came around the dead body of this factress and brought specimens of her kind lle-work, and said, "Dorcas made this;" reas sewed that;" "Dorcas cut and fitted;" "Dorcas hemmed that." According to ffoot, the commentator, they laid her out in: in a public room and the poor wrung their ls and cried, and sent for Peter, who perform- miracle by which the good woman came back e and resumed her benefactions. An espe- resurrection day for one woman! She was model by which many women of our day fashioned their lives, and at the first blast e horn of the wintry tempest, there appear housand Dorcases—Dorcases of Brooklyn, ases of New York, Dorcases of London, ases of all the neighborhoods and towns cities of Christendom, just as good as the as of the Joppa which I visited. Thank for the ever-increasing skill and sharp- and speed and generosity of Dorcas's le!

What is that man doing?" I said to the dran in the streets of Joppa. "Oh, he is Carrying his Bed." altitudes of the Eastern people sleep of-doors, and that is the way so many hose lands become blind. It is from dew of the night falling on the ds. As a result of this, in Egypt, every tieth person is totally blind. In Oriental e bed is made of a thin small mattress, nket and a pillow, and when the man rises ie morning he just ties up the three into a lle and shoulders it and takes it away. It to that the Saviour referred when he said e sick man, "Take up thy bed and walk." merican couch or an English couch would ire at least four men to carry it, but one Ori- can easily manage his slumber equipment. t I inhale some of the odors of the large aries around Joppa. It is there to this day, a perous business, this tanning of hides. And reminds me of Simon the tanner, who lived ppa, and was the host of Peter the Apostle. pose the olfactories of Peter were as easily ted by the odors of a tannery as others, he Bible says, "He lodged with one Simon, anner." People who go out to do reforma- and missionary and Christian work must e too sensitive. Simon no doubt brought is homestead every night the malodors of calf-skins and ox-hides in his tannery, but lodged in that home, not only because he not have been invited to the houses of chant princes surrounded by redolent gar- , but to teach all men and women engaged ying to make the world better, they must esqueamish and fastidious and finical and over-particular in doing the work of the world. The Church of God is dying of fastidiousness. We cry over the sufferings of the world in hundred dollar pocket handkerchiefs, and then put a cent in the poor box. There are many willing to do Christian work among the cleanly and the refined and the elegant and the educated; but excuse them from taking a loaf of bread down a dirty alley, excuse them from teaching a mission-school among the uncombed and the unwashed, excuse them from touching the hand of one whose finger-nails are in mourning for departed soap. Such religious precisionists can toil in atmospheres laden with honeysuckle and rosemary, but not in air float- ing up from the malodorous vats. No, no! excuse them from lodging with Simon, the tanner.

During the last war, there were in Virginia some sixty or seventy wounded soldiers in a barn on the second floor, so near the roof that the heat of the August sun was almost insup- portable. The men were dying from sheer ex- haustion and suffocation. A distinguished member of the Christian Commission said to the nurse who stood there, "wash the faces and feet of these men and it will revive them." "No said the nurse, "I didn't come into the army to wash anybody's feet," "Well," said the distinguished member of the Commission, "bring me water and a towel, I will be very glad to wash their feet." One was the spirit of the devil, the other the spirit of Christ.

But reference to Peter reminds me that we must go to the House-top in Joppa

where he was taught the democracy of religion. That was the queerest thing that ever happened. On our way up to that house-top, we passed an old well where the great stones were worn deep with the ropes of the buckets and it must be a well many centuries old, and, I think, Peter drank out of it. Four or five goat or calf- skins filled with water lay about the yard. We soon got up the steps and on the house-top. It was in such a place in Joppa that Peter, one noon, while he was waiting for dinner, had a hungry fit and fainted away and had a vision or dream or trance. I said to my family and friends on that house-top, "Listen while I read about what happened here." And, opening the Bible, we had the whole story. It seems that Peter on the house-top dreamed that a great blanket was let down out of heaven, and in it were sheep and goats and cattle and mules and pigeons and buzzards and snakes and all manner of creatures that fly the air, or walk the fields, or crawl the earth, and in the dream a voice told him as he was hungry, to eat, and he said, "I cannot eat things unclean." Three times he dreamed it. There was then heard a knocking at the gate of the house on the top of which Peter lay in a trance and three men asked, "Is Peter here?" Peter, while yet wondering what his dream meant, descends the stairs and meets these Strangers at the Gate.

They tell him that a good man by the name of Cornelius, in the city of Cæsarea, has also had a dream and has sent them for Peter and to ask him to come and preach. At that call, Peter left Joppa for Cæsarea. The dream he had just had prepared him to preach, for Peter learned by it to reject no people as unclean and where- as he previously thought he must preach only to the Jews, now he goes to preach to the Gen- tiles who were considered unclean.

Notice how the two dreams meet—Peter's dream on the house-top, Cornelius' dream at Cæsarea. So I have noticed providences meet, distant events meet, dreams meet. Every dream is hunting up some other dream and every event is searching for some other event. In the fifteenth century (1492) the great event was the discovery of America. The art of printing, born in the same century, goes out to meet that discovery and make the new world an intelligent world. The Declaration of Inde- pendence announcing equal rights meets Rob- ert Burns'

"A man's a man for a' that"

The United States was getting too large to be managed by one government, and telegraphy was invented to compress within an hour the whole continent.' Armies in the civil war were to be fitted out with clothing, and the sewing- machine invention came out to make it possible. Immense farming acreage is presented in this country, enough to support millions of our na- tive born, and millions of foreigners; but the old style of plough, and scythe, and reaper, and thresher cannot do the work, and there came steam ploughs, steam harrows, steam reapers, steam rakes, steam threshers, and the work is accomplished. The forests of the earth fail to afford sufficient fuel, and so the coal mines sur- render a sufficiency. The cotton crops were luxuriant, but of comparatively little value, for they could not be managed, and so,

At Just the Right Time,

Hargreaves came along with his invention of the spinning-jenny, and Arkwright with his roller, and Whitney with his cotton-gin. The world, after pottering along with tallow candles and whale oil, was crying for better light and more of it; and the hills of Pennsylvania pour- ed out rivers of oil, and kerosene illumined the nations. But the oil wells began to fail, and then the electric light comes forth to turn night into day. So all events are woven together, and the world is magnificently governed, because it is divinely governed. We criticise things and think the divine machinery is going wrong, and put our fingers amid the wheels only to get them crushed. But, I say, hands off! Things are coming out gloriously. Cornelius may be in Cæsarea, and Peter in Joppa, but their dreams meet. It is one hand that is managing the world, and that is God's hand, and one mind that is planning all things for good, and that is God's mind; and one heart that is filled with love and pardon, and sympathy, and that is God's heart, Have faith in Him. Fret about nothing. Things are not at loose ends. There are no accidents. All will come out right in your history and in the world. As you are wak- ing from one dream up-stairs, an explanatory dream will be knocking at the gate down-stairs.

Standing here in Joppa, I remember that where we this morning disembarked, the prophet Jonah embarked. For the first time in my life I fully under- stand that story. God told Jonah to go to Nineveh, but the prophet declined that call and came here to Joppa. I was for weeks, while in the Holy Land, consulting with tourist com- panies, as to how I could take Nin- evah in my jour- ney. They did not encourage the un- dertaking. It is a most tedious ride to Nineveh and a desert. Now I see an additional reason why Jonah did not want to go to Nin- evah. He not only revolted because of the dis- agreeable message he was called to deliver at Nineveh, but because it was a long way and tough, and bandit-infested, so he came here to Joppa and took ship. But, alas, for the disas- trous voyage! He paid his full fare for the whole voyage, but the ship company did not fill their part of the contract. To this day they have not paid back that passage money. Why people should doubt the story of Jonah and the whale is more of a mystery than the Bible event itself. I do not need the fact that Pliny, the historian, records that the skeleton of a whale forty feet long, and with hide a foot and a half thick, was brought from Joppa to Rome. The event recorded in the book of Jonah has oc- curred a thousand times. The Lord always has a whale outside the harbor for a man who starts in the wrong direction. Recreant Jonah! I do not wonder that even the whale was sick of him! This prophet was put in the Bible, not as an example, but as a warning because the world not only needs light-houses, but buoys, to show where the rocks are. The Bible story of him ends by showing the prophet in a fit of the sulks. He was mad because Nineveh was not destroyed, and then he went out to pout, and sat under a big leaf, using it for shade from the tropical sun, and when a worm disturbed that leaf, and it withered and the sun smote Jonah, he flew into a great rage, and said: "It is better for me to die than to live." A prophet in a rage because he had lost his umbrella! Beware of petulance!

But standing here on the house-top at Joppa, I look off upon the sands near the beach, and I almost expected to find them crimsoned and incarnadined. But no; the rains long ago washed away the last sign of

The Napoleonic Massacre.

Napoleon was marching his army through the coasts. He had here at Joppa four thousand Albanians, who had been surrendered as prisoners of war, and under a promise of protection. What shall he do with them? It will be impossible for him to take them along, and he cannot afford to leave soldiers enough to guard them from escape. It will not be difficult for the man who broke the heart of lovely Josephine and who, when asked if the great losses of life in his battles were not too dear a price to pay for his victories, shrugged his shoulders mirthfully and said, "you must break the eggs if you want to make an omelet." I say, it will not be difficult for him to decide. The prisoners of war, by his order, are taken out on the sands and put to death—one thousand of them, two thousand of them, three thousand of them, four thousand of them, massacred. And the blood pours down into the sea, the red of the one mingling with the blue of the other, and making an awful maroon which neither God nor nations can ever forget. Ye who are fond of vivid contrasts, put the two scenes of Joppa side by side, Dorcas with her needle, and the imperial butcher with his knife.

The Rafts of Cedars.

But standing on this Joppa house-top, I look off on the Mediterranean, and what is that strange sight I see? The waters are black, seemingly for miles. There seems to be a great multitude of logs fastened together. Oh, yes, it is a great raft of timbers. They are cedars of Lebanon which King Hiram is furnishing King Solomon in exchange for 20,000 measures of wheat, 20,000 baths of oil, and 20,000 baths of wine. These cedars have been cut down and trimmed in the mountains of Lebanon by the 70,000 axemen engaged there, and with great withes and iron bolts are fastened together, and they are floating down to Joppa to be taken across the land for Solomon's temple now building at Jerusalem, for we have lost our hold of the nineteenth century and are clear back in the ages. The rafts of cedar are guided into what is called the Moon Pool, an old harbor, south of Joppa now filled with sand and useless. With long pikes the timber is pushed this way and that in the water, then with levers, and many a loud long "Yo, heave!" as the carters get their shoulders under the great weight, the timber is fastened to the wagons and the lowing oxen are yoked to the load, and the procession of teams moves on with crack of whip, and drawled-out words which translated, I suppose, would correspond with the "whoa, haw, gee!" of modern teamsters,

Toward Jerusalem,

which is forty-one miles away, over mountainous distances, which for hundreds of years defied all engineering. And these rough cedars shall become carved pillars, and beautiful altars, and rounded banisters, and traceried panels, and sublime ceiling, and exquisite harps, and kingly chariots. As the wagon train moves out from Joppa over the plain of Sharon toward Jerusalem, I say to myself, what vast numbers of people helped build that temple of Solomon, and what vast numbers of people are now engaged in building the wider, higher, grander temple of righteousness rising in the earth. Our Christian ancestry toiled at it, amid sweat and tears, and hundreds of the generations of the good, and the long train of Christian workers still moves on, and as in the construction of Solomon's temple some hewed with the axe in the far-away Lebanon, and some drove a wedge, and some twisted a wither, and some trod the wet and slippery rafts on the sea, and some yoked the ox, and some pulled at the load, and some shoved the plane, and some fitted the joints, and some heaved up the rafters, but all helped build the temple, though some of these never saw it, so now let us all put our hands, and our shoulders, and our hearts to the work of

of righteousness, which is to fill the earth; and one will bind a wound, and another will wipe away a tear, and another will teach a class, and another will speak the encouraging word, and all of us will be ready to pull and lift, and in some way help on the work until the millennial morn shall gild the pinnacles of that finished temple, and at its shining gates, the world shall put down its last burden, and in its lavers wash off its last stain, and at its altars the last wanderer shall kneel. At the dedication of that temple, all the armies of earth and heaven will "shoulder arms," and "present arms," and "ground arms," for "behold! a greater than Solomon is here."

But my first day in the Holy Land is ended. The sun is already closing his eye for the night. I stand on the balcony of a hotel, which was brought to Joppa in pieces from the state of Maine by some fanatics who came here expecting to see Christ reappear in Palestine. My room here was once occupied by that Christian hero of the centuries—English, Chinese, Egyptian, world wide General Gordon, a man mighty for God as well as for the world's pacification. Although the first of December and winter, the air is full of fragrance from gardens all a-bloom and under my window are acacia and tamarisk and mulberry and century plants and orange groves and oleander. From the drowsiness of the air and the fatigues of the day I feel sleepy. Good night! To-morrow we start for Jerusalem.

THE ANCIENT BRIDGE AT PRAGUE.

AMONG the details of the havoc of the floods in Bohemia, as reported by cable, is one item that will cause the regret of every American who has visited that locality. It is the statement that the beautiful bridge called the Karlsbrücke has been so seriously damaged that it is doubtful whether it can be repaired. The bridge is over five hundred years old. Its construction was commenced in 1358, by King IV. of Bohemia, and was completed by King Ladislaus II. It was 1,800 feet long, which is two hundred and five feet longer than the Brooklyn Bridge. It consisted of sixteen arches, each arch being adorned, on both sides with statues of saints, and groups of sculpture. At each end was an imposing gate-tower. It connected the old town of Prague with the suburb of Kleinseite, or little Prague, where the Government offices are situated. The ancient structure bore the unusual pressure from the overflow of the river Moldau, and its tributaries, until the third day of the flood. Then its central arch fell, and the next day, two other arches were swept away.

In the city, too, there was widespread desolation. 40,000 persons were driven from their homes, and vast quantities of furniture, pictures, and merchandise were destroyed. As their necessities were urgent, the Austrian Government sent military bakers to the city, who distributed daily, 6,000 loaves of bread, beside sending quantities of tinned meat and other provisions.

Happily the inundation passed away almost as quickly as it came. The chief sufferers were private citizens. With the single exception of the bridge, no injury was done to the historic edifices which have made the city of Prague famous to the world over. Among these are the University, founded by Charles IV., in 1348, the ancient palace with 150 quaint and beautiful rooms; the Cathedral, fine old Gothic structure; the Themkirche, which stands on the spot where the martyr Huss used to preach. These historic edifices were happily spared as they have been during the vicissitudes of more than 500 years, including the sieges and bombardments which the city has undergone.

IN THE INTEREST OF PEACE.

If the remarkable invention said to have been made by Dr. Jeunemann, of Vienna, should prove to be true the advocates of Universal Peace will have reason for congratulation. The Austrian chemist has discovered a fluid which will minimize the horrors of war. Loaded in shell, it can be readily discharged and exploded on encountering the slightest obstacle to progress. Its effect is to render unconscious those who inhale its penetrating odor.

THE DEVASTATION OF SALONICA.

THE city of Salonica, a picture of which, reproduced from a recent photograph, is here given, has been the scene of a terrible conflagration. The cable states that over twelve hundred houses have been destroyed, and many lives have been sacrificed. The fire started in the Jewish quarter, where the houses were chiefly of wood, and, as a high wind was blowing, and there was a scarcity of water, it spread rapidly from house to house until whole streets were blazing. The greatest efforts were made to prevent it reaching the celebrated mosque of Sophia, but they were fruitless. That building, the hospital, and the English and Greek consulates were all consumed before the fire was checked. It is estimated that the value of the property destroyed does not fall short of a million dollars.

Salonica is an important seaport of Roumania having considerable trade and manufactures. Extensive cotton-spinning factories have recently been erected there and its large flour mills have long been celebrated throughout Turkey. It is protected by a high wall five miles in length, beginning at the sea coast and terminating at the famous fortress of the Seven Towers, which crowns the hill on the side of which the city is built. Its principal modern buildings, such as shipping offices, hotels and the cotton mills before mentioned, are built on the Quay which is the fashionable promenade of the city. Seen from the sea, it is a place of wondrous beauty. The houses and mosques rise, tier above tier, up the side of the hill; they are chiefly white, embowered in trailing plants, while above, is the castle of the Seven Towers, and in the background the purple range of the Lamerina Mountains.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Six Million Letters were Sent to the Dead Letter Office in Washington during the past year. Of these, nearly half a million were misdirected or only partially addressed. Those on which there was no address at all, the envelopes lying entirely blank, numbered over twenty-five thousand. Twenty-eight thousand letters and packages contained money amounting to $48,000, and twenty-seven thousand contained drafts and checks, notes and commercial paper, worth the aggregate, $1,471,871. Doubtless, the readers of these letters have wondered that they were not answered and perhaps blamed the correspondents for negligence, while the truth was really their own and was caused by a lack of mind when they were writing. Probably if we knew the whole truth about those unanswered prayers, of which some people complain, the explanation would be as simple, and perhaps often of the same character. In our country especially, there is one fruitful cause of prayers being unanswered; for the waverer, who is a man of weak faith, or no faith, represents a numerous class, and we are expressly warned that it is useless for that man to think he can receive anything of the Lord. (James 1: 6, 7.)

A Little German Orphan was in a Friendless condition in New York on September 14. A few days ago, both his parents died at Kowna, Germany. His uncle took charge of him, but he pined for Victor, his only brother, who had come to America six years ago. Though only five years old, he determined to come here to seek his brother. He had few opportunities of earning money, but he made the most of those he had. His savings were carefully hoarded, and a month ago he found he had sufficient to buy a steerage ticket to New York. He dare not tell his uncle lest he should be prevented making the journey. Stealing down the pier, he got on board the Augusta Victor, which arrived on September 12. He had no money when he landed, and not the remotest idea in what part of the country his brother lived. When asked how he dare set out alone on such a journey, he quietly said, he "thought I would take care of a poor orphan boy." He was detained at the barge-office, the officials not knowing what to do with him, and there being no clue to his brother's residence. On Sept. 14 he was sitting somewhat disconsolately by the grating, looking at the throng, when suddenly he started up, shouting "Victor! mein Victor!" A young man went up to the grating, and to his amazement saw his little brother. The young man said that in all the six years he had been in New York, he had never before visited the barge office. He had come that day to visit a friend who had just arrived from England, and was leaving that morning for Philadelphia. The little boy's faith in God's protecting care is confirmed. We may hope that it will not be shaken in the journey of life, and that he may find Him who is called our Elder Brother, who has gone before to the better country to prepare a place for them who trust in Him. (John 14: 2.)

A Telegraph Lineman had a Narrow Escape from death in New York, on Sept. 23. He was repairing telephone wires on a pole, in First Avenue, when he grasped a dead wire. To his amazement, he found that the wire, so far from being dead, was able to give a very potent shock. It knocked him from the pole, and he would have been killed, had he not fallen upon the top of a wagon that was passing, and so his fall was broken. As it was, his collar bone was fractured, and he suffered severe internal injury. It is evidently unsafe to reckon upon any wire being dead, while it hangs among other wires on the poles; as at some point, it may be in contact with live wires, and collect electricity from them. Many a spiritual fall has come from a similar lack of caution. An evil habit or some besetting sin, which has been so long repressed that it is thought to be dead, reasserts its power in a moment of unwatchfulness, and the victim has a humiliating fall. (1. Cor. 10: 12.)

A Quaint Marriage Certificate was Recently shown to a traveller in South Dakota. It was filled in by a rural judge who officiated at the ceremony. It stated that the parties "were lawfully united in the holy bonds of matrimony in town 124, north of range 63 west, near the north-west corner of said town and on the south side of Elm Creek, it being bank full of water." It appears that the wedding party were on their way to the judge's office to be married, when they were stopped by finding the creek so swollen by the rains that no passage could be made that day. Several persons were on the opposite bank and, after some shouting, the situation was explained to them and one of them was persuaded to go for the judge. That functionary soon appeared and declared himself ready to proceed with the ceremony. The bridal party was ranged on the bank and the usual questions were shouted out by the judge on one side the creek, and the responses loudly given from the other side. At the conclusion, the judge pronounced the marriage perfectly valid and he filled out the certificate above quoted and mailed it to them. The couple are fond of telling the story as being unique in the annals of marriage. It may be hoped that its peculiar circumstances will be typical of that more solemn time when they come to the stream that will dissolve their marriage. That, too, though they must cross it, need be no end to their happiness if they have made their peace with God through Christ, but will be the opening to them of new and greater happiness on the other side. (Isa. 43: 2.)

A Stolen Daughter's Restoration to her Father after fourteen years absence is reported in the Globe of St. Paul, Minn. It states that in 1876, a veteran of the war, now in that city, was living in Missouri with his family. He had the misfortune to lose his little daughter, then a child five years old. She was a beautiful girl with long golden hair, and deep blue eyes. The father had been badly wounded in the war, and was not able to go far in search of her, but he spent a great part of his pension in advertising, and in paying other people to follow any clue he was able to obtain. His friends have long regarded his quest as hopeless, and have ridiculed the persistence with which during these fourteen years he had continued advertising, and inquiring for his beloved child. A few weeks ago he learned that just such a girl as his daughter might have become, had been seen on the Crow Creek reservation in Texas. He became quite excited about it but could find no means of communicating with her. By a strange coincidence, however, the girl saw about the same time in a Texas journal some reference to her father, in connection with an increase of pension, with the statement of his address. She immediately wrote to him and enclosed a pair of antique ear-rings which she had in her ears when she was stolen, and had preserved. That token was sufficient. The old man recognized them at once and wrote to her to come to him. It would have been grievously unnatural had she refused, or postponed her return; yet the invitations that God is sending out by His servants to His wandering children whom He has sought these many years too often fall on deaf ears. (Matt. 22: 5.)

A Lady Sacrificed her Life in Saving her Dog at Grand View, N. J., on Sept. 24. In the middle of the forenoon she went up the hill to the track of the Northern New Jersey Railroad, taking two dogs with her. She took a course down the track just above a curve in the road, when she heard a freight train approaching. The engineer gave the usual whistle of warning, and the woman stepped quickly to the side of the road, taking her dogs with her. Just before the engine reached her, however, one of the dogs darted back on the track. The lady, to save her pet from the impending death, forgot her own danger and reached forward for the animal. She pulled the dog from the track, and as she turned, the engine struck her in the side, crushing her body terribly and throwing her some distance down an embankment. She died a short time afterward. It was an act of thoughtlessness; for though she may have been fond of her pet, she was little likely to have intentionally risked her life to save it. There is little doubt, however, that some are guilty of similar foolishness in a still more serious matter. They are losing their souls to save a fortune, and there is no greater folly than that. (Mark 8: 36.)

The Disclosure of a Marriage has Caused an angry dispute at a fashionable watering-place. Early this year a wealthy young widower made the acquaintance in New York of an attractive young lady of a well known family. They were seen together in public so frequently that it was inferred that they were engaged to be married. The relatives of both parties, however, strenuously denied the existence of an engagement and declared that, as both families were irrevocably opposed the match, no engagement would be made. During the summer the rumor was revived as the two were in company at the summer resorts. It was again denied, but a few days ago a daily journal contradicted the denial, and added that the parties were actually married. Then the lady's friends were silent, but the gentleman and his friends insisted that the statement was false. They were confronted by a record of the marriage in the Bureau of Vital Statistics, the marriage having been solemnized by a New York clergyman in April last. A reporter had seen it while searching the records in the Bureau for another entry. The gentleman now appears to have involved himself in a double trouble. His own family are exasperated with him for marrying, and his wife, and her family are indignant with him for repudiating the marriage. The issue, whatever it may be it cannot be otherwise than painful; for the wife is never likely to forget or forgive the humiliation he has inflicted on her. Unhappily the same duplicity has not been unknown to the Church of Christ. Some who are anxious "to make the best of both worlds" hesitate to acknowledge Him before men. Of all such men Christ said that He would be ashamed at His coming. (Luke 9: 26.)

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

S. S. LESSON BY MRS. M. BAXTER FOR OCT. 12.
LUKE 22 : 7-20; GOLDEN TEXT, I. Cor. 11 : 26.

The Previous Anointing—A Showing Forth of Christ's Death—The Great Passover—The Basis of Christ's Confidence in His Disciples—The Elements Typical—The Wheat Ground in the Mill—The Wine From Crushed Grapes—Dependence and Inter-Dependence.

WHEN only two days before He suffered, Mary Magdalene anointed Jesus for His burial, she was showing forth His death. She was true to the teaching and to the spirit of her Lord, although neither the world, nor the disciples understood her. The world cast out her Lord as an impostor and a criminal, the disciples entertained to the very last, hopes of earthly power and glory in following Him; but the anointing of Mary was a kind of priestly laying of the hand of the sinner upon the scape-goat in token of identity. Mary claimed the death of Jesus for every sinner, and so showed forth His death. She took the side of Christ, and took it alone, hindered neither by the world nor the Church. And, unless in this spirit we partake of the Lord's Supper, it must be a mere form to us, even if we are not like Judas, who went out from the Passover feast to betray his Lord for the sake of a mean, earthly advantage.

"Then came the day of unleavened bread when the passover must be killed." Yes; and the Son of Man many things, and be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed (Mark 8 : 31), and none knew as He Himself did, the dire necessity of His suffering. In almost every Jewish house at that season, the Passover lamb would be slain, and preparations were on foot everywhere. But "the lamb slain from the foundation of the world" in the purpose of God, was about to be immolated, and none except Mary Magdalene had understood the fact. How real the type was to Jesus no other heart can know. He sent two of His disciples to make ready, and gave them the most detailed instructions as to the house, the room, etc., and the lamb was slain and roasted. But meanwhile the great Passover of passovers was preparing in that heart and will which said, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God."

When the hour was come, He sat down, and the twelve apostles with Him, and He said unto them, "with desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God." They sat within the blood-sprinkled doors, in remembrance of that night in Egypt when the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, and the first-born of Israel spared. "And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are, and when I see the blood,

I Will Pass Over

you, the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt." (Ex. 12 : 13.) How little the disciples understood that before twenty-four hours had elapsed, the blood of their beloved Lord and Teacher would be shed to take away their sin, not in type but in reality; to shelter them from the destroyer, not in type but in reality; that instead of such a kingdom as is known in the world, being set up, the very King of the Kingdom of God must be also the sacrifice which fulfils the Passover feast. To them all was commemorative, to Him it was anticipative; He was going through beforehand all that would so soon come to pass. In the Passover feast the slain lamb was to be eaten by those who were sheltered by the blood. It was the last food eaten in Egypt, and was to be the strength of God's people in their going out from their bondage. They were to eat of it with loins girded, with feet shod, with staves in their hands, and they must eat it in haste, ready at a moment's notice, for their call out of Egypt. It was a sacrificed life which should sustain theirs. All this was typical of Christ, the Redeemer and the life of His people.

And as they were eating, Jesus, who always made use of present and visible things to convey to His disciples things unseen and eternal, "took the cup and gave thanks, and said, take this and divide it among yourselves."

Did He Know

that at that very hour their hearts were full of the unworthy, and unheavenly strife about which of them should be the greatest? Yes, He knew it all, He "needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man." (John 2 : 25.) But Jesus reckoned not according to what those disciples were in themselves, but according to what they might become when He had passed through death for them, and made a way for their old man, with all its strife and bitterness, pride and envying, hatred and malice, and all uncharitableness, to be crucified with Him; and for His life, which "suffereth long, and is kind;" which "envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up," etc., (1. Cor. 13 : 4), to replace theirs. "For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine until the Kingdom of God shall come." "Thy Kingdom come" we pray again and again; it is the Kingdom of a poured out life for which we are praying. As the juice was pressed from the grapes to make that wine, so the Christ life in us comes out chiefly in times of suffering and of pressure. It is in the failure of the human that the divine becomes manifest. Jesus was made "perfect through sufferings," and the disciple can be perfected in no other way. (Luke 6 : 40.)

"And he took bread." Every particle of that bread had been severed by the grinding of the mill-stone; it was no longer grain in a state of nature, but bread, a fit type of Himself "as the bread of life." He gave thanks and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, "This is my body which is given for you (broken for you, 1. Cor. 11 : 24), this do in remembrance of me." "Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, 'This cup is the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you.' The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For we, being many are one bread (or loaf) and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread."

The Lord's Supper is meant to be the closest bond of unity which can be. Just as a piece broken from a loaf makes a gap, an unevenness, so that it is no longer entire, just as a member separated from the human body leaves the remainder maimed, so is it with the body of Christ.

The Least Feeling of Disunion

in the heart with any Christian hinders the communion of the body or of the blood of Christ. Let none come to the Lord's table with a sting in his heart, his very presence there, while he has the slightest feeling against a brother, is a lie against the unity of the body. The blood of Christ cannot circulate in his body when the spirit of Christ is wanting, the mill-stone and the wine-fat have not done their work, and the wild grapes and the unbroken corn exist, instead of the broken and poured out life which is conformed to the image of God's Son. We cannot live our own life and Christ's life, too, we cannot have both the grapes and the wine, both the grain and the bread, both self and Christ; the one must die for the life of the other to be manifested. If the Lord's Supper means anything at all, it means that our own life is to be sacrificed, that all that makes up our life is to be laid down and made subject to Christ and to our brethren. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because He laid down His life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." (1. John 3 : 16.)

The Apostle Paul gives a solemn warning: "Whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." (1. Cor. 11 : 27.) Surely this is the same sin as crucifying to themselves the Son of God afresh, and putting Him to an open shame. (Heb. 6 : 6.) How can we show forth, and not simply tell forth, Lord's death, except we die to ourselves as died to Himself? How can an unsubdued show forth a subdued will? Let us beware! we approach the sanctuary of our God in spirit of self and of the world. The Lord's Supper proclaims that human life, and hope and glory all are broken, and poured out on the cross of Christ, and that divine life and divine nature in the person of Christ supersede old life and nourish the new. "Whoso eat my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life . . . dwelleth in me and I in him." (John 54-56.) The Lord's supper gives the life human pride and independence, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father so he that eateth me, even

He Shall Live by Me."

(John 6 : 57.) Jesus was absolutely dependent upon His Father; no babe ever depended more on the mother than did Jesus in His earthly life on His Father. Thought, word, deed, all flowed into His human life from above, and the Lord's Supper is the type to us of this living by Father and living by the Son which is ours as it was Christ's. And just as surely as we recognize our dependence upon the life of Christ in us which is shown forth in the Lord's Supper, so also we learn our interdependence one upon the other in the Church of Christ. God does not mean that we shall live as in but as a body. "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body," how little is the body of Christ discerned, even among its members. Personal salvation, personal sanctification, personal usefulness, personal glory—these are the things which occupy the hearts of believers. But the body, what is that? How few regulate, or allow God to regulate their life with a view to the welfare of the body of Christ! Yet the Church of Christ is born in an atmosphere in which no man is without aught of the things which he possesses was his own; but "they had all things common." (Acts 4 : 32.)

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Horace Greeley's Early Trial.*

IT was a critical moment in his life when weary and disheartened and disgusted with New York, he came home to his lodging Saturday evening, resolved to shake the dust from his feet on Monday morning before his last penny should be gone, and try at the inland towns. But the good hand of Providence was about the lad, even in that unbath-like habitat (his lodgings) from which he escaped twice that day to attend church. It happened that among the young Irishmen who resorted to McGolrick's, and who all took characteristic interest in the friendless youth was one who gave him the address of a place where he knew that printers were wanted. Horace was on the ground as early as half-past five on Monday morning, and sat waiting on the stoop for nearly an hour and a half before the doors were opened. One of the journeying printers, a Vermonter, arrived a few minutes before the opening, and sitting down beside the rustic youth, entered into conversation with him. He became greatly interested in his low-Yankee, and accompanied him to the office and succeeded in persuading the foreman to give him a trial.

Even then he would not have succeeded if there had not been a job on hand which no other printer in the city would accept. This was to set up what he describes as a "very small (320) New Testament in double columns of small type, each column barely twelve ems wide, with a centre column of notes in pearl, only four ems wide; the text thickly studded with references by Greek and superior letters, to the new which of course were preceded and discriminated by corresponding indices, with prefatory and supplementary remarks on each book, set in pearl and only paid for as agate." By diligent type-sticking for twelve or fourteen hours a day, he was able for two or three weeks scarcely to make his board, and at his best to earn only five or six dollars a week. He had, however, the advantage of retaining the job to the end.

His Handwriting.

Every one has heard of Horace Greeley's extraordinary handwriting, which required special and expert printers to set up. The present winter, when a youth, happened to be seated at a table in the Union League Club, one evening, which Horace Greeley was writing an editorial. A foolscap page after page was dashed off, they fell directly under my eye, and I took the liberty of studying the chirography, a great scrawl and scrawl of hieroglyphs, till my heart bled for the poor printer who should have to set it up under gas-light before morning.

A funny story is told of a reply which he made to a Western lecture committee, declining their invitation on the ground that he would be fifty years old on the next February 3d. The reply came that his penmanship had taken them more time to decipher; but they had succeeded, and the time, "February 3d." and terms, "sixty dollars" were entirely satisfactory. They also took his statement that he "must decline to lecture henceforth, except in this immediate vicinity, if at all" answering, "As you suggest, you may be able to get you other engagements this immediate vicinity."

Another illustration is given of his writing a letter to an employee discharging him for gross neglect of duty. After a number of years of service in California, the man returned and, meeting Mr. Greeley, was asked by him how he had gotten along. "Let me see," he continued, "didn't I get mad at you and send you off?" "Oh, yes, you wrote me a letter telling me to get out. Taking the letter with me, I found it nobody could read it; so I gave it my own interpretation as a letter of recommendation, and I got several first-rate situations by it, and I am really very much obliged to you."

Mr. Greeley's Dress.

In village life in Vermont, his wardrobe in summer consisted of a shirt and trousers, the former open in front and with tucked-up sleeves, and the latter very short. In walking the streets he added a straw hat and at the debating society put on a jacket. When he came to New York, we are told that men stared at him in the streets, for he still wore the above dress, or rather want of dress, until the November cold compelled him to turn over a new leaf. One evening he appeared in the printing office so metamorphosed, that his companions did not at first recognize him. They saw before them a gentleman dressed in a suit of faded broadcloth, and a shabby, over-brushed beaver hat, and beneath which depended long and snowy locks; the garments were fashionably cut; the hat was in the style of a swallow's tail; the locks were precisely that of an old gentleman who I have seen better days. It was a second-hand hat, worn thin, washed in blackened water and dyed smooth, bought for five dollars of a Gotham Street Jew. Horace seemed really to have vain of his new apparel.

His Tenderness.

It is into his home life that we must peep in order to fully appreciate the tender side of Horace Greeley's nature. With delicacy he lifts the little corner of his heart's tenderest and saddest experiences in the chapter of his recollections which he entitles "My Dead." There is no more elegiac prose in our language than the words with which he tells the story of the death of five of his children out of seven, especially of the pride and darling "Pickie," who died in his twentieth year. Pickie was thoroughly human, though full of wise and deep sayings. He must have been a boy of striking loveliness as attested this tribute: "I looked in vain through Italian galleries two years after he was taken from us for any full parallel to his dazzling beauty—a beauty not physical merely, but visibly radiating from the soul. His hair was of the finest and richest gold; the sunshine of picture never glorified its equal. He died of cholera in the summer of 1849, being ill only from one to five o'clock of one of the hottest, and quite the longest day I have ever known." How many, alas! will understand the experience with which the father, after nearly twenty years, closes his narrative: "When at length the struggle closed with his last breath, and even his mother was convinced that his eyes would never again open on the scenes of this world, I knew that the summer of my life was over, that the chill breath of its autumn was at hand, and that my future course must be along the down hill of life."

THE MILLENNIUM.

Seen in Symbolical Vision—Christ to be Seen by All the World—His Angelic Attendants—The Saints to Share in the Government—A Time of Social Felicity—Wrongs Redressed—Sects Abolished—Universal Peace.

BY REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL. B.

THE Transfiguration has been regarded as symbolical of the Second Advent. Christ appeared in glory attended by Moses and Elijah, representing the glorified saints, who will accompany their Lord in the clouds of heaven. The three disciples represented the Church on earth meeting the Lord in the air, and sharing His triumph with the risen saints. Peter, James, and John did see in a vision the coming of the kingdom.

St. Peter refers to this in his Second Epistle: "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty." This was confirmed by "the more sure word of prophecy," and pointed forward to the time when the "day" should "dawn;" "the day of the Lord" described in the third chapter, "when the heavens shall pass away with a great noise;" to the coming of which day believers shall be "looking for and hasting," in hope of "the new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Although it is not essential to this theory that there should be any vision of the Lord at one time, or within the course of one day, by all mankind at once; yet many persons do thus interpret the prediction, "Every eye shall see Him." All will know friends and foes, that the King has come to perfect His kingdom, gladden His loyal subjects, and execute judgment on hardened rebels.

Such a vision of Christ has been objected to on the ground of physical impossibility. But it has been suggested in reply that as the sun is seen every twenty-four hours by all the inhabitants of the earth, the vision of Christ as He approaches to establish His kingdom may be, in some way, obvious to all. "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Then His Advent having been witnessed, His subsequent appearances in all parts of the world might be "at sundry times and in divers manners," analogous to the appearances of His risen body to the disciples prior to His ascension.

The King will be

Attended by Angelic Hosts

as His ministers. "The Son of Man will come in His glory with all the holy angels with Him." (Matt. 25: 31.) The souls of the martyrs and of those who "had not worshipped the beast, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands," shall "live and reign with Christ a thousand years. This is the first resurrection." (Rev. 20: 4, 5.) They, as "priests of God and of Christ," together with the angels of light, will drive away the spirits of darkness who have so long influenced men for evil; "that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan," will be "bound a thousand years" (Rev. 20: 2); and hardened rebels, still refusing to repent, will be judged and sent to their own place. (Rev. 20: 15.)

As during the Theocracy, Jehovah was visibly present in the temple by cloud and Shekinah, so

Christ Will be Present in Jerusalem;

not necessarily in the Syrian city, but in His Church; not subject to material laws, but as His resurrection-body appeared to the disciples unexpectedly in various places, so His whole Church shall know that He dwells among them. Theoretic infidelity will no longer be possible. The only question will be, not "Is Christ the King?" but, "Shall I submit to His rule?" The Jews will recognize their long-rejected King, who will now "reign on the throne of His father David." Their conversion will bring in the fulness of the Gentiles. Antichrist will be dethroned and the spell of the false prophet broken. All the people who sit in darkness will see the great light. The Church, animated by the presence of the King, and filled with the Spirit, will then literally "go unto all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," until "they shall not teach every man his neighbor, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know Him, from the least unto the greatest." (Heb. 8: 11.)

Whatever views may be entertained respecting the method of its development, what Christian does not long for such a millennium of blessedness to dawn on this darkened and desolated world! O for the time when the Right shall reign, and not mere Might! when distinctions of station, endowment, nationality, shall not be the destruction of brotherhood; when men shall everywhere show that they are children of one Father; trusting, not fearing one another, and each seeking his own good only in alliance with that of his neighbor; when fortresses and fleets shall no longer frown defiance; when boundaries of mountains, rivers and oceans shall no longer separate the human family into antagonistic rivalries; when swords shall indeed "be turned into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks;" when thrones shall never be symbols of pride, objects of fear and prizes of ambition; when laws and rulers shall no more be needed to resist violence or punish wrong, but only to guide and assist in common

Action For the Common Weal.

O for the time when holy love shall no longer be debased to brutish lust, nor strength of body or brain be used to injure or distress; when Science shall pour fresh light on Religion, and every new discovery evoke new hallelujahs to the Creator; when the pen and the press shall never be employed to assail the truth of God or corrupt the minds of men; when speech shall never utter what is false, impure, or unkind; when music shall never lend its charms to licentiousness, or stir the passions of wars, and painting and sculpture shall portray only what is beautiful and pure; when commerce in all its transactions shall be honest and beneficent; when labor shall never be oppressive and irksome, but give joy to the producer as well as to the purchaser; when amusement shall be only an exchange of pleasure, recreating for fresh toil, and never stooping to give delight by stimulants that enervate the body or corrupt the mind.

O for the time when in the Church there shall be no more sectarian rivalries, bitter controversies, worldly expedients, mammon-worship, ambitions, intrigues, popularity-courting, secret envyings, personal jealousies; when, though all may never think and worship exactly alike, varieties of method shall only the more illustrate unity and stimulate love; when all will rejoice in each other's fellowship, promote one another's usefulness, and fulfill the Saviour's prayer "that they may be one, even as We are one; I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." (John 17: 22, 23.)

Then at length shall the glowing prophecy of Isaiah become an accomplished fact: "the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Isa. 11: 1, 9.)

DOWN THE STREET.

THE streets never seemed so wonderful to us as they did this afternoon when traversing one of the principal arteries of the city; we could not help comparing it to the great highway of human life. Here are two tides setting in, one going down, the other coming up—immortal souls going either way—those going up and those going down equally earnest, equally determined in some kind of pursuit. Where will the majority of these people find a terminus? We looked into the countenances of some and saw they looked like the children of the king. There was something in their faces that spoke of the exhilaration of great inward hope, and a bright prospect of something that was to come. We know not how long the journey may be, what battles they may have to fight, what burdens they may have to carry, or what fire they may have to wade, still we are very certain that, being in this procession of immortal life, all shall be well with them forever.

But then we saw in the countenance of others a hopelessness, a feeling of disgust with the world—nothing coming in to make up that peace and joy which every man ought to have. In which of these processions are we marching?

But as we were strolling along this afternoon, we noticed a great difference in the velocity or tardiness with which people walked. Some went with great haste. They seemed to be intent upon something of very great importance. Others sauntered lazily along as though they were not very anxious to get to any special point. And we said, so it is on this great highway of human life. Some are going at the top of their speed, and some are going lazily along, not especially anxious to reach any point of destination. It certainly is so with those who are in the procession toward the heavenly land. Some go with great ease and with very leisurely step, hardly able in the Christian life to put one foot before the other. Indeed, sometimes they come to a dead halt, and it seems as if they never would start again. The world holds them fast, and all the temptations that Satan can bring to their souls are clogging their feet and intercepting their path heavenward. While on the other hand, there are those who are running a race, gaining more speed day by day. They have no patience with laggards and drones. They are gaining rapidly on other Christians, passing them in the race, and winning at last the crown which God gives to successful contestants.

We noticed, also, to-day that while people seemed to be going down and up the street as though they had no intention of turning aside, at the end of each block there would be a delegation from the main street going off into the cross streets, some to the right and some to the left; and we said: Just so on this great highway of human life. While a great many march on in the procession toward heaven, and you think they are going to get on, lo! they turn aside. They disappoint all those who have been watching their progress, and though they promised so well, they took a cross street. They turned off.

We noticed, also, that those who kept along the straight street after awhile suddenly disappeared from the great procession. We asked ourselves: Where did they go to? Some vanished into homes of brightness and good cheer; others, no doubt, into residences cramped, vicious, and repulsive. So with these processions on the great road of earthly existence. We watch, and, lo! they are gone. A gate with panels of precious stone flashes open and shut, and they disappear. We hear the music inside, and the stroke of the festal feet. We look in through the curtains, and see that the jubilee has begun. At one end our street opens on a wealthy suburb, at the other it falls into a pass narrow and unclean. So this road of life ends into striking contrast of splendor or wretchedness. Which way are we walking?

ATTENTION! THE PEWS!

THE laity are saying many true things in regard to the arousal of ministers. They want more animation, more snap, more directness, and more fire. This demand on the part of the pews has had its good effect, and dry bones have got up and shaken themselves, and worn-out manuscript sermons, after having been preached ten or twenty times, have been thrown into the stove, or put on a back shelf as fossiliferous specimens to be examined by the following generations. Now, as the pews have been so successful in waking up the pulpit, and as "turn about is fair play," it is time for the pulpit to wake up the pews. We suspect that much of the former dulness of the pulpit was inherited from the pew. We know not why a religious audience should not look as bright as any other audience, but how often it is that people who, at a concert or lecture, look animated, seem to feel it their duty as soon as they come into a devotional assembly to look stupid. Some hearers shut their eyes, and so extinguish, as far as the preacher is concerned, the chief light of their face. What is the matter with your eyes? Is it emotion? Oh, no! It is easily seen when that is the reason. You are probably trying to review your accounts at the store, or calculating the prospects for the opening business season. Open your eyes and look the preacher in the face. Your manner is a wet blanket on the preacher's enthusiasm. Others listen with an inanimate look. You are a soporific in the house of God. If a speaker begin a sentence with power, and happen to put your face about the middle comma, he will let the last half of the sentence drop to imbecility. Have you ever seen a preacher in the middle of his sermon get bothered and subside from vigour into inanity? He saw two or three intelligent men looking as indifferent as statues. The sun rose clear, but a fog went up over your countenance and beclouded it. It is astonishing how much the manner of listening has to do with the force of preaching. We take the contract of rousing the dullest minister that ever addressed an audience, if you give us twenty alert and wide-awake hearers placed at proper distances from the pulpit, that in whatever direction the preacher looks, he shall by clash of eyes strike fire.

How much spirit would you have in conversation if in your parlor your guests should mean themselves as in church, one of your friends in the arm-chair closing his eyes, another lying back on the sofa as if he were asleep, another putting his head down on the back of the chair in front of him? You would talk and wish they would take their stupa out of your parlor, and go home. But the indolent and unconcerned manner which you will not endure from your friends, you every day inflict on your pastor. Wake up, or you will be awake, as you probably are, do not let your manner belie your real condition.

There are some churches in which the rousable look is so chronic, so hereditary, so perpetual that we never want to preach there. If a Methodist should cry out in that assembly, "Amen" or an "Hallelujah," it would create a panic in the audience and make the reading of the riot act appropriate. The church is a pond frozen over, smooth, and fit for skating. But no warm tides of life meeting of preacher's earnest eye with hearer's intent stare. Every Sunday humdrum, an act of poppy, and ecclesiastical morphine.

Come! come! church pew, you must share with the pulpit in the responsibility of a religious service. We will try to fire up at one end of the column, but you must fire up at the other end of the column. We will divide the blame, then share in the improvement. We will dig and shovel in the coal, but you must kindle the kindling-wood, and open the dam. An intent pew will make a resounding pulpit.

WE congratulate the denominations that seem to be less spirit of fight than formerly. A contest in Church courts is always a danger to religion, whichever way it turns. Ministers like other men, will lose their patience, and an angry theologian is not an edifying speaker. Lawyers quarrel in the court-room and then sit out and dine together in affability, but ministers quarrel they never make up. They may shake hands and unctuously call each other "brother," but at the first occasion of difference the old grudge breaks out. Let all theological antagonists seek especial grace when they enter a Church trial, else the world, the flesh and the devil will gain all the advantage as they generally do in a contest of that kind. Bitter personality must not by any means be mistaken for championship for the truth. The misfortune in all denominations is, the clergy men who have the smallest modicum of religion have the largest spirit of fight.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Porfirio Diaz, of Mexico, had a narrow escape from death at the hands of assassins on the 11th inst. During the national celebration at the City of Mexico, as Diaz and his staff stepped on the piazza to witness the fireworks, a volley of bullets rained about his ears, and three bullets whizzed over his head, splintering the wood-work above. He treated to his own, followed by the entire staff. It was afterward discovered that forty men were concerned in the plot to kill him. Fifteen arrests have been made on suspicion. Diaz's recent alliance with the Clericals is said to have offended the Liberal party, to whom he owed his election, and this is supposed to have inspired the attempt on his life. Diaz is now fifty-five years old, and has been three times President of Mexico.

Norway's Polar Expedition, now fitting up at Stockholm, has received the strongest endorsement from Baron Nordenskjöld, who believes that all the conditions are favorable for a dash to the North Pole. The last of the journey, he says, must be made by land, and if the dash be made quickly by a well-equipped party, he believes that it will be successful. Dr. Frithjof Nansen, the commander, is distinguished as a naturalist and traveller, and is a man of great length and daring. He is in his thirtieth year, and has already made several Arctic voyages, the latest being in 1888, in the whaling ship FJason, to East Greenland. Nansen believes that a comparatively fertile interior may be discovered at the pole, within the great barriers, and possibly a new race of beings. The expedition will not be ready to start before next Spring.

Aspinwall was Visited by a Terrible Conflagration on the night of September 22nd. Break-out at midnight, the flames destroyed railroad offices, public buildings, docks, and several hundred business and private buildings. The centre of the city was swept clean. During the night, a large crowd of roughs, bent on looting burning buildings, came into collision with the troops, and it was only after the latter had opened fire with ball cartridge, killing several, that the rioters dispersed. The fire caused a great scarcity of food in the city.

One of the Famous Soldiers of the Civil War, General Duryea, the commander of the well-known Duryea's Zouaves, died on the 27th, in New York of paralysis. Five days after the call for troops, he organized the Zouaves, and marched down Broadway at the head of a band of musketeers. At the close of the war, he was made a brigadier-general. He was seventy-two years old, and a man of exemplary Christian character, beloved by a large circle of friends in many States.

Penny Postage is the Scheme which J. Henniker Heaton, a member of the British House of Commons, now visiting in this country, is endeavoring to establish. Mr. Heaton feels confident of being able to do for the penny what Sir Rowland Hill, the father of penny postage, did for the land. Ten times as much traffic now passes between this country and Great Britain, as was the case ten years ago, he says, and the mail matter has trebled in three years. Mr. Heaton has consulted with Postmaster-General Wanamaker, and Sir John Mac-Donald of Canada, and both have agreed to promote the scheme.

The Quaker Societies of Indiana Have Sent to Congress a petition asking the Government to co-operate with other nations for the suppression of the slave traffic in Africa, and the matter has been favorably reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Committee recommends the passage of a resolution requesting the President to arrange with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe for the perpetual abolition of the African slave trade. This will be taken up at an early day. Seventeen different countries participated in the adoption of the treaty lately negotiated at the Brussels Conference, for the regulation of this vile traffic. It is probable, therefore, that the new movement will not start without strong friends on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Head of the Mormon Church, Wilford Woodruff, has treated his followers to a genuine surprise by his letter in answer to the charges made by the United States Commissioners, referred to in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. He meekly declares his intention to submit to the laws and abandon polygamy, and calls upon all Mormons to do likewise. The test of the sincerity of this profession will come when the choice is to be made between the plural and the Christian marriage. Of late years the Mormons have celebrated their marriages in secret, for the purpose of deceiving the State authorities.

The Young King and Queen of Portugal, whose portraits appear below, are, for the time being at least, decidedly insecure on their thrones.

According to the latest advice, the Republican movement in Portugal threatens to result in a crisis as serious as that which dethroned Dom Pedro of Brazil, and which would be to a large extent, a political outcome of that event. The reigning monarch, King Charles, succeeded his father last Spring, and is a ruler of mild temperament, hardly calculated to face the revolutionary storm that seems to be brewing. His wife is the young and beautiful Princess Amelie, daughter of Duc de Chartres. The latest phase of the trouble was a plot, assailing the stability of the banks with the purpose of precipitating a politico-financial crisis. The plot was detected by the Government at Lisbon in time to prevent its accomplishment.

One of the Physical Wonders of the Age is a young art student of Bristol, England, named Heler. Entirely without arms, he draws and paints so well that he has been admitted as a member of the National Art School at Kensington. The cable says a great deal of interest has been aroused in London by his work, and he seems to be regarded as quite as much of a marvel as the celebrated Fawcett, who, although totally blind, was one of the finest scholars and debaters in England, an athlete, and a skilful horseman.

The Prohibition by the Brooklyn Authorities of an Anarchist meeting in that city, at which it was proposed to make a mockery of all religion and indulge in violent incendiary speeches, has excited a good deal of talk. It was questioned whether the constitutional right of assembly had not been unjustly invaded by the order forbidding the gathering; but the action of the authorities, apart from all questions of morality, seems to have been influenced by a strong desire to preserve the public peace. One of the projected features of the meeting, according to the original programme, was to be a speech by Johann Most, the arch-Anarchist. The programme singled out the Hebrews as the race whose religion was to be specially mocked. Such was the excitement occasioned by this threat that the police were apprehensive of a riot, and the meeting taken place.

Flood, Riot, and Earthquake have Marked the week in foreign lands. France has suffered from serious inundations in the province of Ardeche, accompanied by loss of life. A street riot, with hot fighting between crowds and police was an accompaniment of the trial of O'Brien, the Nationalist leader at Tipperary, Ireland. A prolonged earthquake shock created a panic in Granada, and other cities of Nicaragua. Mom-bacho, a long extinct volcano, showed signs of renewed activity. Portuguese outrages are reported from Goa, in India, where a collision took place between troops and populace. Many women and children were bayonnetted. Distressing accounts continue to be received of the destitution by the great floods in China. The cholera has almost subsided in Southern Europe.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Talmage preached last Sunday night in the Academy of Music, New York. This was the first of the series of services which he is holding there under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and which will be continued every Sunday evening until the New Tabernacle is ready for occupation. It is hoped that every reader will pray that God's blessing may attend this effort for the advancement of Christ's kingdom in this densely populated city.

Princeton College has opened with the largest freshman class in its history.

Ten new missionaries under appointment to India, have sailed on the Arizona from New York.

The directors of the new University of Chicago, Ill., on Sept. 18 elected Dr. W. R. Harper, of Yale College, New Haven, Conn., president of that institution.

A centenarian of Greenville, Ala., has been immersed by a Baptist minister on profession of faith. The Independent says that she is 112 years old, and has never before united with any church.

Rev. W. S. Rainsford, D.D., of St. George's Church, New York, hopes to have the assistance, during the winter, of his brother, the Rev. Marcus Rainsford, who has been doing successful mission work in London.

Bishop Potter, of New York, has returned from his European trip so much invigorated that he has declined the offer of his friends to provide him with an assistant. He now declares himself fully equal to the physical strain of his duties.

Rev. E. P. Telford began a series of evangelistic services on Sunday last in Paterson, N. J. in the Cross St. M. E. Church, Dr. Craig, pastor. Much blessing is hoped from these services, as preparatory meetings for prayer have been held by the church for some weeks past.

Principal Fairbairn of Mansfield College, Oxford, England, while recently lecturing at Chautauqua, said that the new college, the failure of which was freely predicted in England, is free of debt, and has a roll of forty students. The college buildings cost $250,000.

A note from the mission rooms of the American Board at Boston, published by a contemporary, says: "We have closed our most prosperous year, financially, if not spiritually, with August 31. The churches and individuals gave us $23,000 more than last year, and $32,000 above the average of five preceding years. Total receipts and expenditures over $760,000."

It is a noteworthy circumstance that the first Japanese Parliament, elected on the first of last July, contains ten Christians, or one in thirty of the whole number of members. The Christians were elected in the face of much opposition to them on account of their religion.

Mr. George W. Childs of Philadelphia, has presented a $5,000 site to the Presbyterian Church at Wayne, Delaware Co., Pennsylvania, on which to erect a new church building.

The growth of the Christian Endeavor movement is shown by its rapid spread into other countries. Australia has followed the lead of Great Britain, and has established a Victorian section of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, from which encouraging reports have come. The society in Newtown, New South Wales, is the oldest in the colony. In the Northwest Territory also societies are being formed, and a Christian Endeavor Union is projected.

The following list of dates and places where the Fall Christian Endeavor Conventions are to be held, will be of interest to many in all the churches; Connecticut at Willimantic, Oct. 6th-7th; Wisconsin at Appleton, Oct. 10th-12th; Iowa at Grinnell, Oct. 14th-16th; Missouri at St. Joseph, Oct. 17th-19th; Georgia at Marietta, Oct. 20th-21st; New York at Buffalo, Oct. 21st-22nd; Ontario at Hamilton, Oct. 23rd and 24th; Illinois at Rockford, Oct. 25th-26th; Massachusetts at Boston, Oct. 29th and 30th; New Jersey at Camden, Oct. 29th and 30th; Pennsylvania at Pittsburgh, Nov. 5th-7th; Indiana at Evansville, Nov. 7th-9th; Vermont at St. Johnsbury, Nov. 11th and 12th; Minnesota at Rochester, Nov. 14th-16th; Nebraska at Hastings, Nov. 21st-23rd.

SUFFICIENCY.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The Wonders Wrought—Indispensable to Conversion—The Insufficiency of the Instrument—I. The Answer to the Minister's Question—The Best of Preachers Disowning Self-Sufficiency—Not Sufficient for Right Thinking—For Any Holy Service—Whence Sufficiency Comes—The Lord's Telegraph Wires—II. A Direction to Hearers—Not to Trust in Self-Sufficiency—Honest Doubt—III. A Lesson to the Christian Church—Trust in no Man's Preaching—Have Faith in the Sufficiency of the Gospel—Let Life be in All that is Done.

"Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." II. Cor. 3: 5, 6.

PAUL had given some account of what God had done by him, and had described the work in these words—"Ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart." Before he had worked out that charming figure, he had asked the question in the sixteenth verse of the second chapter: "Who is sufficient for these things?" I seem to hear that question repeated as he finishes the description. The more we study the work of grace wrought by God through His ministers, the more we are forced to ask, "Who is Sufficient for These Things?"

To raise the dead, to turn a stone to flesh; who is sufficient for these? To give eyes to the blind, and ears to the deaf; to subdue the proud will, and enlighten the darkened heart; to deliver men from the fascination of sin and Satan, to bring them out of darkness into God's marvellous light, to turn rebels into sons of God; who is sufficient for these things? Yet nothing less than this will bring salvation. Here we have a chain of miracles, an Alpine range of wonders piled upon each other, yet no one marvel can be dispensed with; and we are to be the ministers by whom such miracles are wrought: "Who is sufficient for these things?"

Having asked the question, Paul now gives an answer to it in the words of my text. All these wonders have been wrought; men have had their minds written upon by the finger of God, and the stony heart has become a tablet of flesh. Since these things have been done, there must have been some kind of sufficiency, or adaptation, in the means by which they were done. Whence came it? Was it natural to the men, or did they acquire it by education, or by practice, or by imitation? The apostle goes on to answer the question by telling us what that sufficiency was not, and what it was.

I. We shall regard the text as an answer to

The Minister's Question.

"Who is sufficient for these things?" The answer is given first, in the negative; and secondly, in the positive. "Who is sufficient for these things?" The negative reply is—"Not that we are sufficient of ourselves." In this instance the best of preachers disowns self-sufficiency. Remember who it is that is writing. It is Paul, called to be an apostle, to whom the Lord Jesus personally appeared; a man of singular zeal and activity, and of remarkable ability in the things of God. He was not a whit behind the chief of the apostles, an expounder of the truth, a founder of churches, a father of myriads of souls; yet he says, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves." He was, when he wrote this epistle, no beginner in holy oratory; but a well-exercised evangelist. He had been taught of God deeply, had preached the Word fully, and had gained an experience unrivalled. Beginning with a wonderful conversion, going on through sufferings, persecutions, journeys, and labors, he had become a man of great weight and influence. Although long dead, his word would be law to us at this moment: and yet he confesses, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves."

Brethren, if Paul is not sufficient of himself, what are you and I? Where are you, ye lay preachers, and Sunday School teachers, and workers for God in different ways? Do you indulge the dream of self-sufficiency? Be ashamed of your folly in the presence of a great man who knew what he said, and who spoke under the direction of the Spirit of God, and who wrote deliberately, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves."

Thinking Grace.

And this negative is strengthened by the fact that he did not feel sufficient in a very needful point: "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves." I believe that old translation is as good as good can be, and that it sets forth the meaning of the Greek better than any other—"We are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves." What! was not the apostle able to do his own thinking? Must he receive thinking-grace—help to think aright? Let us not aim at being original thinkers, but as being witnesses and heralds of what God says to men.

Yet, thinking is the preacher's domain. He has to think of the fitness of a subject for his discourse; but he will not find his right subject by mere thinking; he must wait upon his Master for guidance. When he has found his subject, he must work it out in his own mind; and yet he is so insufficient in and of himself that he will not work it out aright, unless he cries to the Holy Spirit to aid his thought and open to him the Scriptures. When the time has come for him to tell out what he has thought, he has to think over his subject aloud, and speak with the mouth that which he has moulded in his mind; and in this he is dependent upon the help of God. Let him look to the Lord for his thinking and speaking, and he will do well.

Help in All Spheres.

In the whole matter we are of ourselves insufficient. Does a man wish to reach the human mind with heavenly truth? He must do it by the sufficiency of God. Does he wish to get at peculiar cases? He must be instructed by the Spirit of God. Does he desire to arouse the careless? Let him look to the quickening Spirit. Does he wish to comfort the disconsolate, and cheer the despairing? He is not sufficient of himself for this; let him call upon the Comforter, even the Spirit of God. As to that deep mystery of our holy faith which is called regeneration, or the new birth, the preacher may not dare to think that he can perform this. Into that secret chamber where men are born from above none can intrude. He that worketh the new birth is God alone. In the new creation, as in the old, He taketh counsel with none.

We will now joyfully consider how the question is answered positively. There is an answer to the question, "Who is sufficient for these things?" The answer is, All who trust in the Lord are made "sufficient as ministers of a new covenant." This is explained to us in the first sentence, "Our sufficiency is from God." In God there is all the wisdom, all the thought, all the love, all the power, all the conquering energy which a minister can require; and to work upon the hearts of men there lies in the omnipotent grace of God that the stony heart shall be transformed, and on its fleshy tablet shall be written the will of the Lord. That our sufficiency should be of God is infinitely better than if it were of ourselves; for then our sufficiency cannot be questioned, cannot be suspended, cannot be exhausted. If you had to bear your own charges, you might soon be bankrupt; but now you are like a child that travels with his father, and his father pays for everything. He has no care about cost, he is not called upon to exercise a pinching economy; he draws upon an inexhaustible purse for all he needs, and leads a princely life; for his father pays for all.

Hear a lesson. Dear Christian lady, you have been lamenting, "Alas! I am not sufficient for my class." You are sufficient if this is what the Lord has called you to do. To pray for those girls, to tell them the way of salvation, and loving heart to weep them to the Saviour. Lord can make you sufficient for this. My dear friend says, "I have been preaching a village, and the people are so dull that I not move them. I am not sufficient for task." Go and confess that fact to your God, and then begin again with the sufficient God, and you will mark a change come the spirit of the scene. I pray you, do not despair. The painful discovery of your own sufficiency ought to be the means of leading you to the Lord, and so of girding you with new strength.

The apostle evidently means that "through grace we are adapted to the work. Shall you what is wanted to make a man sufficient for it? He must be able to bear to the truth of God. Were you ever with life by the Spirit of the new covenant—covenant of gracious promise? Then you tell poor sinners where life is to be had. You slain by the law, and are you made alive by the Spirit of God? Then you will preach the law of God tremblingly, and you will speak life in Jesus Christ with living certainty. You know in your own soul what it is to be quickened by the Holy Ghost? If not, let the ark of God! But if divine power come upon you, and you have been made live the life of faith in Christ Jesus, then have one point of ability to be a minister. Beyond this a living, loving heart is a great necessity. Have tender sympathy with those who have not so learned Christ, and feel an intense desire that they may obtain eternal life. Let your spiritual life into contact with their spiritual death, and as one candle lights another, may the Lord convey light into other hearts by your testimony.

You see those wires which pass along roads; they are nothing but dead metal, they are sufficient of themselves to spy out what is happening in the capital of France, and report it here? No, not in themselves. That unconscious wire is quite sufficient to accomplish the transmission of news from London. Information is obtained, and the wires flash message under the sea to our door. The wire is quite sufficient, though not sufficient of itself. The Lord uses us as His telegraph wires to communicate between Himself and fallen men, and we, by His almighty power, are made convey to them the truth with power.

II. I have worked out my first point, and have viewed our text as the answer to the Minister's question. Secondly, we must view the text as a direction to

The Hearer's Thoughts.

These thoughts must again be both negative and positive. The first negative counsel I suggest to you is this—trust not your own sufficiency. It is very wonderful how fully in Scripture the inability of man is set out. Here we find our inability to think aright: "We are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves." In another passage we find that a man's will is of the Lord. When we get so far as to will to pull up all of a sudden, and make a halt, finding, with the apostle, "To will is easy with me; but how to perform that which I good I find not"; then are we driven to God for power to turn our willing into acting. This going to God we are brought to again; for we read and feel that "We cannot do what we should pray for as we ought." What can we do, if even in prayer we are insufficient? Suppose we are taught to pray, and helped by the Spirit of God, we begin to work; yet we cannot keep on working without fresh strength. Our Saviour prayed, "Father, keep them; we soon go back to the old deadness and darkness, unless He that first made us still keeps us alive. Are any of you carelessly saying to yourselves, "I can be saved just whenever I like," shall put off thought upon religious matters? I can believe and pray and live rightly at my own option. My salvation lies in my own hands, and the keys of heaven swing at my gate."

in delay as long as I please, and then at last "Lord have mercy upon me!" and go right away from the stew to heaven?" You find the truth to be quite another thing. The next negative lesson that the hearer should learn is, rely not on your own thoughts. Not, I pray you, therefore, indulge the cognitive faculty at the expense of believing. Some always trying to dive deep into things, and go so far down into mysterious subjects debated doctrines that they stir up the mud at the bottom, and they cannot see anything themselves, neither can we see what they are.

What think you? A man is perishing. He is thrown to him, and he will not let it until he knows in what shop the work was made, and whether the workpeople are getting good wages. Poor soul! he will die before his mind is so inquiring, and his senses gone wool-gathering at an unseasonable time. Jesus Christ is the Saviour for sinners; we are in Him, and you shall live: be washed in blood, and you shall be whiter than snow. Still," says one, "surely you would have us ask?" Yes, think as much as ever you can; I am not authorized to preach to you, "He that thinketh and is baptized shall be saved," I am commanded to tell you, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "But here is not such a thing as one. I suppose there may be; but as the one which is now so popular ostentatiously is itself "honest doubt," I am a little suspicious. If I were walking over lonely fields at night, and should meet a man, and he took the trouble to assure me over and over again that he was an honest man, I should not feel much assured. If a man were cutting a pane of glass out of my window, in the middle of the night, and when challenged answered that he was an honest man, I think I should let my dog bark, and leave him to decide the question. In a sect everlastingly prefaces all it has to say by claiming to be honest, I am rather inclined to suspect that it needs to give the assurance. If you are honest, you will confess you have sinned, and then you will come to us for remission of sins.

Now, gather direction positively. First, look to our preachers; yes, look to the Spirit of God. In the meetings of the Society of Friends sometimes sit still, and nobody speaks. It would do us good to have occasional silence, if the people would learn to look clean away from human agency to the power of God. If we may continue speaking; and yet if you advise you will Put no Reliance Upon Us.

When speaking, apart from the Lord. Think that you have done a good deed in merely trying to hear us talk. O friends, there must be more than words in the Gospel ministry, or it will be vain! There must be a secret heaven-power in our testimony, or it is no better than dead.

Further, look beyond thought by faith. Think, as we have already said; but still labor most to believe. To believe is to follow the way of salvation. Evermore it is written, "The just shall live by his faith." "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life."

We have known some who were brought up to the truth from their childhood, and as a matter of course they joined the church in their youth, and they stood well as to character for years; but after awhile they grew indifferent to divine things, and usually wandered away into sheer worldliness, not blaming others for allowing them to be a profession. In their case the Holy Spirit never wrote upon the tablets of flesh; I scratched a letter or two on the unchangeable stone. The work was never done by the Spirit, but by parental influence and persuasion, and so in due season it all vanished. I pray God to save you from the religion which is born of excitement and revivalism, which shows itself in spasms. Come to close communion with God by confessing your sin, and laying hold on Christ crucified with a real, living faith. May the truth of God be written on your hearts by the Spirit. God grant it!

III. I finish by

A Lesson to the Christian Church.

To you, people of God, in your endeavor to spread the Gospel, I say, first, whispering in your ear, trust no man who is self-sufficient. Oh, yes, he can do it! Bless you! He can do it at any time and anywhere. He can convince and convert souls in any quantity. Did you read in the paper, "Glorious meeting! Eighteen souls out for salvation?" He was speaking that evening. He can fetch them. Certain other preachers doubt him; but that is all jealousy. He can do it—that he can. Let such a man go where pride is at home. Our lowly Lord will not have him. Christ's men are more apt at weeping than bragging: they feel their inability rather than their ability. The man who does everything for the Lord is the man who cannot do anything without the Lord.

Next, doubt not the sufficiency of the Gospel in any case. Since our sufficiency is of God, you may take the Gospel down that dark, horrible slum, where there are none but thieves and harlots, and it will do its work. Since our sufficiency is of God, with God all things are possible. You have a horrible neighbor, who seldom speaks without an oath: he is as wicked a man as ever lived, and therefore you never give him a sermon, or speak to him about Christ; for you fear that your Gospel is not suitable for him. He is just the very man that God may bless. Go and

Try the Unlikely One!

Behold how the Pharisees and scribes enter not into the kingdom; but the publicans and harlots, conscious of their guilt, welcome the Saviour. Despair of nobody.

Next, let life be seen in all we do. If our ministry is not of the letter, but of the Spirit, and of the Spirit that giveth life, our hearers ought to have an abundance of life. Many professors seem to have life only in a part of them. Some have life in the jaw, and can talk religion, but none in the hand, for they cannot act it. Some have life in the head, but they have none in the heart. Some I know have never much life in their hand, especially that hand which goes into their pocket; for it goes in dead, and comes out empty. Perhaps there would be some life in it if you made them an offer of a guinea: then they might stretch out their hand to receive it. We want to be filled with life to the full. Give me a Christian man all alive. I hope many of that sort are here; yet are there some who are dead and cold. If they give you a shake of the hand, you feel as though a dead fish were touching you: they are as cold as icebergs. Warm-hearted fellowship is a sweet sign of life.

And lastly, glorify God, ye members of the church, in all that is done. If the will of God be written on any heart, praise God for it. When any are converted, they should let the minister know; the instrument will have a rich reward in knowing that a soul is brought to Christ. But above all, there should be joy in the church and praise to God over every soul that is saved. And shall there not be some soul saved this morning? O my hearer, I pray God it may be thy soul.

JOSIAH DEAN'S BAR.

PART II.

ONE morning at the breakfast table, Josiah Dean complainingly said, "I don't see what I am going to do. Enoch leaves to-day and I have that lawsuit to attend to, over in Rockport. I am afraid I shall have to shut up for to-day and to-morrow." Kate replied: "I will take Enoch's place for you, father."

Everyone was very much astonished. The boys laughed and said:

"But won't she make a fine bartender!"

Mrs. Dean looked distressed and said: "Father, you won't allow her to do anything of the kind, will you?"

"Why, I don't know; business is business, mother. I have not been getting along very fast of late, and if this lawsuit goes against me I shall be very hard up for money. I guess, Kate, you may try your hand at the business if you've a mind to."

Kate was pleasantly disappointed when it came to the close of the following day's labors, to find how very much less irksome the fulfilling of her duties had been. She was not a vain girl, but it would have taken a person entirely destitute of the bump of self-appreciation, not to have been flattered at the effects of her beauty on the customers she served. Coarse, rude men were respectful and polite. Country swains that were in town to dispose of loads of produce, gazed at her in the most rapt admiration, and sighed as though leaving all they held dear, when the shades of evening warned them they had better be on the homeward way.

It was the turning of the tide of prosperity in favor of Josiah Dean. His house became very popular. Kate grew so accustomed to the life of a bar-maid, and the excitement was so missed, when in the quiet seclusion of the other part of the house, that even after Enoch's place was filled she seized every opportunity to officiate.

Richard Murdock came and went as usual, but it was easy to see the young man was not pleased. The advice he had given was not working in the way he had intended to have it. He had only thought to induce Kate to allow him all the liberty of staying in the bar-room he chose. He never thought of her getting a taste for the place. Not for a moment did he entertain a doubt as to her goodness, or the sincerity of her desire to help her father, as the first cause of her overcoming her scruples in regard to the business. And as he had been the one to urge her on to take a greater interest in her father's affairs, he felt that his tongue was completely tied as to any remonstrance with her now. And there was no fault to be found with her. She was not to blame that the country swains found her so attractive, that they came twice as often and stayed a great deal longer than they had ever done before. He did not wonder that they felt so inclined; but it was torture to him to see them there, and still greater torture for him to be away.

Never was man in greater dilemma! He neglected his business to be on hand at all times and seasons. He knew he was drinking more than was good for him; and what was worse still, his beautiful, beloved Kate was commencing to tittle! But what could he do about it? Admonitions to temperance stuck in his throat.

Affairs were going on very badly, when one morning he stepped into the sitting-room unexpectedly, and there he found Mrs. Dean wringing her hands and crying in uncontrolled grief.

"Oh, Richard," she said, in explanation, "my children! I am nearly in despair about all of them! Of course you've seen the change that has come over Kate within the past few months. She used to be such a help to me in restraining the boys, and now she is so different! I cannot imagine what has done it. Can you, Richard?"

"Oh! I guess she will get over this fancy," replied Richard, not caring to acknowledge his part in her change of sentiments. "But I must say, Mrs. Dean, it is worrying me, and I am willing to do anything that you think best in the matter. What do you think about our being married right off?"

"Richard, I think she is too young, only seventeen, and with the ideas she has lately, she would make you so unhappy. Oh, Richard, that terrible business! How I loathe it! What a curse it is to any family that engages in it! The only thing that strikes me as at all suitable, to be done under the circumstances, is to send her away to some good school for a year or two. You must know of something of the kind, and if you would use your influence with her father, she might be saved."

"That is a good idea, Mrs. Dean. Let me think, do I know of a good school? Why, yes; there is Painsville, a school modelled after the Holyoke plan. It bears an excellent reputation for influencing girls to high Christian living."

To the surprise of both Mrs. Dean and Richard, the task of persuading Mr. Dean to allow his daughter a year or two of boarding-school life, was very much easier than they expected. In fact it was harder to induce Kate to accept of the privilege, when it was offered her. But at last she was persuaded, her trunk was packed and the morning arrived for her departure.

"Good-bye, father," she said, kissing him, "now if business grows dull, you must let me know and I will come right home and help you."

"Perhaps father will change his business, before you get home again," said Mrs. Dean.

"I am afraid not," replied Mr. Dean, stroking his full, grey beard, thoughtfully. "Now I shall have the extra expense of Kate's schooling, I must make all I can."

"Joe and Rob, are you not ashamed that you are so untrustworthy? Father has to pay a man to do what you might just as well do."

Joe and Rob looked guilty. Their eyes were red, and there were unmistakable evidences that they had been helping themselves on the sly.

"Good-bye, mother, you ought to take more interest in father's business, now I am away."

WOMAN WINNING HER WAY.

THE German University at Leipsic has made a great concession by admitting women to the full privileges of the University for the first time this fall. Heretofore the only recognition conceded them was by edicts forbidding their presence. In the comparatively few cases where they have gained admittance to the lectures, it has been only through courtesy and as the guests of the individual professor. Now at the close of the summer term, four American women, one Armenian and one Russian, who have added their small number to the 3,300 legitimate students in attendance, are agreeably surprised to find that in applying to the Quæstor's office and petitioning the privilege of paying the usual fees, their request has been complied with, and they have also received copies of the important little blue books which serve at the same time as a receipt for dues paid up and as a witness signed by the individual professors, and stamped with the University seal, of faithful attendance upon the lectures.

THE LEADER'S FAREWELL.

A Story of the Golden Text for Oct. 12. "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye do shew forth the Lord's death till He come." I. Cor. 11:26.

"NOT hurt, are you?" The question was asked by a man of slight build and delicate complexion, of a big, burly, workman who had just regained his feet by the help of the questioner. He was crossing the street in the dim, uncertain light of a gas lamp, with unsteady steps, when he fell across a car-track and but for the timely help which the little man had given him he would have at that moment been under the wheels of a passing horse-car.

"No," he answered, gruffly, "but I should have been killed if you had not come. I'm not drunk, but I guess I've had too much to make walking on the car-tracks quite safe."

"I am going your way," said the other, "we'll go together if you don't mind, and if I take your arm we'll avoid danger."

"All right. Do you live this way?" I don't remember seeing you before."

"No; I am going to a meeting that I have every Thursday night at Mozart Hall. Glad to see you if you will come."

"What is it like? Are you a clergyman?"

"Well, say a clergyman out of work. Or rather with plenty of work off the regular lines."

"I don't know as I care to come. I've stopped going to church. The last time I went the clergyman preached about 'In my Father's house are many mansions.' The mansions were in heaven. If anybody could tell me how to get a decent frame-house on earth I'd go to hear him and glad to. I don't want to wait till I'm dead to get comfort."

"All right; you are the man for me. Come to Mozart Hall at seven o'clock any Thursday night and ask for Mr. Wilson's meeting and we will see what we can do."

"Good; I'll come." Tom Bradley kept his word. That day week he was at Mozart Hall among a crowd of workingmen, some of whom he knew by sight. "What kind of an at this anyway?" Tom asked of one of the men.

"Used to be an infidel, radical and del club," the man explained, "but Mr. Wilson changed all that. He's a good man, Mr. Wilson. Not much money, I guess, but the friend workingmen have ever had."

There was a general movement among men at this moment, and all eyes were turned toward the door at which the small man who helped Tom Bradley a week before, and in him to the meeting, came in. His quick singled Tom out of the crowd and he came to where he was standing with the other.

"Glad to see you," he said, shaking hands. "Now, Will," he said, laying his hand upon the shoulder of the man with whom Tom had been talking. "Our friend wants to know how can have a house of his own. I'll leave it to you. Just explain to him about our business society after the meeting, and put him to work."

"Yes, Mr. Wilson, I'll do it," Will answered.

Tom could not quite make out what the meeting was. It was not a religious society, nor a debating society, nor any kind of gathering that he could describe. But he liked it and paid close attention.

Mr. Wilson's talk was about Franklin and times. It was but short, and, when he finished, several of the men spoke, differing in what in opinion with Mr. Wilson, and there was quite an argument. "At its close Mr. Wilson said: 'Now I have something personal to say. I need not ask your opinion of our work. Every one of us believes in it. You have seen that I was right when I told you, at the meeting, that there are no principles of life comparable for making a man good and useful in the world to the principles of Jesus of Nazareth. We have seen the kingdom of God come in the world here since we began. Christ rules the world now, where all was anarchy before. Men who lived only for themselves have found light in helping others. Men who were contentious and quarrelsome have learned to be kind and friendly and loving, at home and abroad. Some who were leading drunken, dissolute lives have cast aside the filth, and are now trying to be pure even as He was pure. That is what Jesus meant by His kingdom coming.'

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY,

Author of "Nestleton Magna," "Simon Holmes, the Carpenter," "Will it Lift?" etc., etc.

ABRAM HARDALE was about as queer a mortal as ever bore a name. He had two names, for not only was he Hardale by genealogy and Abram by baptism, but he was Old Crusty by popular vote and consent. A tall, square, gaunt form had Abram Hardale, so tall that even the somewhat considerable stoop of his shoulders did not bring him down to the stature of ordinary mortals.

On Abram Hardale's cheeks the razor left a short, incipient whiskers, about an inch and a half long by half an inch or from that to three quarters of an inch wide. They were in shape much like a capital I, and from that point of view were serviceable as signs of their owner's character, for if ever mortal man had faith in his own "matchless ego," that man, I take it, was Abram Hardale. His eyes were grey, and were overhung, "like a penthouse," by enormous bushy eye-brows, whose jet black had not as yet given way one jot under the frosting influence of time.

Curious eyes they were. Their normal aspect was clear, keenly cynical, for Abram was a man of ability, what is called a long-headed fellow. But he had a very undesirable tendency to think and speak hardly and injuriously of such men and matters as came into his immediate way. Probably this arose from the egoism of which his whiskers were the symbol and the type. At times, however, and as if involuntarily, Abram's grey eyes were lighted up with a gleam of humor—quite a merry twinkled—and at times, too, with a softened, gentle light, all too brief in its duration, but so long as it lasted, working almost a transformation in the man.

His nose which suggested by its shape that it might have something to do with his Hebrew name, had quite a Hebrew curve. Judging by it alone, one would have given him credit for good temper, but the two perpendicular lines just above it, on his broad intelligent brow belied first impressions, and invested him with a waspish look suggestive of a sting, and which unhappily not belie either the first or the last impressions of those who had much to do with him in the ordinary walks of daily life.

His hair, growing thin now, was cropped short, and had lost the jetty hue of his eyebrows and whiskers, being of a darkly shaded grey. One glance at the square chin would put you on your guard. It suggested the necessity of acting warily if his consent was something strongly to be desired; for if he said a "No," crowbars and pick-axes could not wrench movement of that chin towards recantation or concession. Yet as soon as the eye rested on the old man's mouth, things did not seem to agree. Surely those mobile and shapely lips were not the lips of a hard or ill-tempered man. Were they not? You should have heard what his neighbors had to say: or better still, you should have heard what he had to say, and would soon come to the conclusion that though Old Crusty's lips were not lying lips in the ordinary sense of the words, they certainly did not tell the whole truth about him. If there was one thing that equalled Abram Hardale's egoism it was his ill-temper, which was none the better, but all the worse to bear for expending itself in slow, measured, biting sarcasms, which scarified the victim, and not seldom cut very much deeper still.

I have been at some pains to draw the portrait of the old carpenter, because he has much to do with my story, and because I want the reader to see Old Crusty in his mind's eyes as clearly as I can, as clearly as I did see him, alas, how many years ago! with bowed shoulders, forward head, and long spare body, walking along the narrow streets of Settleworth.

Let the reader should begin by taking a vigorous dislike to the old man, though I do not want just now to take up cudgels for him, let those redeeming lips and eyes of his be remembered: let it be remembered also that on the whole folks have more good points about them than we are aware of; that we have a keener vision usually for points of another sort, and that of these latter we have unfortunately quite as many as our neighbors. The charity that thinketh no evil is too much of a rarity in this world.

Old Crusty, as might be predicted, was sadly in the habit of treading on the toes of his men and lads, succeeding generally in disgusting them with their employer, and sending them in search of work elsewhere. The way in which he discharged his workmen—gave them "the sack," as he put it—and parted with his apprentices under the influence of sudden fits of temper, or an apparently senseless "taking a dislike" made a long term of service in his employ a matter of surprise. There was one exception to the rule. George Appleton had not only safely passed through the whole term of his apprenticeship, but had been a trusty and trusted journeyman for a full half dozen years. The fact was that George had become an altogether too clever and useful "hand" to be lightly lost. He was moreover a universal favorite among the farmers and other customers of his master, not only because of his practical knowledge of all the departments of an inclusive country trade, but because of his civil and obliging manners, and his conscientious way of getting through his work. For his mother's sake, of whom more hereafter, the young fellow desired stay in Settleworth, and so he bore with Old Crusty's crustiness with quite exemplary patience, and made himself more than ever necessary to the old man as the years went by. Towards George Appleton, Abram Hardale grew less grumpy, less sarcastic, more human, and in his heart of hearts—but there we do not know much of the old man's heart yet; wait awhile.

Abram Hardale was celebrated all the country round for his skill as a wheelwright—in the provinces "carpenter" is a term of extensive and inclusive scope. The owners of all sorts of vehicles, within a circumference of many a mile, kept him well in with this class of work, and George was now quite as clever in this line as he was. Abram could not exactly agree with that. From a man with such egoistic whiskers, that could hardly be expected. Indeed, he denied the fact.

"Everybody knows," he used to say, "that at a wheel there isn't my marrow in all the Riding, but I will say this, that our George comes second. Me an' him together, him at one wheel and me at t'other, can make a pair that can very nearly run of themselves."

In these days, however, Abram's years were beginning to tell upon him. Stooping for any length of time together became grievously fatiguing to him, so he rested on his laurels a good deal in all such arduous matters as wheel-making, and found a new source of pride in boasting that George Appleton was a lucky young fellow to have had the untold advantage of having him for a master and guide. "Not much of a lad, George wasn't," he said; "I thought I should have had to send him adrift the first year or so of his apprenticeship; but I took special pains with him for his mother's sake, poor woman. By degrees I put some gumption into him, an' got him on, an' made a man of him, and there he is second at his trade in all the Riding?"

There he was doubtless, smiling at the old man's vanity, and conscious all the time that the "gumption" had been in him born and bred, though he was quite ready to acknowledge that Abram had taught him and taught him well; and so the two managed to get on with each other very well and, on the whole, Old Crusty kept the "crust" for other people, and favored George with "crumb."

"I say, George," said Abram suddenly, one day, as they were working in the shop together, "Don't you ever think of gettin' married?"

"No," said George, looking up from his work with a smile on his lip and a look of wonder in his eye, for his master had never before mentioned such a subject through all the years. "No, indeed. I'm much too well off as I am to care to change."

"Yes, it's a grand thing, lad, to have a mother like yours. She's worth a bushel o' the flimsy stuff that men have to make wives of, nowadays. Milliners' dummies, I calls 'em, only they aren't dumb, more's the pity, or there would be some compensation. Still, I reckon you'll ha' to come to it some day."

"Some day's some way off," said George, laughingly. "It's no use meetin' trouble half way, is it? They say, 'Wedlock's a padlock,' an' I shouldn't like to be locked up for life just yet."

"Ha, ha! That sounds wise enough to listen to, but I suppose Miss Dearlove hasn't come along just yet. When she does, 'Wedlock's a padlock' will become 'Wedlock's a paradise!' Then you'll find that wedlock's a purgatory, or something worse—but no, George," he continued, dropping the sarcastic vein, and turning the kindlier gleam of his gray eyes on him, "I hope something better than that for you."

George could not make it out. What had come over the old man? Curiosity and surprise prompted further question. "What made you drop on to that subject?" he asked. "I didn't think you minded much for matrimony, yourself."

"Nay, lad: it's the subject that's dropped on to me. You see I'm gettin' old, an' some o' these days I shall be goin' off. I shan't care much for that, for life's only a poor brew, accordin' to my notions; but I should like this business to be kept goin', an' you are the man that ought to have it. After I've made it, and had it, and kept it A-I. I should not like it to fall into the hands of a numbskull. When I'm gone, of course it can never be what it is while I'm here, but you'll keep it better up to the mark than anybody, I know. I should like it to be said that Abram Hardale's old shop keeps it's character, at any rate, as much as can be expected. An' besides, you've done well by me, George, and I should like to do well by you."

This was a most unusual speech for Abram Hardale to make in the matter of length; and it was still more unusual for Old Crusty to wear his heart upon his sleeve in that fashion. George was a good deal touched.

"Well," he replied, frankly and warmly, "that is very kind of you. But I don't see why I should get married. Do you? My mother would manage here; as indeed she would manage anywhere," continued George, with filial pride. "But there, where's the good of talking? You're good for a score of years yet; and young folks, even when they are as strong as I am, don't always make old bones."

Here the conversation was abruptly cut off. The little stage which ran to and fro between Settleworth station and the town, was driven up to the carpenter's door. Abram looked at George with "a meaning in his eyes," and hastened forth to see what that vehicle had brought. George was a little curious, too, and stood outside the shop-door to watch events. A trunk had to be lifted down. He hastened to give the conductor a helping hand, and saw a black-eyed gipsy looking up into the sombre face of Abram Hardale, and saying with a merry twinkle, not of the eyes only, but the whole laughing face, "Now, Uncle Abram, I wonder what you are going to do with me."

Said Abram Hardale to himself with a shrug of his shoulders, and a sort of mystified look upon his face, "So do I." Quoth George Appleton, on whom a light, or what he took for dawning, was beginning to shine, "So do I."

The fair young girl, who had so suddenly risen on the Settleworth horizon, was none other than Nora Mansford, the only daughter of Abram Hardale's dead wife's sister, an only sister, who had now also passed away. I am not sure that she was any the more really welcome there for that. People did say that the old man's relations with his wife, who had now lain under the sacred shadows of Settleworth's Abbey Church for some ten years past, or more than that, were not of the most affectionate or over comfortable kind. I am afraid that there was some truth in that, though it will not do to put too much confidence in such an indefinite authority as "people say." "They say" is a most unmitigated liar; and as "people say" is a member of the same family, what is said must be taken with a good many grains of salt. Still, I can scarcely imagine the old carpenter to have been much more gracious to his own wife than he was to other people. A man of that character is generally consistent in his behavior all round. It may well be doubted, however, whether that is a case in which consistency is in any sense a jewel, or rather it may be positively denied.

Nora had come to find a home with her uncle: and although under the circumstances, that looks rather a serious undertaking, she soon settled down, apparently not at all disconcerted with her new surroundings, uninviting though they were. She was a piquant little damsel, whose undoubted attractions of form and feature were heightened and increased by a peculiar winsomeness of manner. Her tact and good temper enabled her to win, as far as might be, her surly uncle's liking, and to dispose to a considerable extent of his prejudice against "petticoats," an inclusive term denoting womanhood in general. Indeed, from the first she exercised an irresistible influence over him, much to other people's surprise, and very much to his own.

Nora's mother, according to Abram Hardale's testimony, exceeded even her daughter in the subtle attributes which enable some women to exert such a powerful influence on the sex, both for good and ill. Anice Houghton's mother, was the younger daughter of a farm bailiff in the employ of a certain rich man, whose estates were in North Yorkshire. Her father was held in high esteem by his aristocratic employer. Having a great taste for what is called high farming, Lord Dilworth found in the clever and experienced Houghtons a thoroughly capable manager, and a thoroughly trustworthy steward, besides. Mr. Houghton's position was not won in the days of Abram Hardale went courting his eldest daughter Jane, and the thrifty wheelwright with good trade in his fingers, some siller in his pouch, and a fair measure of grit to boot, had succeeded in carrying Jane off to pre-empt the home he had established at Settleworth. Anice Houghton was much younger than her sister, far more attractive in form, feature, and far more self-assertive, too. Her father's position had become more lucrative and important; so she was able to look somewhat higher for a husband, as the cant phrase goes than her sister Jane had done.

Among many eager suitors for the hand of "the lady Anice," as she had come to be called by reason of her queenly mien and regal bearing, were two brothers, the sons of a gentleman farmer in the neighborhood, named Mansford. He cultivated his own extensive acres, and had considerable means beside. The elder of the sons was first in the field, and rapidly distanced all competitors. For him Anice showed marked preference, and as he was thoroughly worthy to whom she did this, her friends and relatives applauded her selection and approved the match.

Richard Mansford was a capital specimen of the yeomen of the North country, stalwart physique, manly in morals and noble in manner. However it might be with the fair and fashionable Anice, it was a very serious business with her that he loved her dearly, with a love that was as steel, a love which grew and strengthened as the days went by. Had she held loyalty to her husband, an honorable position, and a home. In that case these chronicles would never have been written.

Richard's younger brother, Rupert, was years his brother's junior. He was a handsome and fascinating young fellow, who unfortunately for himself and others, was aware of his possession of those dangerous gifts, and not availing himself of them at his will. He was base enough, smitten with the exceeding graces of his brother's chosen one to pay secret attention to not very strong-minded Anice. By dint of his peculiar talent in the arts of blandishment, by "his much fair speech," which such women have at their disposal, he succeeded in stealing affections, and fixing them on his ignoble brother.

His brother Richard, as may well be imagined, was exceedingly wroth. From that day he had no intercourse with his heartless brother. He inflicted on him, what was in its way, a wound. The strong man was bowed down to the ground, and for a time the blow quite unmanned him. After a short time of weary, spiritless longing for the unattainable, he resolved to go away, and seek in other lands mental and physical restoration that did not come to him at home.

Richard Mansford, partly ashamed of avowing his reasons, and partly to avoid the obstacle that he well knew would be placed in the way of his design, suddenly disappeared. He left behind him a short note to his father, to the effect that he cared little for life, less for his mother (who had been dead for some years), and that he had done him such cruel and irreparable wrong; and that in order that he might be free from doing some dark deed of vengeance, he had gone and should not return.

FATHER'S HOUSE."

Or
 "With Christ, which is far better.—Phil. i: 26.

THESE are words of Bible lore,
 Dear to every Christian heart;
 How we long yet more and more Christ to meet, and never part.
 But the Saviour bids us rest
 On His promise sweet and true;
 "In My Father's House on high I'll prepare a place for you."

Only here "a little while,"
 Then to enter home above,
 Where there's nothing to defile—
 All is brightened by His love.
 Oh! to be with Jesus there,
 "Better far" than earthly friends;
 Sweetest rest forever share—
 Blessed rest—it never ends.

But while left upon time's shore,
 Let us work with all our might,
 For we know 'twill soon be o'er;
 Then for us 'twill all be bright.
 Not the light of sun or stars,
 But the Lord Himself the Light;
 No more death, nor naught that mars,
 When our faith is changed to sight.

—Rev. G. B. Greig.

SECOND DAY IN PALESTINE.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON ON HIS RECENT TRAVELS IN THE HOLY LAND.

The Journey from Joppa to Jerusalem—Discomforts of the Seat on the Camel—The Re-Peopling of Palestine—Jews in their Own Land—Veiled Women—The City of Samuel's Residence—Armed Attendants—Reflections on the Plain of Ono—The Scene of Samson's Incendiarism—The Village of Emmaus—In the Valley of Ajalon—The Brook Elah—The Duel of the Champions—Through the Olive Groves Up to Jerusalem—Under the Gate of the Holy City.

The second sermon of the series on the Palestinian tour was delivered last Sunday morning in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and again at night in the Academy of Music, New York. This latter beautiful and spacious building, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured, to give New Yorkers an opportunity of hearing Dr. Talmage in their own city, though affording comfortable accommodation for nearly six thousand persons, again proved, as on Sept. 28th, when the first sermon of the series was preached, inadequate to hold all who desired to hear the great preacher. Dr. Talmage spoke as follows from the text:

"I went up to Jerusalem." Galatians I : 18.

MY second day in the Holy Land. We are in Joppa. It is six o'clock in the morning, but we must start early, for by night we are to be in Jerusalem, and that city is forty-one miles away. We may take camel or horse or carriage. As to-day will be our last opportunity in Palestine for taking the wheel, we choose that. The horses with harness tasselled and jingling, are hitched, and, with a dragoman in coat of many colors seated in front, we start on a road which unveils within twelve hours enough to think of for all time and all eternity. Farewell Mediterranean with such a blue as no one but the divine Chemist could mix, and such a fire of morning glow, as only the divine Illuminator could kindle! Hail! Mountains of Ephraim and Juda whose ramparts of rock we shall mount in a few hours, for modern engineers can make a road anywhere, and without piling Ossa upon Pelion, those giants can scale the heavens.

We start out of the city amid barricades of cactus on either side. Not cacti in boxes two or three feet high, but cactus higher than the top of the carriage—a plant that has more swords for defense, considering the amount of beauty it can exhibit, than anything created. We passed out amid about four hundred gardens, seven or eight acres to the garden, from which at the right seasons are plucked oranges, lemons, figs, olives, citron, and pomegranates, and which hold up their censers of perfume before the Lord in perpetual praise. We meet great processions of of oil and with fruits, and some wealthy Mohammedan with four wives—three too many. The camel is a proud, mysterious, solemn, ancient, ungainly, majestic, and ridiculous shape, stalking out of the past. The driver with his whip taps the camel on the fore-leg, and he kneels to take you as a rider. But when he rises, hold fast or you will fall off backward as he puts his fore-feet in standing posture, and then you will fall off in front as his back-legs take their place. But the inhabitants are used to his ways, although I find the riders often dismount and walk as though to rest themselves. Better stand out of the path of the camel; he stops for nothing and seems not to look down, and in the street I saw a child by the stroke of a camel's front foot, hurled seven or eight feet along the ground.

Here we meet people with faces, and arms, and hands tattooed, as in all lands sailors tattoo their arms with some favorite ship or admired face. It was to this habit of tattooing among the Orientals that God refers in a figure, when He says of His church: "I have graven thee on the palms of my hands."

Many of these regions are naturally sandy, but by irrigation they are made fruitful and, as in this irrigation, the brooks and rivers are turned this way, and that, to water the gardens or farms, so the Bible says, "The king's heart is in the hands of the Lord, and He turneth it as the rivers of water are turned whithersoever He will."

As we pass out and on we find about eight hundred acres belonging to the Universal Israelitish Alliance. Montefiore, the Israelitish centenarian and philanthropist, and Rothschild, the banker, and others of the large-hearted have paid the passage to Palestine, for and they have also set apart lands for their culture; and it is only a beginning of the fulfillment of divine prophecy, when these people shall take possession of the Holy Land. The road from Joppa to Jerusalem, and all the roads leading to Nazareth and Galilee we saw lined with processions of Jews, going to the sacred places, either on holy pilgrimage, or as settlers. All the fingers of Providence now-a-days are pointing toward that resumption of Palestine by the Israelites. I do not take it that the prospered Israelites of other lands are to go there. They would be foolish to leave their prosperities in our American cities where they are among our best citizens, and cross two seas to begin life over again in a strange land. But the outrages heaped upon them in Russia, and the insults offered them in Germany, will soon quadruple and centuple the procession of Israelites from Russia to Palestine.

Many Israelites,

Facilities for Getting There will be multiplied, not only in the railroad from Joppa to Jerusalem, to which I referred last Sabbath as being built, but permission for a road from Damascus to the Bay of Acre has been obtained, connect with make one great railroad. So from Jerusalem and from Joppa, will soon Holy Land hours of conish colonization in England and gathering mon-transportation ites to Pales-for them of lands and farming implements, and so that it is decided by lot as to which families shall go first. They were God's chosen people at the first, and He has promised to bring them back to their home, and there is no power in one thousand or five thousand years to make God forget His promises. Those who are prospered in other lands, will do well to stay where they are. But let the Israelites who are depreciated, and attacked and persecuted turn their faces towards the rising sun of their deliverance. God will gather in that distant land, those of that race who have been maltreated, and He will blast with the lightnings of His omnipotence those lands on either side of the Atlantic, which have been the instruments of annoyance and harm, to that Jewish race, to which belonged Abraham, and David, and Joshua, and Baron Hirsch, and Montefiore, and Paul the Apostle, and Mary the Virgin, and Jesus Christ the Lord.

Veiled Women.

On the way across the plain of Sharon we meet many veiled women. It is not respectable for them to go unveiled, and it is a veil that is so hung as to make them hideous. A man may not even see the face of his wife until after betrothal, or engagement of marriage. Hence the awful mistakes, and the unhappy home God has made the face an index of character and honesty or dishonesty usually is demonstrated in the features. I do not see what made a fair face for, if it were not to be at. But here come the crowds of disfigured women down the road on their way to bundles of sticks for firewood on their backs. They started at three o'clock in the morning get the fuel. They stagger under the burden. Whipped and beaten will some of them their bundle of sticks is too small. All that required for divorce is for a man to tell his wife; "Be off, I don't want you any more." Woman a slave in all lands, except the United States, which the Gospel of Christ makes her a free woman. And yet in Christian countries there are women posing as septs, and men with families posing the only religion that makes sacred the names of wife, mother, daughter and sister.

What is that? Town of Ramleh, birthplace of Samuel, the great prophet. Near by, called because that number of disciples perished there for Christ's sake; but if towers had been built for all those, who in the time of the Jewish empire, have fallen on this road during the ages past, you might almost walk in turrets from Joppa to Jerusalem.

Tower of Forty Martyrs,

Now we pass guard-houses which are made of chopped straw and mud where at night partly through the day, armed men dwell to keep the bandits off travellers. In the valleys of these mountains dwell men to whom robbery would be high play and a purse with pennies would be compensation enough for a struggle that the savage might have with a wayfarer. There is only one other danger that amounts to much in these lands and is the law of hospitality. If you can get an Arab to eat with you, if only one mouthful, you are sure of his protection and that has been from age to age. The Lord's Supper was on that custom, a special friendship after taking food together. To that custom Scott refers in his immortal Talisman, when Saladin, with one stroke of the sword, cut the head from an enemy who stands in Saladin's tent with a cup in his hand and before it was time to put it to his lip, and does it so sure that the body of his enemy, beheaded, fell for a moment after the beheading, with the sword still in his right hand. After the cup had been sipped it would have been impossible, according to the laws of Oriental hospitality to have taken the fatal blow.

Armed Attendants.

The only lands where it is safe to travel are Christian lands. Human life is highly valued and personal rights are respected, and I am glad to believe that in this country, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, there is not a place to-day where it is not safer without a pistol than with one. All through our journeys in Palestine we required fire-arms. While the only weapon on my person was a New Testament, we through the region where I said to the driver: "David, are you armed?" and he said "Yes," and I said "Are those fifteen or twenty muleteers and baggage-men and attendants armed?" and he said "Yes," and I felt safe.

On we roll through the Plain of Sharon where grew the rose after which Christ was named, the Rose of Sharon, celebrated in all Christian lands and throughout all ages. There has been controversy as to what flower it was. Some claim it was a marsh-mallow that thrives here, some claim this honor for the narcissus, some for the blue iris, and some for the anemone, for you must know that this Plain of Sharon is a rolling ocean of color where the Spring breezes move across it. But leaving the botanists in controversy as to what it would take the most aromatic and beautiful flowers and twist them into a garland for the Lord, "Name which is above every name."

Yonder, a little to the north as we move

e Plain of Ono. The Bible mentions it and again. The village standing on this of Ono is a mud village. Two great basins catch the rains for the people. Of more rtance in olden time than in modern time this Plain of Ono. But as the dragoman unced it and in the Bible I read of it, I was nded of the vast multitude of people who dwell in the Plain of Ono. They are, by nervous constitution or by their lack of in God, always in the negative. Will you to build a church? Oh, no! Will you out in some new Christian enterprise? o! Do you think the world is getting any r? Oh, no! They lie down in the path of all good move- ments, sanitary, social, political and religious. They harness their horses with no traces to pull ahead but only breeching straps to hold back. ce up your nerves now, that you may look I point them out. Yonder is Kirjath- i, where the ark of God stayed until David it to Jerusalem. Yonder John the Baptist was born. Yonder is Emmaus where Christ walked with the disciples at eventide. Here are men ploughing, only one handle to the plough, showing the accuracy of Christ's allu- sion. When we plough in America or England there are two hands on two handles, but in Pal- estine only one handle. And so Christ uses the singular saying: "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom." The ox is urged on by a wooden stick pointed with sharp iron, and the ox knows enough not to kick, for he would only hurt him- self instead of breaking the goad. And the Bible refers to that when it says to Saul: "It is hard for thee to kick against the goads."

The Valley of Ajalon.

Here is the valley of Ajalon, famous for Joshua's pursuit of the five kings, and the lunar arrest. And in imagination I see the moon in day-time halt. Who has not sometimes seen the moon dispute the throne with the sun? But when the king of day and the queen of night, who never before Joshua's time, nor since then, stopped a moment in their march, halted at Joshua's command, it was a scene, enough to make the universe shiver: "Moon! stand thou still in the valley of Ajalon!" At another time we will see the sun stop above Gibeon, but now we have only to do with the moon, and you must remember that it was more of an orb than it is now. It is a burnt-out world now, a dead world now, an extinct world now, a corpse laid out in state in the heavens, waiting for the judg- ment day to bury it. But on the day of which I speak, the moon was probably a living world, yet it halted at the wave of Joshua's finger, "Stand thou still!" Do not budge an inch un- til Joshua finishes those five kings, who are there tumbling over the rocks, sword of man slash- ing them, hailstones out of the sky pelting them.

And there is the cavern of Makkedah, where they fled for safety, and where they were after- ward locked in, and from which they were taken out to be slain, and in which they were afterward buried; and you do well to examine that cavern, for within a few hours it became three things which no other cave ever was: Fortress, Prison, Sepulchre.

A Bandit's Cave.

Now we pass the place where once lived one of the greatest robbers of the century, Abou Gosh by name. From this point you see he could look over all the surrounding country, and long before the travellers came up to him, the plan for the taking of their money or their life, or both was consummated. He one day found a company of monks who would not pay, and he smothered them to death in a hot oven. In his last days, he lived here like an Oriental prince, and had his attendants and admirers to whom he told the stories of brigandage and as- sassination. So late as when our eminent and beloved American, William C. Prime, passed through, Abou Gosh, the scoundrelly Bedouin, sat at his door-way, smoking his pipe. His de- scendants live in this village, and probably are no more honest than their distinguished ances- tor, but marauding and murder are not as safe a business now as when all this route to Jeru- salem was subject to outrages pandemoniac.

Here we pass the village of Latrun, home of the penitent thief, the village, a few straggling houses on steep hills rising from the valley of Ajalon. Up these steep hills, in his earlier days, the thief had carried the spoils of arson and burglary, and down them he had borne the heavier burden of a guilty heart. But higher than these hills he mounted, after he had re- pented, from the transfixed posture on the cross to the bosom of a forgiving God.

Now we come to the brook Elah, from which little David took the smooth stones with which he prostrated Goliath. There is a bridge span- ning the ravine, but at the season we crossed, there is not a drop of water in the brook. We went down into the ravine and walked amid the pebbles that had been washed smooth, very smooth, by the rush of the waters through all the ages. There is where David armed himself.

He walked around and picked up five of these polished pebbles. He got them of just the right size. He prepared himself for five volleys, so that if the giant escapes the first, he will not es- cape the whole five. The topography of the place so corresponds with the Bible story that I could see go on. It is the only fight I ever did watch. Here were two champions, the one God-ap- pointed, the other Satan-appointed, and decid- ing the destiny of a nation, the destiny of a world. It was a Marathon, an Arbela, a Water- loo, a Blenheim, a Sedan, concentrated into two right arms. Here are two ridges of mountains five hundred feet high, the Philistines on one ridge, the Israelites on the other ridge. The fight is in the valley between, at that season shaded, and sweet with terebinth and acacia. David, the champion for the Israelites, Goliath the champion for the Philistines. David un- der-sized and almost effeminate, only a mouth- ful for Goliath, who was nearly ten feet high.

They advance to meet each other, but the Bible says that David made the first step for- ward. Nearer and nearer they come, but I do not think David will wait until he comes within reach of Goliath's sword, for that would be fatal, and David has a weap- on with which he can fight at long range. Closer and closer they come, but David advan- ces the more rap- idly. "Come to me," said the giant, "and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air and to the beasts of the field." You see Goliath going to give David for a banquet to the vulture and jackal. He, the mountain of flesh, will fall over on that little hillock. I hear him laugh through the mouth-piece of his helmet. He will toast the little whiffet on the top of his long sword. He will call all the crows for a breakfast. "Come to me you contemptible little fellow, and I will make quick work with you. The idea that a five-footer should dare to come out against a ten-footer! Let the two armies looking down from the ridges watch me!" David responded: "I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts." Aha, that is

The Right Kind of Battle-shout.

"In the name of the Lord of Hosts!" How that cry rings through the Wady-es-Sumpt! He who fights in that spirit wins the day. The almost Israelitish dwarf enlarges into omni- potent proportions. The moment to strike has come. David takes his sling with a stone in it and whirls it round, and round his head, until he has put the weapon into sufficient momen- tum, and then, taking sure aim, hurls it. The giant throws up his hands and reels back and falls. The stone sank into his forehead. That was the only available point of attack. But how about the helmet on his head? Did the stone that David flung crush through the helmet? No; an old rabbi says he thinks that when Goliath scoffed at David, the giant so suddenly and con- temptuously jerked up his head that the helmet fell off. That is like enough. David saw the bare forehead, a foot high, and aimed at the centre of it, and the skull cracked and broke in like an eggshell, and the ground shook as this great oak of a military chieftain struck it. Huz- zah for David!

But we must hasten on, for the danger now is that night will be upon us before we reach Jeru- salem. Oh! we must see it before sundown. We are climbing the hills which are terraced with olive groves, uplands rising above uplands, until we come to an immensity of barrenness, gray rocks above gray rocks, where neither tree, nor leaf, nor bush, nor grass-blade, can grow. The horses stumble, and slip, and pull, till it seems the harness must break. Solemnity and awe take possession of us. Though a vivacious party, and during part of the day jocularity had reigned, now no one spoke a word except to say to the dragoman, "Tell us when you get the first glimpse of the city." I never had such high expectation of seeing any place as of seeing Jerusalem. I think my feelings may have been slightly akin to that of the Christian just about to enter the heavenly Jerusalem. My ideas of the earthly Jerusalem were bewildering. Had I not seen pictures of it? Oh, yes; but they only increase the bewilderment. They were taken from a variety of standpoints. If twenty artists attempt to sketch Brooklyn, or New York, or London, or Jerusalem, they will plant their cameras at different places, and take as many different pictures, but in a few minutes I shall see

The Sacred City.

Over another shoulder of the hill we go, and nothing in sight but rocks and mountains, and awful gulches between them, which make the head swim if you look down. On and up, on and up, until the lathered and smoking horses are reined in, and the dragoman rises in front, and points eastward, crying, "Jerusalem!" It was mightier than an electric shock. We all rose. There it lay, the prize of nations, the terminus of famous pilgrimages, the object of Roman and crusading wars, and for it Assyrians had fought, and Egyptians had fought, and the world had fought; the place which the Queen of Sheba visited, and Richard Cœur de Lion had conquered. Home of Solomon. Home of Ezekiel. Home of Jeremiah. Home of Isaiah. Home of Saladin. Mount Zion of David's heart-break, and Mount Moriah, where the sacrifices smoked, Mount of Olives where Jesus preached, and Gethsemane where He agonized, and Golgotha where He died, and the Holy Sepulchre where He was buried. O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Greatest city on earth, and type of the city celestial.

After I have been ten thousand years in heaven, the memory of that first view from the rocks on the afternoon of December 2d, will be as vivid as now. An Arab on a horse that was like a whirlwind, bitted and saddled and spurred, its mane and flanks jet as the night—and there are no such horsemen as Arab horsemen—had come far out to meet us, and invite us to his hotel inside the gates. But arrangements had been made for us to stay at a hotel outside the gates. In the dusk of evening we halted in front of the place and entered, but I said, "No, thank you for your courteous reception, but I must sleep to-night

Inside the Gates of Jerusalem.

I would rather have the poorest place inside the gates than the best place outside." So we remounted our coach and moved on amid a clamor of voices, and between camels grunting with great beams and timbers on their back, brought in for building purposes—for it is amazing how much a camel can carry—until we came to what is called the Joppa Gate of Jerusalem. It is about forty feet wide, twenty feet deep, and sixty feet high. There is a sharp turn just after you have entered, so planned as to make the entrance of armed enemies the more difficult. On the structure of these gates the safety of Jerusalem depended and all the Bible writers used them for illustrations. Within five minutes' walk of the gate we entered. David wrote: "Enter into thy gates with thanksgiving," "Lift up your heads, O ye gates!" "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion," "Open to me the gates of righteousness." And Isaiah wrote: "Go through, go through the gates." And the captive of Patmos wrote: "The city had twelve gates." Having passed the gate we went on through the narrow streets, dimly lighted, and passed to our halting-place, and sat down by the window from which we could see Mount Zion, and said: "Here we are at last, in the capital of the whole earth." And thoughts of the past and the future rushed through my soul in quick succession, and I thought of that old hymn, sung by so many ascending spirits:

Jerusalem, my happy home,
Name ever dear to me!

When shall my labors have an end,
In joy and peace and thee?

When shall these eyes thy heav'n-built walls
And pearly gates behold?
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?

And so with our hearts full of gratitude to God for journeying mercies all the way from Joppa to Jerusalem, and with bright anticipation of our entrance into the shining gate of the heavenly city when earthly journeys are over, my second day in Palestine is ended.

DEAF MUTES AND THE GOSPEL.

HOW GOD'S LOVE IS MADE KNOWN BY THE LANGUAGE OF SIGNS AND GESTURES.

The Educational System at the New York Institution—How the Sign-Language was Invented—Rev. Dr. Gallaudet's Noble Work—Principal Peet's Interesting Explanation—The Dying Deaf-Mute Boy's Bible—A Totally Darkened Soul Illuminated—The Case of Richard T. Clinton—"Children of Silence" no Longer Ignorant and Isolated Beings.

ONE of the most cheering signs of our Christian age is the progress made in the education and moral enlightenment of our "silent friends," the deaf-mutes. Until a comparatively recent period, the intellectual scope of these unfortunates was quite restricted. Not till the godly and accomplished blind deaf-mute, Laura Bridgman, surprised the scientific world by her marvellous acquirements in the face of seemingly insurmountable natural impediments, was the attention of public educators seriously directed toward the higher mental and moral development of these benighted beings. That the efforts in that direction have been successful beyond all expectation, is shown by a visit to any one of the numerous institutions for the education of the deaf-mutes that are now to be found scattered all over the Union.

One of the instrumentalities effective in this humane and Christian work has been

The Improved Sign-language, known as the Gallaudet system, whereby the deaf-mute can give absolutely full expression to his ideas, intelligently to others. This sign-language as now used among deaf-mutes here and in Europe, was the invention of the Abbe l'Epee, who founded the first institution for their education. It is said to have been suggested to him by observing the pantomimic gestures of the Parisian street gamins. The system has been popularized both here and abroad by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Gallaudet, whose father did much to bring it to perfection. Dr. Gallaudet is a member of the Board of Instruction in the New York Institution for Deaf-mutes and is also the founder and executive officer of the Gallaudet Home for Deaf-mutes near Poughkeepsie, a charity which shelters about thirty aged deaf-mutes, all more or less educated in the sign-language.

There is an affinity between this natural sign-language and the dumb pantomime employed by the Indians, and by savage races generally as a substitute for speech when the latter cannot be used as a means of communication. Comprising hundreds of different gestures of hands, head, body, eyes, and lips, this sign-language is capable of expressing almost every emotion, fact or idea. "Man" is indicated by touching the head, as though lifting the cap; "will see" by waving the open right hand from the right ear to the eyes, to which the extended fingers point; "imagine" by touching the forehead with the forefinger and bringing the hand forward in a curve; "remember" by raising the face and resting the closed hand on the forehead; "think" by leaning the head to one side and resting it upon the knuckles; "forget" by claspings the forehead and suddenly removing the hand ward, with the thumb pointing over the shoulder; "intend" by touching the forehead with the index finger and bringing the hand with the index finger pointing forward. And on, through a wide range of expressions, and secular, this mimic speech in conjunction with the single-hand alphabet (an example which is shown on the first page), has been expanded until the deaf-mute no longer himself isolated, but an active, interested member of society with all the avenues of spiritual welfare open to him.

Among those who have done much to enlarge the mental and moral horizon of the deaf-mute, is Prof. Isaac Lewis Peet, LL.D., Principal of the Educational Department of the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, the son of the founder of the institution, late Harvey Prindle Peet. This splendidly organized public charity was chartered in 1815 by Governor De Witt Clinton of New York, and was the first of seven similar establishments for the training of the unfortunate deaf-mutes. It occupies handsome buildings, surrounding extensive grounds, on the west side of New York City. The illustration on the first page shows the main building. Here from birth to four hundred young people are and almost without exception, as ignorant and unenlightened savages, are taught to so express themselves as to be intelligible to their friends. The spiritual training of these unfortunates is a matter of the greatest solicitude and interest to the Rev. Dr. Gallaudet, Dr. Peet and those associated with them in this task have been abundantly blessed. The great truths of the Gospel have been made familiar to them, to whom God and Christ were unknown. A good seed has been sown which has already borne fruit in many instances, into noble and happy Christian lives.

Speaking of the religious training of deaf-mutes, Dr. Peet said to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Our moral and religious teaching is absolutely unsectarian. These young people to us totally ignorant of the English language and with no conception whatever of Divine Being or their relations to Him. We do not for the instruction they receive here would be worse off than the heathen. Attending daily worship in the chapel, receiving special instruction in the class-rooms, their minds are opened and they begin to realize they have a Father in heaven and a Saviour who came to earth to save souls and to set an example of what man, in his human nature, ought to be. They also learn the great truths of Atonement and its significance. All these truths are learned by degrees and very slowly."

"How are these truths conveyed to their minds?"

"One of our methods is a series of exceedingly simple Scripture lessons in book form. These are used after the pupils have been taught to associate printed characters with the ideas to which they correspond. These lessons tell of God; where He is, what the soul is immortal, and the story of His life and His life on earth. We proceed first by simple contrasts like these:

Some men are wise; God is All-wise.
All men will die; God will never die.
Men are often wicked; God is holy.

"In this way, the attributes of the Father are explained and from this we pass to the attitude toward man, man's duty to obey, the soul and its nature, and the destiny of the soul after death. This extract from our manual will give you an idea of the gradual process of opening up these darkened minds."

A Conception of Immortality:

Man has a body and a soul. Spirits have no bodies. They have no souls. The body feels hunger, thirst, heat, cold, and sickness. The soul hopes and fears. The soul loves and hates. The soul thinks, knows, remembers, learns, and repents. The soul is happy and unhappy. The body of the soul never dies. The soul of the good will be saved.

The souls of the wicked will be miserable in hell. If good and pious, we shall be happy after death in heaven; angels for ever.

he truths thus gradually unfolded are fully rehended by the earnest, serious minds of deaf-mutes. 100,000 copies of our little man-Scripture lessons have been printed by the ican Tract Society for the use of children cannot hear or speak, and it has been found fully effective. To some of our children, the book becomes very dear. I remember bright boy of seven, who lay dying. He not bear to be parted for a moment from the book, which he called his Bible. He ed on having it

Nor is the secular education of the deaf-mutes forgotten. In all of the great institutions, including those at Buffalo, Rochester, Malone, Rome and elsewhere in New York State, and also in many others throughout the country, the same improved system of education prevails.

Nearly all of the deaf-mute institutions in the United States are supported by public moneys, either from city or State or both, and by voluntary contributions. The State selects pupils, on the application of the parents. The institutions are deserving of the highest encouragement, as not only tending to make intelligent and self-supporting citizens of a peculiarly unfortunate class, but to bring to a real and living knowledge of the Redeemer and His love many precious souls that would otherwise have remained in darkness and ignorance.

THE SWISS REVOLUTION.

NOT many revolutions in Europe, in the present century at least, have been accompanied by fewer acts of violence and less peril to life than that which recently occurred in Switzerland. It began in the small Canton of Ticino and from thence spread to other cantons. The revolution does not impair the constitutional status of Ticino, as part of the Swiss Federal Republic. The Republic is composed of twenty-two Cantons: Berne, Zurich, Vaud, Aargau, St. Gall, Lucerne, Ticino, Freiburg, the Grisons, the Valais, Thurgau, Basle, Neuchâtel, Geneva, Solothurn, Appenzell, Glarus, Schaffhausen, Unterwalden, Schwyz, Uri, and Zug, in the order of their population, represented proportionately in the National Assembly. Ticino, which ranks seventh among these Cantons, has a population, mostly Italian-speaking, of 122,000, its chief towns being the capital, Bellinzona, Locarno and Lugano, Bellinzona (which is shown in the illustration), is on the banks of the river Ticino.

It appears that the Cantonal Government, which has long been in the hands of the Ultramontane priestly party, and by which the administration of the finances has been ill-managed, was guilty of violating the Constitution, having refused to comply with a legal demand, made by more than the prescribed number of citizens, on Aug. 9, to elect an Assembly for the purpose of revising the Constitution of the Canton. In consequence of this, on Sept. 11, Liberals from all parts of the Canton, assembling at Bellinzona, surprised the guard of the arsenal, took possession of guns and stores, and entered the Council-house of the Government, led by an advocate named Bruni: they arrested three Councillors of State—Messrs. Crespini, Castella, and Granella—and one, M. Rossi, was accidentally shot in a scuffle on the stairs; the others took flight.

The victorious party then appointed a Provisional Government, and convened an Assembly; but next day the Federal Council of Switzerland, at Berne, having got reports of the affair, sent two battalions of Swiss troops, with a commissioner, M. Kuengli, to restore order. The Provisional Government abdicated and it was arranged that, on Sept. 28, the question of revising the Constitution should be submitted to a popular vote.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Horror of Life-Preservers is Avowed by a lady in New York. She says that if she were on a boat when an accident occurred and a life preserver were within reach, she should not use it, as she had heard that they only made drowning certain, if they were not properly adjusted. She would prefer to take her chance in the water without one. A correspondent of a daily journal, quoting her remark, suggests that pictures be exhibited on all ferry-boats and excursion steamers, depicting a man, in the act of fastening a life preserver on his body in the right way, so that every one might learn how to use them in an emergency. The suggestion is excellent and it might, if carried out, lead to the saving of many lives. The pictures, however, would do no good unless passengers looked at them and learned from them. Probably many would take no notice of them, thinking they would never have occasion to use a life-preserver. In the far more momentous matter of the saving of the soul, which concerns every one, such indifference is displayed. God's word is neglected, and the appeals of preachers are unheeded. (Job 12: 5.)

A Strange Offer to a Millionaire was Recently sent to him at Helena, Mont. The Independent of that city states that a man, whose sudden success in mining a few months ago, made him the talk of the country, has received a large number of letters suggesting opportunities for investment. One of them, purporting to be written by a clergyman, stated that the writer was sure of a place in heaven, but was willing to sell the right to it to a man rich enough to buy. He offered it to the successful miner for half his fortune, or half a million dollars. The investment was urged in the terms that real estate agents use in recommending the purchase of a house, and the vendor offered to make affidavit as to the value of the place, and the validity of his title to it. Doubtless the writer of the letter was no clergyman, but a common swindler who counted on the miner's credulity. In this, however, he was disappointed, for the miner knew enough of the Bible to be aware that a title to a seat in heaven, like the title to some kinds of earthly property, is "not transferable," is never placed on the market, but is offered freely to all who through Christ become sons of God. (Rom. 8: 17.)

A Little Girl's Heroism Saved her Brother's life on September 27, in Brooklyn, N. Y. Early on that day a high apartment house caught fire from an overturned lamp. A woman who lived on the fourth floor was awakened by the alarm of fire. Her family consisted of five children, and these she hurriedly wrapped in blankets and brought out into the street. One of the children—a little boy nine years old—remembered that there was a half-dollar in the pocket of his clothes and he began to cry over the loss. He could see no flames in the house, and thought there would be no danger in going back to get the money. So watching his opportunity, while his mother stood on the street waiting for the arrival of the engines, he darted back into the house and ran up stairs. His mother dared not leave the other children to go after him, but his thirteen-year-old sister ran to his rescue. The house was full of dense smoke, but the little girl, covering her mouth with her blanket, bravely held on her way. She found her brother unconscious and almost suffocated on the floor outside his bed-room door. With a strength astonishing in so small a child, she half carried and half dragged him through the blinding smoke to the street, where in the fresh air he recovered. There are two matters which it may be hoped he will learn from the event and never forget. One is, the folly of imperiling his life to save his money; and the second is the love of his sister in braving death to save him. In these days Christians need to be reminded of two analogous lessons. Only too many think more of their property than they do of their spiritual life; and they forget Him who gave His life to save them from eternal death. (Titus 2: 12-14.)

THE SPIRIT OF TRUE SERVICE.

S. S. LESSON BY MRS. M. BAXTER FOR OCT. 19.
LUKE 22 : 24-37 ; GOLDEN TEXT, Phil. 2 : 5.

Verse 24, A Strife Common in All Communities—The Good of the Common Cause Subordinated to Individual Selfishness.—Ver. 25, Benefactors or Doers of Good Seldom in Authority.—Vers. 26 and 27, A New Law—Not Yet Obeyed—Greatness in Service.—Vers. 28 and 30, Faithfulness in Trial—The Reward Promised.—Vers. 31 and 32, Christ's Knowledge of Coming Ordeals—His Sympathy and Prayer.—Ver. 33, The Impulsive Man's Self-Confidence.—Ver. 34, Christ's Knowledge of Approaching Defection.—Vers. 35 and 36, The Means to be Used Though the Work May Go on Without Them.—Ver. 37, The End of the Things Concerning Christ—The Object of Them.

AND there was a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Strife when the Lord Jesus sat at the table, when the feast was that of the Passover lamb of which Christ, was the antitype! How little the disciples understood the signification of that lamb slain, of that sprinkled blood on the two side-posts, and on the upper door-post of the house. In less than twenty-four hours, the blood of Jesus Christ was to be shed. He was to be the sprinkled door by which every soul should gain entrance into heaven. Jesus had taken bread, and blessed it, and said: "This is my body which is given for you;" and He had also taken the cup, and told them to divide it among themselves, saying: "This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you;" and He had, moreover, said before the beginning of the feast: "With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer." He was filled with the thought of their salvation, and they were filled with the thought "which of them should be accounted the greatest!" What a revulsion of feeling to our Lord! How easy it would have been for Him, if he had had a heart like ours, to tear Himself away in disgust from those disciples, but He did not: "Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end." Yes, in spite of all He loved them. And, beloved,

In Spite of All We Are,

He loves us. Do not doubt the love of Jesus. If He presses you into a corner by some suffering, do not doubt His love. His purpose may be veiled, but never, never for a minute doubt the love of Jesus.

"And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." A strife at such an hour! But, you see they had not the spirit of Christ; His blood had not yet been shed; they could not be divine, because divine life could not be imparted until it was poured out on the cross; but when it was poured out, He could give His Spirit and His thoughts to them. He was now outside them, but, by-and-bye, Christ would dwell in their hearts by faith. Jesus had patience with them until His blood was shed.

Some of you have trials and temptations, suffering in body and suffering of other kinds, and what do these things mean? The Lord is trying to bring you to a point where you see your life, and hopes, and resolutions come to nothing, and where you have to lay down your life, to be an instrument through which His life can flow. It is only Divine Life that can do Divine things; it is only the Divine Spirit in us that can make us divine. It is Impossible to Nature.

"And He said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors." (V. 25) This sounds like sarcasm in the lips of the Lord Jesus. "But ye shall not be so," He adds: "but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve." (V. 26.) Don't you remember that, at that very table, before they had sat down to meat, Jesus had taken a towel and girded Himself, and poured water into a basin, and washed the disciples' feet and wiped them with the towel with which He was girded? He had Himself taken the place of him that serves. It is written in Gal. 5 : 1 ;

"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage." And taking up the same thought (in V. 13,) Paul says: "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another." "I am among you as He that Serveth."

"Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations." What is this? Is He praising them, and they have just been quarrelling about who should be greatest, while He was within an hour of the bloody sweat under the pressure of their sins and ours? What! could He speak to them about their faith when they were so unfaithful? He "loved them unto the end," and every little thing He could say to them to encourage them, He did say. How could He? Because He was free from self. If He had been thinking of what they owed Him after He came down from heaven, after His being born a poor man, and just now He was about to take upon Himself their sins, and that they at such an hour quarrelled in their littleness, as to who should be greatest. It would have been difficult for Him to recognize any good in them. But "God is love," and love always finds out the best points, and so He remembered: "You twelve have not left me, but have continued with me" under all circumstances; the Pharisees and scribes have tried to take away my life, but you have remained faithful to me; the seventy I cannot find, and the many I have healed have deserted me, but, "You have continued with me." "He loved them unto the end."

We cannot Imitate,

and imitation would soon break down, but we can follow the Lord, and let Him live in us His wondrous supernatural life. Just when our selfish life is given up to Him to deal with He sometimes lets us suffer. Do not think first how to get rid of the pains, or trouble, but "How can I let myself go into His hand?" When you understand the lesson of your Lord, His hands will be free to heal you; but if He healed you now as you are, with a heart full of selfishness, it would not benefit you. But He wants you to be healed of self, and it is easy for Him to heal disease, when this real disease of self is healed.

"Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom." (28, 29.) You need not strive about a little place down here; I have appointed unto you a kingdom; you are going to be kings. You need not struggle, your time is not yet; "I appoint unto you a kingdom," and it is not a kingdom where one of you will be over another, a kingdom in which Peter will be over John, and Matthew over James: "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (29, 30.) Not judging one another, you have to be equal "members one of another." (Rom. 12 : 5.) God is gathering together in one the children of God scattered abroad. (John 11 : 52.) He wants you to be united.

"And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, (obtained you by asking, R.V. margin),

That He May Sift You.

as wheat." That is a wonderful word. Satan wanted to sift them as wheat, but Satan cannot use his sieve without permission; He called Satan's attention to Job: "Hast thou considered my servant Job; that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?" (1 : 8.) Just as though God had said. "Now, Satan, try thy best with this man of God."

Some of you are oppressed; blow upon blow comes upon you, and you cannot understand it, God is making you a theatre in which Satan contends for mastery with God. Don't flinch; God wants soldiers who can stand fire—fire from principalities and powers in heavenly places. Don't say God hath forgotten you, but praise God for all. There is a heroism in Christianity—heroism in which there is no pride, but a great deal of lowliness.

"Satan has desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat."

Satan Cannot See the Gold

in us; he has no eye for the divine; he can see the self in us; it is God's eye that sees gold. Satan thought he could have easy victory over Peter and the rest of the disciples, but he did not know how the Refiner and Purifier at the side of the furnace, watching the gold which could be seen from the heaven side, not from the hell side.

"I have prayed for thee." (V. 32.) Before Peter went into the crucible, Jesus said: "I have prayed for thee." "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." It is a wonderful thought. You feel a comfort when you know that the Christian prays for you at certain times; but just shut your eyes and think, "He ever liveth to make intercession for me, to pray for me." He whose prayers are always answered, pray for me." "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." When we have passed through the furnace, then we can help others.

And poor Peter, with all the energy and enthusiasm of his nature said: "I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death." He thought so, poor man; and many of us think we are ready to suffer, but when a difficulty comes in our house or elsewhere, something no one knows about, we sink under it. The Lord said: "Whither I go, thou shalt not follow me now; but thou shalt follow afterwards." Peter said: "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now?" (John 13 : 36, 37.) He could not, because he had only natural strength depend upon, and it needs

Divine Power to do Divine Things.

He could not follow Jesus to death then; when Jesus died and poured out His life, He gave His own life to His disciples, then Peter could follow Him, and he did follow Him to the cross, for he died by crucifixion. Shall we follow Christ now? You cannot by wrestling and struggling; you can follow Him only giving yourselves up to Him, and letting Him live His life in you. By His life, His strength, His faithfulness, His influence in you, we shall follow Jesus.

Jackson's Description of Madison.*

MADISON, the President, is a very plain and rather mean-looking little man, with great simplicity of manners, and an inveterate enemy to form and ceremony; so much so that I was officially informed that my introduction to him was to be considered as nothing more than the reception of one gentleman by another, and that no particular dress was to be worn on the occasion,—all of which I was willing to acquiesce in. Accordingly I went in afternoon frock, and found the President in similar attire. Smith, the Secretary of State, who had walked from his office to join me, on a pair of dusty boots, and his round hat in his hand. When he had introduced us, he retired, and the President then asked me to sit in a chair. While we were talking, a negro servant brought in some glasses of punch and seed-cake. The former, as I had been in reference the whole morning, served very agreeably to wet, or whet my whistle, and still more strongly to contrast this audience with other had had with most of the sovereigns of Europe.

A Sea Battle in the Dark. (1811.)

By the dim light Rodgers saw the support "Guerriere," her maintopsail to the mast, with ing with apparent confidence the next act of the audacious American frigate which had chased a British man-of-war all day, and had last run up close to windward,—a manoeuvre which British frigates were disposed to resist. To this point the report showed no great disagreement; but in regard to what followed, the story was told by Rodgers and all his ship's company.

* From the History of the United States during the First Administration of James Madison, by Henry Adams, a comprehensive narrative of a very important epoch of American history, with interesting private correspondence. Two volumes; 960 pp. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

while a wholly different story was told by British captain and his officers. Rodgers told that while rounding to, he hailed the own vessel through his trumpet, calling "What ship is that?" The question "What ship is that?" was immediately echoed.

Rodgers had time to tell his acting captain that the President was forging too fast, before he hailed again: "What ship is that?" Instantly a flash was seen from the ark where the stranger's hull lay, and a report told the ball had struck the President lodging in the mainmast. Taken by surprise, Rodgers turned to his commandant of the ship and asked, "What on earth was that?" Before he gave an order his third lieutenant, under James Dallas, who was watching at the port forward of the gangway, and saw ash, leaped to one of the guns and fired it. Then Rodgers gave the order to fire, and the President opened with a whole side, followed by another. In about five minutes the enemy seemed to be silenced, and Rodgers gave the order to cease firing; but three minutes afterward the stranger fired again, and the President resumed fire. She desisted. From the President's deck, Rodgers could be seen of the enemy's behavior. He thought that whoever she might be, she was the Guerriere; and Rodgers then made mark that either she had received some fatal shot at the outset or she was a vessel very inferior to what he had taken for, although she was still supposed to be no less than a thirty-six gun frigate.

Rodgers hailed once more, and understood the answer that she was a British ship in great distress. At nine o'clock the President began to repair damages, about within reach, on different tacks lights displayed, until day-break, when she hove to the British vessel, and sent a boat aboard. Then at last Rodgers learned, certainly to his great disappointment, that he had sighted a single-decked vessel of less than his force.

Battle of Tippecanoe Creek. (1811.) Harrison's own account were correct, he had with him only eight hundred men. Sixty had been killed or mortally wounded, and nearly a hundred and fifty wounded to with him in his retreat. His effective force was diminished more than one fourth, according to his biographer; his camp contained little flour and no meat, for the few beavers left with the army were either driven away by Indians or stamped by the noise of the battle; and his only base of supplies was at Vincennes, one hundred and seventy miles away. Indians could return in great numbers but his force must steadily grow weaker. Harrison was naturally a cautious man; he felt the dangers that surrounded him, and his men felt them not less.

Although Harrison did not venture to send out scout for twenty-four hours, but remained awaiting attack, no further sign of hostilities were given. "Night," said one of the scouts, "I found every man mounting guard, without fire or light, and in a drizzling rain. Indian dogs, during the dark hours, frequent alarms by prowling in search of food about the sentinels." On the morning of November 8, the dragoons and mounted riflemen approached the town and found it deserted. Apparently the Indians had fled in haste, leaving everything even a few new English guns and powder. The army took what supplies needed and set fire to the village. Meanwhile every preparation had been made for retreat. The wagons could scarcely carry all the baggage, and Harrison abandoned the camp and private baggage. "We managed, however, to bring off the public property," he wrote. At noon of November 9 the train departed, and by nightfall had passed the dangerous woods and broken country where a few enemies could have stopped it. No Indians appeared; the march was undisturbed; and following a company of the U. S. Fourth Regiment at Fort Harrison, the rest of the force arrived, November 18, at Vincennes. The battle of Tippecanoe at once became a point of pride throughout the Western country, and Harrison received the official applause and thanks of Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois.

THE TRANSLATED ONES.

BY GEORGE H. PEMBER, M. A.

An Impending Event—Vacant Places in the Church—Consolation of Those Who are Left—Taking and Receiving—An Agonizing Experience—A Privilege to be Desired—The Reward of Watchfulness.

THE world will one day be surprised by the sudden and unaccountable disappearance of many persons in the midst of their ordinary occupations. Two men will be working in the field; one will instantaneously vanish. His bewildered comrade may still see upon the ground the garment which had been put off for labor, but the man will be gone. Two women will be grinding the daily supply of corn in the early morning; the hand of one will fail; her companion will look up and see that she is no longer in her place. Two persons will be in the same bed at night; the one will be taken away, and the other will awake to solitude and bereavement (Matt. 24: 40; Luke 17: 34). As soon as this sign is given, then woe for the earth and the sea! Those who shall be accounted worthy to escape will have been removed from the world; the Holy Spirit will no longer restrain the mystery of lawlessness, nor will the judgments of God be delayed.

With regard to the meaning of the words, "one shall be taken," an error has sometimes been made through ignorance of the original. Comparing the clause with that of Matt. 25: 39, "the flood came and took them all away," some have interpreted, "the one shall be taken away in judgment, the other shall be spared in mercy." But an examination of the Greek immediately dissipates this idea. In the 39th verse the verb used means "to take away by destruction." But in the 40th and 41st verses we find a very different word which properly signifies "to receive," or "take alongside," and then sometimes, "to take with one as a companion." Thus the word is most appropriately used of those who shall be caught up to Christ, that they may walk with Him in white, that they may follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.

In the 14th chapter of John it occurs in a Very Significant Passage.

"For if I go and prepare a place for you, I am coming again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." Here it is used of the very act of which the Lord speaks in Matthew.

Again, in another place, we are told that the Lord "taketh" Peter, James and John, as His companions to the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17: 1). He selects three out of the twelve disciples to behold His glory; while the nine are, in the meantime, left at the bottom of the hill to struggle hopelessly with Satan in the person of the demoniac youth, and consequently to be subjected to the scorn of the world, until at length the Master is seen descending the hill in company with those whom He had taken with Him.

Surely this scene is typical of the fact that the one is taken to be a companion of the Lord and to see His glory, while the other is with the world and Satan as a further discipline; for the admonition to watch in the next verse seems to imply that both of the two are disciples.

Having thus described the sign of His presence, the Lord proceeds to urge upon His followers the necessity of watching, and intimates, by the parable of the householder and the thief, that grievous loss will be sustained by those who neglect His directions. Many other such warnings may be found in the Scriptures, and the special object of watching is plainly set forth in the Lord's own exhortation, uttered just after He had been portraying the terrors of the last week of seven years that will close this dispensation:—(Luke 21: 24-27)—"Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Daniel 9: 27; Luke 21: 24-27, 36.)

These words certainly intimate that a Christian, though sure of eternal life, is not sure of being removed before the commencement of the final Great Tribulation. This favor will be granted only to those who have progressed in holiness, only to those who have been so strengthened with might in the inner man that they have been able to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Such a growth in grace may, indeed, be attained by all believers; the power of prayer and watching is given to every man at his conversion; but he must be willing to deny himself, to take up his cross, and to follow his Master. Then there will be no doubt as to the issue: for "faithful is He that calleth you, Who will also do it."

But the Lord has no thought of translating Worldly-Minded Believers from the toils of life into the joy of His presence, of admitting them to immortality by the gate of glory instead of the dark valley of death. Those who vainly expect such a thing are like the Jews, who would have had Christ put Himself at their head as the all-victorious King, when as yet He had not saved them from their sins. But He will not grant to the careless and slothful servant that blessing which Paul craved, yet did not receive (II. Cor. 5: 24)—the joy of being clothed upon, without the necessity of shuffling off this mortal coil. Hence, in His promise to the Philadelphians, He says, "Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I will also keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." (Rev. 3: 10.)

It thus appears that not all believers will be caught up to the Lord at the commencement of His Second Advent, but Only Those Who are Found Watching.

It is, indeed, true that Paul, after speaking of Christ's descent into the air, adds, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up," without any mention of exceptions to the rule, (I. Thess. 4: 16, 17.) But other Scriptures show that his words are to be regarded as a general statement, expressing what ought to be, and potentially may be, the case with every Christian. Similarly, in another place, he says, "It is appointed unto men once to die;" yet the very next verse reveals the secret that some will escape death. And in his first Epistle to the Corinthians he discloses the mystery that we shall not all sleep.

Just in the same general way the Lord said to His disciples, "Verily, I say unto you that ye which have followed me, . . . ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." But Judas had followed Him, and was at that time one of the twelve; will he also occupy a throne in the regeneration? Nay, we know from the authority of the Scripture that his own "place," to which he went was in the realms of the lost. There need, therefore, be no difficulty in regard to the passage in the Epistle to the Thessalonians. The members of the body of Christ will not be completely gathered to Him until the close of the Second Advent.

Accordingly—although we have previously heard of some who were tabernacled in the heaven, of a hundred and forty-four thousand who were purchased from among men, to be the first fruits unto God and unto the Lamb, and of others who are standing on a sea of glass mingled with fire, singing their song of victory over the Beast and his image—there is no mention of a full assembly of the Church until the Lord appears in glory, when He is crowned by the armies (Rev. 19: 14.) which are in the heaven, the different divisions which make up the one body. And then we read in (Rev. 20: 5) "This is the First Resurrection."

ALWAYS BOYS AND GIRLS.

THE good, healthy man, sixty years of age, is only a boy with added experience. A woman is only an old girl. Summer is but an older spring. August is May in its teens. We shall be useful in proportion as we keep young in our feelings. There is no use for fossils except in museums and on the shelf. I like young old folks. Indeed, we all keep doing over again what we did in childhood. You thought that long ago you had finished with "Blind-man's-buff," and "Hide-and-seek," and "Puss-in-the-corner," and "Tick-tack-to," and "Leap-frog," but all our lives are passed in playing those old games over again.

You say: "What a racket those children make in the other room! When Squire Jones's boys come over to spend the evening with our children, it seems as if they would tear the house down!" "Father, be patient!" the wife says; "we once played 'Blind-man's-buff' ourselves." Sure enough, father is playing it now, if he only knew it. Much of our time in life we go about blindfolded, stumbling over mistakes, trying to catch things that we miss, while people stand round the ring, and titter, and break out with half-suppressed laughter, and push us ahead, and twitch the corner of our eye-bandage; after awhile we vehemently clutch something with both hands, and announce to the world our capture; the blindfold is taken from our eyes, and, amid the shouts of the surrounding spectators, we find we have, after all, caught the wrong thing. What is that but "Blind-man's-buff" over again?

You say: "Jenny and Harry, go to bed. It seems so silly for you to sit there making two parallel lines perpendicular, and two parallel lines horizontal, and filling up the blanks with crosses and o's, and then crying out: 'Tick-tack-to.'" My dear man, you are doing every day in business just what your children are doing in the nursery. You find it hard to get things into a line. You have started out for worldly successes. You get one or two things fixed, but that is not what you want. After a while you have had two fine successes. You say: "If I can have a third success, I will come out ahead." But somebody is busy on the same slate, trying to hinder you getting the game. You mark: he marks. I think you will win. To the first and second success which you have already gained, you add the third, for which you have long been seeking. The game is yours, and you clap your hands, and hunch your opponent in the side, and shout:

"Tick-tack-to,
Three in a row."

The funniest play that I ever joined in at school, and one that sets me a-laughing now as I think of it, so that I can hardly write, is "Leap-frog." It is unartistic and homely. It is so humiliating to the boy who bends himself over, and puts his hands down on his knees; and it is so perilous to the boy who, placing his hands on the stooped shoulders, attempts to fly over. But I always preferred the risk of the one who attempted the leap rather than the humiliation of the one who consented to be vaulted over. It was often the case that we both failed in our part, and we went down together. For this, Jack Snyder carried a grudge against me, and would not speak, because he said I pushed him down on purpose.

Almost every autumn I see that old-time school-boy feat repeated. Mr. So-and-so says: "You make me governor, and I will see that you get to be senator. Make me mayor, and I will see that you become assessor. Get me the office of street-sweeper, and you shall have one of the brooms. You stoop down and let me jump over you, and then I will stoop down and let you jump over me. Elect me deacon, and you shall be trustee. You write a good thing about me, and I will write a good thing about you." The day of election in Church or State arrives. A man once very upright in his principles and policy begins to bend. You cannot understand it. He goes down lower and lower, until he gets his hands away down on his knees. The nan active politician or ecclesiastic comes up behind him, puts his hand upon the bowed strategist, and springs clear over into some great position. Good thing to have so good a man in a prominent place. But after awhile he himself begins to bend. Everybody says: "What is the matter now? It cannot be possible that he is going down, too." Oh! yes Turn about is fair play. Jack Snyder holds it against me to this day, because after he had stooped down to let me leap over him, I would not stoop down and let him leap over me. One half the strange things in Church and State may be accounted for by the fact that, ever since Adam bowed down so low as to let the race, putting its hands on him, fly over into ruin; there has been a universal tendency to political and ecclesiastical "Leap-frog."

In one sense, life is a great "game of ball." We all choose sides, and gather into denominational and political parties. We take our places on the ball-ground. Some are to pitch; they are the Radicals. Some are to catch: they are the Conservatives. Some are to strike: they are those fond of polemics and battle. Some are to run: they are the candidates. There are four goals: youth, manhood, old age, and death. Some one takes the bat, lifts it, and strikes for the prize, and misses it; while the man who was behind catches it and goes in. This man takes his turn at the bat, sees the flying ball of success, takes good aim and strikes it high, amid the clapping of all the spectators. We all have a chance at the ball. Some of us run to all the four goals, from youth to manhood, from manhood to old age, from old to death. At the first goal, we bound with controllable mirth; coming to the second run with a slower but stronger tread; come to the third, our step is feeble; coming to fourth, our breath entirely gives out. We throw down the bat on the black goal of death, in the evening, catchers and pitchers go home to find the family gathered and the food prepared. So may we all find the candles light and the table set, and the old folks at home.

OUR HOLD ON GOD.

COMMUNICATION exists between city and city, between continent and continent, telegraphic, telephonic, postal, and by messenger; yet many seem to think that there are no lines up between earth and heaven. The in-space to many is a trackless desert. Whose your God? Is he deaf and pitiless? Is he throned stupidity? That is not our God. God is a Father, all tenderness and sympathy and love, never sending trouble of any kind to save to make us pure, and good, and elevated and Christian. His eyes are full of pity. His hands are full of help. Oh! drive up your flocks of cares and griefs to this fountain of rock, and let them drink. If you want anything ask for it, and you shall have it, or something better. In the direction of prayer is to be the chief victory. I believe the time will come when physicians will come to the patient, kneel down and pray to God for direction, and then rise and give the medicine that will make infallible cure. The time will come when drought appearing, multitudes will gather in prayer, and independent of all weather probabilities, and without any reference to which way the wind blows, the rain will descend in torrents. When Elijah prayed for rain, he did not look to see which way the wind blew. Open an account with God on this subject. I took a blank-book and put on the fly-leafs the things for which I would especially pray, leaving the opposite pages open for record of Divine answer. And they have been answered. Some of them not in the way I expected, but all answered. There is no such thing as a man talking to me about prayer being absurdity. I know of what I speak. Any man may know this if he will only test the issue. The trouble is, many of us are afraid of being laughed at for our credulity. Laying aside our cowardice and all our infidelity, let us lay out our God in an enthusiasm of supplication. Let them laugh who win.

A young man went off from his mother's house, went off to sea. She prayed for his return day after day, month after month, and year after year. After awhile he started home, and the ship was in the offing; but a sudden storm swooped, and that vessel was broken to pieces on the rocks, and it was supposed all the crew perished; but the night after, there was a knock at the door of that aged mother's house. Her long-absent son had returned. The first words he uttered on entering the homestead, were: "Mother, I thought you would pray me home." The grandest, mightiest and most stupendous agency in the universe is prayer. It is second to nothing but omnipotence, and their shoulders touch.

Chicago's Hopes have Risen Since the Appointment of Col. G. R. Davis, as Director-General of the World's Fair. The new Gen-

Russia has probably concluded that, just now, when the European Powers are engrossed with their own affairs, would be as good a time as any to force a war in which, unless it had strong allies, the Porte could not fail to be a sufferer.

Physically Feeble, But Still with an Unclouded intellect, George Bancroft, the eminent histori- an, rounded his ninetieth year on October 3rd. He was born with the century, and was the son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, of Worcester, Mass. His life has been as full of honors as of years. At 20, he had already distinguished himself as a classical scholar, and from 1823, when he published a small translation, entitled: "Politics of Ancient Greece," until five years ago, when the latest revised edition of his "History of the United States," appeared, his career, was one of unceasing literary activity. His greatest work, the "History," occupied forty years, from 1834 to 1874, the volume appearing at intervals of several years as the material accumulated. He wrote to a lady lately: "I was trained to look upon life as a season of labor. . . I am waiting, without impatience and without dread, the beginning of the end which will summon me to rest."

The Beautiful Duchesse D'Uzes, the Patroness of the adventurous Boulanger and the most enthusiastic of French Royalists, is expected to arrive in this country shortly. The Duchesse, whose portrait is given in this column, belongs to an illustrious French family named Mortemart. Her husband, the Duc D'Uzes, although an active Royalist, has never been prominent in politics. A daughter is married to the Duc De Luynes, the bosom companion of the young Duke of Orleans, who was lately imprisoned and afterward exiled. One of the peculiar features of the Duchesse's generosity toward the Boulangerist cause is the fact that the wealthy Comte de Paris, who did not contribute, should have allowed her to sacrifice $600,000 on a movement in which he had little or no confidence. However, as the Duchesse is still very rich, (having inherited an immense private fortune from an aunt), she will not miss the fortune she has squandered upon "le brav' general."

In All the Records of Dueling in France or elsewhere it would be difficult to find a man who has had more of these encounters to face in one month than M. Mermeix, a member of the Chamber of Deputies. M. Mermeix is also a journalist and was lately intrusted with the task of destroying the Boulangerist faction by attacking it in the press. This he did in a way to bring upon his head an avalanche of challenges from the partisans of the Royalists, ten or fifteen having been served upon him within a few hours. Although a very large proportion of the politicians of Paris and many of the editors have fought duels at different times, M. Mermeix's experience is unique, eclipsing even that of Henri Rochefort. Unquestionably, lives will be sacrificed in this worthless quarrel before the end is reached. A portrait of Mermeix is given above.

The Committee on Revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith held a meeting yesterday in Pittsburgh Pa.

The Republic of Brazil has suspended diplomatic relations with the Papal Court in Rome owing to the hostility of the Bishops to the reforms under the Republic.

It is now definitely stated that Mr. John D. Rockefeller has given a million dollars to the Chicago Baptist University in addition to the $600,000 which he previously contributed.

At the meeting of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy yesterday, Dr. Charles F. Deems presiding, the Rev. Jesse W. Brooke, D.D., of Brooklyn read a paper on Primitive Theism.

Evelyn College, Princeton, has received large accessions this year to the number of its students. It is set apart exclusively for ladies.

Bishop Potter, of New York, may claim the title of a workingman. Last year he preached 214 times, besides consecrating churches, holding confirmations, and performing other episcopal duties.

A Congregational journal states that the growth of that denomination in the United States, is slightly above the growth of population. The latter is 27 per cent. And the former 28.7 per cent.

Rev. J. W. Scott D.D., the father-in-law of President Harrison, assisted on Sept. 28th in the celebration of the Communion service in the East Liberty Church, Pittsburgh, Pa. He is ninety-one years of age.

A conference for Bible Study will be held in the Centennial Baptist Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., commencing Nov. 18th. This Conference has been organized by Baptist brethren, who believe and advocate the doctrine of the Premillennial Coming of the Lord. Further particulars will be published shortly.

The Annual Convention for the Promotion of Deeper Christian Life and Work, Testimonies of Divine Healing, and the Study of the Prophecies, commenced on Sunday last in the Gospel Tabernacle, Eighth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street, New York, Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor. It will continue until Monday next, Oct. 13.

Rev. Jacob Freshman had the pleasure on Sept. 28th, of baptizing a whole Jewish family. A week before, two other Hebrews were baptized. Mr. Freshman's work is being greatly blessed among the Jews of New York, and he could do much more if he had more money to extend the distribution of the Gospels in Hebrew and other Christian books. His address is 17 St. Mark's Place, New York.

Contributions to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $18.50. They were from: New York City, $1; $1; $1; Brantford, Ont., $1; A Friend, $1; Dover, Pa., $1; Newark, N. J., $5; China, Me., $4; W. Townsend, Vt., 50 cents. Many applications from colored ministers for the paper through this fund are still waiting. They will be supplied as soon as money is received for the purpose.

The American Hebrew says, that in 1840 there were only 8,000 Jews in Palestine. This number had increased in 1883 to 23,000. There are now estimated to be 75,000 Jews in the Holy Land. Notwithstanding this tremendous growth in the Jewish population, there has been a notable decrease in the amount of begging in foreign lands for the support of the Jews in Palestine. This is due to the fact that the bulk of the immigrants are able, and expect to support themselves by productive labor.

Rev. W. F. Re Qua has accepted the pastorate of the First Baptist Church of Batavia, Illinois. During the past eight months the struggle to maintain the mission at McAlester has proved hopeless, many readers of this journal who formerly contributed to his support, having discontinued their remittances. Mr. Re Qua has lost none of his enthusiasm in the work, and hopes to make occasional preaching excursions from Batavia into the Indian Territory. The mission he established at Lone Wolf's camp is still flourishing under the charge of Mr. W. D. Lancaster. Any gifts of money or clothing will be welcome there. The clothing should be addressed to Mr. Lancaster, Lone Wolf's Camp, near Vernon, Wilbarger Co., Texas, which is the nearest freight depot. It should be prepaid, as it often happens that Mr. Lancaster has no money wherewith to pay freight charges. Letters and P. O. Orders should be sent to Mr. W. D. Lancaster, Lone Wolf Mission, Quartz P. O., Ind. Ter.

"AND WHY NOT ME?"

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Christ's Words Confirmed by His Works—A Notable Anonymous Hearer—I. He Came of Himself—Knew His Own Need—Was Given up as Hopeless—Had no Precedent to Encourage Him—No Invitation—II. He Came by Himself—Thought it Out by Himself—His Conclusion—Saw Where the Matter Hinged—Did Homage—III. Was Rewarded for Coming—By Sympathy—With a Touch—A Lady's Dream—The Lord Cured Him.

"Behold, there came a leper and worshipped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And Jesus put forth His hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed." Matthew 8: 2, 3.

MATTHEW has placed this miracle immediately after the sermon on the mount. In all probability some little time intervened, in which our Lord had preached at Capernaum, and had also healed the people in the street, as we read just now in the first chapter of Mark. It was not the object of Matthew to arrange his facts precisely in the order of time; he had another end in view. After the sermon on the mount, he gives us remarkable miracles, as if to teach us that our Lord's words were confirmed by His works.

The Afflicted Man.

When our Lord spake, His words were winged in such a way that they flew far afield. He was heard, not only by the nearer company of His disciples, and by a great multitude who gathered about Him, but His words were carried home by the people as they returned to their cottages among the hills, or to their dwellings by the sea. Among the rest, the words of the Lord Jesus came to a poor leper, who dwelt alone outside a city wall. We know little about him; even his name is not mentioned, but to him also the glad tidings of a Saviour came. He spent much of his time in solitude, or in begging; for he could not follow the pursuits of men, nor earn his bread like other men. The disease of despair was upon him, and none could help him in his trouble. He had heard of Jesus, and, perhaps, on the edge of the crowd had heard Him speak. He felt that there was something divine about the Preacher who spake as never man spake: this aroused hope within him: he came to Jesus, and was healed. What was his name, or his descent, or previous history, we do not know. He ranks among the notable anonymous of earth, whose names are written in heaven. No one among you knows where God's word will fly this day: it may be blessed to some outcast in the bush, who will read it, and find mercy of the Lord.

I. First, then—and this is the main point of this morning's discourse—

He Came of Himself.

Read in Scripture concerning the miracles of Christ, and you will be struck with the way in which many were led to Him. A friendly hand conducted the blind, or conducted the little children. Some were bodily brought to Christ. We read of a paralyzed man who was "borne of four," and they let him down by ropes through the ceiling to the place where Jesus stood. Others could not come or be brought, but the Lord went to them where they were, on their beds, or waiting at the pool. But here is a case of a man who came by himself, on his own account; and I want you to note this, because I am persuaded that we have around us those who have nobody to lead them to Christ, nobody to pray for them, nobody to persuade, exhort, or entreat them; but these may come through the direct operations of the Spirit upon their souls.

Note well that this man knew in himself that his case was a terrible one. I do not intend to describe the dreadful disease of leprosy; we have, on other occasions, viewed it as God's appointed picture of sin. It was a living death, a source of misery, a centre of defilement: and such is sin. The leper was dreaded in his every approach to his fellows. He was looked upon as dead while he lived, and his case was viewed as beyond human help. Remember how the king of Israel cried out, "Am I God, to kill and to make alive, that this man doth send unto me to recover a man of his leprosy?" If a leper did recover, it was regarded as a making alive, a resurrection from death. This man knew, even better than anybody else, in what a wretched and loathsome state he was. His disease was ever before him. Leprosy is awful to look upon; what must it be to feel? Leprosy is terrible in description; what must it be in actual endurance? Such was the mass of moving death of which we read, "Behold, there came a leper to Him." He was not kept back by the fact that he was hopelessly and loathsomely diseased.

The Self Abhorred.

Let us learn the lesson well. I earnestly pray that some poor guilty one, conscious of sin, horrified at himself, may now venture to come to Jesus. Though he feels the foul disease within him, and fears that it has come to its worst, yet he may be emboldened to approach to Him who can at once make him clean. If you feel yourself to be a mass of loathsomeness and corruption, or, worse still, hardened and insensible in conscience, yet come to Jesus for healing. Even though you are truly described in our hymn as "self-abhorred," yet come to Him, who will not abhor you. Come at once, saying, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." Let desperate cases come: let hopeless cases come.

No one could or would take him to Jesus. He was too foul to be touched, too far gone to be the subject of hope. Here and there we meet with persons who have so often disappointed their friends, that it is small wonder that they now keep them at a distance. Even an affectionate mother has said, "We have tried him many times, sir, but it is of no use. We cannot help him any more, for he has drained the family." The father almost prays to forget and the elder brother wishes never to see him again. It is a hard case when it comes to that: but such hard cases there are. Now that no man careth for your soul, how earnestly do I wish that you would care for it yourself! Oh, that you would form the singular and saving resolve that you will go to the Lord Jesus on your own account, and so frustrate all the evil prophecies which have been uttered concerning you! Why will you perish? Poor soul! why will you die? If there be such a person now before me, I pray that he or she may now come to Jesus.

In this man's case there was no precedent to encourage him. I do not find that our Lord had healed a leper up to that time. I do not think there was a case of the sort. Many diseases he had dealt with; but the Blessed One had not yet encountered "a man full of leprosy." When there are plenty of precedents, there is a kind of paved way for us to travel; but this man had to make his own track. We can reason—"My father and my brother came to Jesus, and were saved; why should not I?" This man could use no such argument. O my hearer, if never such a sinner as you are has been saved, make bold to lead the way. Dare to approach the living Lord, who and do not despair, though you may not have heard of another sinner of your sort that ever was forgiven. As to the most of you, my dear hearers, you and the leper must part company on this point. He had no precedents; but you have very many. You know that Christ has saved sinners all around you. Many of us now present can assure you that, "This Man receiveth sinners;" for He received us.

Furthermore, this man had no promise. I do not find that Jesus ever said, "Come unto me, ye lepers, and I will heal you." I do not know that any of His apostles had been sent forth to preach, saying, "Come to Jesus, all ye lepers, and He will cleanse you." There was no promise to that effect, save that our Lord Himself is a consolidated promise. The very fact of His being here below is a mountain range of promises to our fallen race. Without any very promise, this man came, and said, "Lord, thou wilt, thou canst." My dear hearers, I cannot say to any of you that you may not come, Jesus because there is no promise for you. Forth from it. If there were no promise, I would exhort you to seek mercy as the Ninevites did when they said, "Who can tell?" But the Promises are Plentiful as the Stars.

Again, this man had no invitation. Our Lord had not called him; He had never said, "Come ye lepers; come, and be healed." There was nobody to command or persuade him to come, nobody to cheer him in coming, much less any compel him to come in. Of himself, constrained by a divine impulse unknown to anybody else, this leper resolved to come, and found himself welcome, though he had not been expressly bidden. To you, my dear hearers, I cannot say that you have no invitation; for we are always crying to you, Come, ye weary and heavy laden. Come, for Jesus calls. "The Spirit and the Bride say, come. Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." The invitations of mercy are sent out on a broad sea, since we are bidden to "preach the Gospel to every creature." "Whosoever will, let him come. Yea, they of the hedges and the highways are being compelled to come in. If you are lost, it will not be for want of an invitation.

II. Secondly,

The Leper Came by Himself.

This is very unlike the case of the ten lepers who came to Jesus in a company, concerning whom He asked the question, "Where are the nine?" It is easy to go where ten are going, but harder to go alone. There are many things which people readily do in company with others; but they would not venture upon them as separate individuals. My hearer, there is only one of you; and when that one feels himself to be loathsome and vile, it seems a daring thing for him to come to Jesus by himself. Yet I trust you will so come.

Here I would enlarge by observing, first, that no doubt the leper thought out this matter for himself. Being often alone, he meditated upon what he had heard concerning this great Preacher, and he considered both His doctrine and His miracles, and drew his own conclusion. There is always hope for a man when he begins to think about the Lord Jesus; the worst of it is that so many hearers of the Gospel put this thinking out, and do none of it at home. This man thought over the matter calmly, candidly, and hopefully; and drew from it a solid, manifest, and practical conclusion with reference to himself. He did not rest in a general thought about all the world, but he found out a truth which concerned himself.

Having done so, he came to the conclusion that our Lord was omnipotent to heal. He well that he came to this conclusion with regard to himself. Is it, "Lord if thou wilt, thou canst make lepers clean?" No, it was a more personal conclusion. "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." That was

The Crucial Point.

Jesus could save him, even him. Long ago I believed that Christ could save my brothers and sisters—I never had a doubt about that. I never doubted our Lord's power to save anybody until I thought of myself, and then there seemed to be just one case where His omnipotence did not cover. I did not see how Jesus was to save me. Singular as it may seem when a man is under a sense of sin, he will not deny the omnipotent power of God's grace to all the rest of mankind; but secretly he will shut himself out from the range of mercy. Strange cruelty to the self he loves so well. He thinks himself to be just over the border, just beyond the reach of grace. This man was not so foolish.

Still thinking the subject over, he saw where the matter hinged. Everything depended on our Lord's will. Some say that the leper doubted the willingness of Christ: I greatly doubt this interpretation of his words. He simply ed a great truth. If Jesus only willed it, the r could be made clean without His saying or g anything. The whole work depended on Lord's will that it should be done. His will the spring of the healing power. This in his lonely thoughts, had struck upon golden nugget of truth. He saw that his lay in the will of Christ; and where could e better? I am afraid that in this matter he lled some of you, for his own will was right gh; but I fear that, in the cases of some ou, your own will is not yet right with God. oes without saying that the leper's will was right condition, and hence he appeals to . Is Jesus willing? There was no fear as at matter.

ie leper came alone. I want any here who quite unused to religious influence, who no mother to put her arms around their and pray for them, no friends to explain things of God to them, nevertheless to e to Jesus. You need a Saviour; do you that you do? Though not accompanied by rs, yet come to Jesus. Come alone, and by self. Come at once to Christ, and cast self at His feet. The thoughtful individual ver is often one of the best of converts; ie is most to be relied on.

I close by saying that this man himself Was Rewarded for Coming.

ir Lord saw to it that he came not in vain. "soul! suffering as he was, and in dread of rible death, he no sooner began to come to at than our Lord rewarded him with His pathy. He looked at him with a different from what the leper had ever received re. When others glanced at the leper they by as quickly as they could; and if some e face to face with him they turned away their from the ghastly spectacle. Nobody pitied rs in those days, for they judged them to mitten of God. They were the objects of or among men because they were viewed objects of the wrath of the Most High. But n Jesus saw the afflicted man, we read in e that "He was moved with compassion." , my hearer, If you will come to Christ, that w He will meet you. If you sorrow, He ows for you. If you loathe sin, He loathes ore than you do; but He has pity for the er. He is moved with compassion over miserable state.

the man came, his lone coming was reled by our Lord touching him. Nobody would have touched this man. Peter, s, and John, and all the rest, would have n back their skirts, lest they should come contact with a leper. As for the crowd, he no difficulty in making his way, for they way before him, and he had a ready gangway himself. But now the Saviour touched him. e was something wonderfully cheering in touch. I have heard of a lady who cared poor crippled children. She found one n was so deformed, diseased, ill-humored, continually crying, that no one felt able to it. She was nursing the child, but the task no pleasure to her; for, do what she would, poor child seemed always to cry, and always t an unlovely part. The good woman pitied child, but could not love it. As she had poor creature in her lap,

She Dozed, And Dreamed
Jesus came and bowed over her, and told that as to her soul, she also was sick and loathe in His sight; but yet He loved her, and ld manifest Himself to her. When she e to herself, she looked at the poor, misen child, and again felt an aversion to it be e it was so wretchedly deformed, so disingly full of sores, and so passionate and ish. Under the power of the vision she beheld, all her feeling of disgust went from she felt great tenderness of her soul, she sed the little one to her bosom, and kissed poor, blotchy face. The child opened its with wonder, for it had never been kissed re; and by that kiss a new world was open o it. The little one became grateful, happy, nt, and was no longer a burden to those who cared for it. How much may come of a little! Even thus our Lord's personal touch of us heals us.

As a reward to the man's faith, our Lord gave a cure; and, to increase the wonder, an immediate cure. "Immediately

His Leprosy was Cleansed."

How so great a change as this could be wrought we cannot tell. To dissect a miracle is absurd. Every part of the body had been long out of order. Certain secretions had been poisoned, and certain vessels destroyed; and yet that one command, "Be thou clean," restored the leper's ruined frame, there and then. He that created can restore. Can God turn a sinner into a saint in a moment? He can. The heart is hard as adamant, or as the lower millstone; can He make it soft? Yes, in a moment He can make it tender as bleeding flesh. Believeest thou this? If so, submit thyself to the divine energy, and ask that this be done unto thee. Only believe, without any sort of doubt, that Jesus is the incarnate God, and therefore has all power over human nature to pardon and to cleanse. If thou believest this, I say, test it by submitting thyself to Jesus, that He may be a Saviour to thee. He will say, "I will; be thou clean."

Jesus loves to see men in health. He takes no pleasure in disease and pain. It is a joy to Him to cleanse and to make whole the souls of men. As surely as the Lord liveth, if thou, poor lonely one, dost believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, thou art saved. Go in peace, and rejoice thyself for ever in the great salvation He hath given thee, and look to Him yet more and more all the days of thy life. I remember that on January the eighth, many years ago, I looked to Christ, and I am praying that this seventh day of September, I who looked may be the means of leading others to look to Him and live. Why not? Dear men and women out of Christ, why not look to Jesus now? My heart breaks for your immediate salvation. Spirit of the living God, draw them to Christ, and to His name be glory for ever and ever! Amen!

PART III.

KATE'S life at school grew attractive to her. She learned quickly and was ambitious to excel. Both teachers and scholars were fond of her. The only disagreeable thing she had to endure was the hearing so much about temperance. The village and seminary were deeply interested in the question, and Kate could not help but hear it discussed and talked over.

How angry it made her the first time she listened to one of the teachers giving an account of the liquor traffic, and the terrible amount of wretchedness caused thereby. Kate went up to the lady's-room at the close of her remarks, and said:

"Miss Arnold, you have deeply insulted me and maligned my own dear father's business."

"Ah, Kate, my dear girl! pray heaven that your father may be led to turn away from such an evil traffic. For I cannot retract a single thing I said. All those incidents of misery, as the result of the sale of spirituous liquors, are, alas! only too true, as are also hundreds of other cases."

"But, Miss Arnold, I think you are very unjust to lay all that misery at the door of the liquor seller. It belongs to the men who drink immoderately, and spend more than a reasonable amount for drink."

"Surely, Kate," returned Miss Arnold, sternly, "you are not too young to have learned that liquor is unlike most other articles of diet. When a man has partaken of a reasonable amount he has weakened his will power so that he is unable to resist the desire for more. And the desire is sure to come, for whisky creates thirst instead of allaying it. Hence, the danger of the first glass and the sin of the liquor-seller. How many of that class of men, think you, watch the symptoms of their customers, lest they give them too much? No, indeed, the pocket-book is the only thing watched, and when that is empty, then the liquor-dealer feels compunctions about giving more. Be thankful you have no brothers to be tempted by this dangerous evil."

"But I have two," replied Kate.

"What! two brothers and so unmindful of the dangers they are subject to! Are they your own brothers or only half?"

"They are my own brothers, but if they are not able to resist temptation they are not worth much."

"What would have become of this world of sinners if our Saviour had held such views? He saw how impossible it was for man to resist temptation and instead of scorning or despising them on that account, He put forth every effort, even to the offering of His own precious body on the tree, that human weakness might feel that it had an Almighty Friend to go to when tempted. How can we do any less?"

Kate opposed every effort to change her views. She never attended any meeting when she thought she might hear the word temperance. And if by any chance she was in a gathering where the subject was brought up in an accidental way, she always showed her displeasure by leaving the place.

Thus the first year of her boarding-school life passed away and the time for her return to her home drew near. The two shorter vacations she had spent with friends, so that she had not seen her home for a year. How anxiously she looked forward to the meeting with father, mother and brothers again! Richard had made her several visits and she received weekly letters from her mother, but that was not like being in the midst of the old scenes.

At length the journey was over, the conveyance that brought her up from the depot stopped in front of the door, and her father came out to welcome her. He kissed her affectionately and said, "It seems a long time since we said good-bye to our dear daughter! And you have changed, too, for the better. How glad mother will be to see you!"

There was mother, standing in the doorway, looking very pale and thin. She did not seem at all well and the excitement of welcoming her daughter made her tremble.

"Dear daughter, welcome home," she said. "We have missed you so much. A year is a long time to have our only girl away from us. But it has done you good; you have grown stronger and more healthy I can see." And the good woman's face lit up with a happy expression, but this quickly disappeared when Kate asked:

"Where are Joe and Rob? Why are they not here to welcome me, too?"

"Oh, Kate, Kate! so much trouble and sorrow as those boys have caused!"

"Nothing more than the sowing of a few wild oats generally causes, is it, mother?" asked Kate putting her arm around the poor distressed lady. "You wrote me about their making themselves obnoxious to our neighbors, but I could not help but laugh over their pranks. Boys will be boys."

"You could not talk as lightly or think so little of their faults as that, Kate, if you had suffered all I have done on their account. I have begged and implored father to move off on to a farm, and give the boys some good healthy employment, but he would not listen to me."

"But, mother, tell me, I entreat you, what has become of the boys?" said Kate, instantly grave, as she saw the look of sadness grow deeper on the faces of both parents.

Mrs. Dean could control herself no longer, but covering her face with her hands, she sobbed aloud on her daughter's shoulder.

Mr. Dean had to explain.

"Mother takes it very hard. I tell her our boys are no worse than lots of other people's. They will probably come out all right. I know the influence of the bar has been bad, but a man must make money some way. I shall give up hotel and all, as soon as you come out of school, and,"—

"But, father," interrupted Kate, "you have not told me what I want so much to know."

"Well, there is not so very much to tell. Joe and one of my customers were playing poker and they got to quarreling, and Joe thrashed the other fellow so that he got arrested, and the judge, on account of Joe's youth (you know he is only sixteen), was going to give him a light sentence—fifty or sixty dollars fine, I believe—when he changed his mind and made the sentence two years in the reform school. Joe and Rob vow vengeance on the person who influenced the judge to change his mind. They feel the disgrace and the separation very much. They asked me if I knew anything about it and I said no. Which is the solemn truth."

"That is very humiliating," replied Kate, "How mortified I should be to have any one at school know I had a brother at a reformatory!"

HERBERT'S AMBITION.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Oct. 19. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Phil. 2 : 5.

"HERBERT is coming home," said a boy, entering a room in which five boys and two girls were sitting, one evening, at work on their lessons for the next day's school. They were his brothers and sisters, and the Herbert referred to was a half-brother, the son of their father by his first marriage. He was at college and had just passed with high honors.

"Sorry to hear that," said Charles, a boy of some fourteen years. "He'll want to boss us, and domineer over us. It will be as bad as being in school all the time."

"Yes," said Robert, his junior by two years. "That was how it was when he was home last vacation. He professed to think that I was not well up in algebra, and he was always drilling me in that and making me do more than I need. He told father I did not work hard enough. I hope he will not stay at home long."

"I think he's real mean," put in Clara, Robert's twin sister, "he got me into trouble when he was at home last. I was reading a story book and he took it from me when I was half through. He takes too much upon himself."

"Well, he'll be worse now, you may depend," said Edward, the eldest boy, who had brought the news. "And he'll dine with father when there is company and take on superior airs. He was mighty conceited before; I don't know what he'll be now he has got on so well at college. But he won't boss me! I shall take an early opportunity of notifying him of that. Come, girls, aren't your lessons done? How slow you are. I could have done them in half this time."

"I like that," Clara whispered to her sister. "Fancy Edward objecting to bossing, when he is always trying to boss us himself."

It was not a very happy family. Herbert was not likely to receive a very warm welcome when he came back to it. He could scarcely expect to do so, as a result of his former sojourns at home. The children's complaints of him were not causeless. His assumption of superiority had been very hard to bear. But a change had occurred in him since they saw him last, of which they knew nothing. Its influence may be realized by a conversation between his two sisters, which they had a few weeks later.

"Is not Herbert just lovely?" Clara said. "The lessons do not seem half so hard now; he makes them so interesting. I wish he was going to be at home always."

"Yes, and he is so kind, too; he does not get impatient with us when we don't understand. And how much nicer papa has been since Herbert came home. Herbert does a lot of his work for him, and papa is not half so worried and cross as he used to be. Oh! Herbert is good. I wonder what he is going to be. Will he be a lawyer or a clergyman, or what?"

"I don't know," said Clara, "but whatever it is, he will be a great man."

"Who is that, who is going to be a great man?" asked a voice behind the two girls who, looking around, saw Herbert and Edward, who entered the room in time to hear the last words.

"Why, you, Herbert. We were saying how good and how clever you were, and we thought you would be something great."

"That's my opinion, too," said Edward. "You have won the whole household, Herbert. We dreaded your coming home, but now we all love you, and hope you will be here always. I hope you will be a great man, and shed lustre on the family name."

"I don't know about being great," Herbert answered, "I'd rather be called useful, I think. It is a better ambition, though I did not always think so. The greatest man is he who can serve all. If other people are better and happier, and less burdened by what he can do, he may let greatness take care of itself. That may come, too, but usefulness is the thing to aim at. The greatest statesman, the greatest preacher, the greatest philanthropist is he who most wisely helps his fellow-men. Even a boy can have some of that greatness, if he will let other boys to be better and happier. There is no greatness like that which comes by service. That was Christ's opinion, and He was a wonderful example of it. If you want to be really great let the same mind be in you that was in Christ."

REV. G. H. SOMERSET GARDNER.

(See Portrait.)

A MOST remarkable and, to some extent, romantic life has been that of the devoted preacher whose portrait is here given, and who is now on a visit to this country.

Somerset Gardner was born at Cheltenham, England, in 1851. His parents belonged to aristocratic families and in his youth had all the educational advantages which wealth and influence could give. During his boyhood he was associated with young people utterly worldly and godless, and he joined with them their visits to the theatre and questionable places, often without his father's knowledge. His mind, however, had from the first, a tendency to religious thought, and while still in youth he became seriously concerned about the state of his soul. His parents attended an extreme Ritualistic Church, and two of his mother's sisters had been received into the Church of Rome. During one of his boyhood visits to his mother's former home, these aunt and uncle took him to the Roman Catholic services; he was attracted by the imposing ceremonies and the gorgeous ritual. The impression that this was the true religious life remained with him, and, on his return he sought out the Benedictine order and was delighted when he was accepted and employed as chorister. Then, dressed in a scarlet cassock and white surplice and bearing a banner of the virgin, he served in the service while the acolytes, bearing candles, the thurifer swinging a censer, and the priest bearing a crucifix, entered the chancel.

For some time the assurances of his spiritual advisers satisfied the boy that he was regenerated by baptism and had received strength for his confirmation to lead a godly life. He confessed regularly, and underwent many penances to atone for such sins as his conscience reproached him with. At one time he was ordered to kneel for some hours on hard pavement while he said certain prayers; at another time he was to pray prostrate on his face while supping on his back a heavy table to remind him of the burden which the Saviour bore for the world. Many other penances, some painful and some simply ridiculous, he submitted to with a murmur, in the hope that so his sins might be forgiven. He was providentially awakened to a sense of the futility of all such means of grace. A friend induced him to go to a small Methodist Chapel in which John Wesley had often preached, to hear a Methodist preacher. Young Gardner went very reluctantly, but before that service was over he was an awakened sinner pleading earnestly for forgiveness through Christ alone. He did not find peace that night nor for many weeks afterwards. He read Evangelical books, went to Gospel services and, to the vexation of his family, went no more to the Benedictine Church. After a long period of spiritual conflict he heard the saintly George Muller of Bristol, and under his preaching was led to the Saviour.

The young convert, full of the enthusiasm which comes to all who, after a long struggle in darkness, enter into light, was eager to point others to the same source of joy and blessing.

To his deep grief and disappointment, he was checked at the outset. His father threw his New Testament into the fire; his mother plainly told him that if he continued his evangelistic efforts he could not have a home with the family, and his eldest brother abused and struck him. Holding, as they did, that observance of the Sacraments of the Church was sufficient for salvation, they resented the statement of the young man that except a man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of God. "It caused disturbance and upset the house," they said. He went to his room and prayed. The course of duty was made plain to him and on June 11, 1870, he quitted his father's house. He had not a penny in his pocket, but he believed that God, who had called him forth, would provide for him.

The young man not knowing where to go, hired an unfurnished garret-room, and borrowed a couple of sacks on which to sleep. The friend who had urged him to go to hear George Muller, however, finding out how he was living, invited him to his house and placed a room at his disposal. For this he was devoutly thankful and at once he sought opportunities to work for Christ. He went out literally into the highways of the surrounding villages, speaking to men at their work, to women in their homes, to the children in the streets, telling all of the good news of God's love in Jesus. He also went to mission chapels and other places where he told the story of his conversion and described the joy that filled his heart. Personal testimony is the most powerful of all the means God uses for the conversion of sinners; and so it proved in Mr. Gardner's case. Crowds came to hear him and many souls were won for Christ.

The news of this work spread, and Mr. Gardner was invited to preach at Marshfield. The service was held in a small school-room, but the attendance was so large that the large Methodist chapel was offered for the meetings, and that was filled to overflowing. At Gainsborough in Yorkshire, and other towns, there was the same result. Whole families were converted, and many desperate characters were won for Christ. Mr. Charrington, whose portrait appeared in this journal recently, with an account of the wonderful work he is doing, in the East of London, heard of Mr. Gardner's preaching, and invited him to London. There a great work was done, especially among Roman Catholics and infidels. Since that time Mr. Gardner has been laboring with much success in various parts of Great Britain, chiefly in Methodist churches, returning at intervals, at Mr. Charrington's urgent request, to East London to work there. His continuous labors at length rendered change of air and scene necessary to his physical system, and he decided to come to America. He is now thoroughly recuperated, and is hoping to have an opportunity before his return, of doing some work for Christ in this country.

Kate Dean's Return from School.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY,

Author of "Nestleton Magna," "Simon Holmes, the Carpenter," "Will it Lift?" etc., etc.

RICHARD'S father was both grieved and disappointed; but he refused to believe that the separation was final, trusting that after time and change had done their alleviating work, Richard would again return to the land and home of his fathers. Rupert was left in undivided possession of the farm, the father placing the rest of his fortune in safe keeping for his self-exiled son, whose light and life, so far as home and country were concerned, seemed to have so utterly died out into the dark.

Rupert, I think, was altogether too selfish and too intoxicated with success to understand or mourn over his unbrotherly deed. Anice did feel compunction, and lived long enough, poor soul; to prove how thorny is the path of wrongdoing, however, attractive its portals, and however its sloping borders may be decked with flowers. It was not very long after her ill-starred marriage before she repented her conduct with strong crying and tears. Her husband's fancy for his beautiful wife was very short-lived, and he had not the manliness even to hide his sense of weariness, or to treat her with the consideration that might in some sense at least have compensated for the harm he had wrought her.

Then followed bickerings, reproaches, recriminations. These ripened into quarrels of a fierce kind; and all the while Rupert Mansford descended lower down the evil slope, which he had trodden long and far, though all unknown to Anice, whom he had sworn at the altar to love and cherish all her life. When old Mr. Mansford died, it seemed as if the last frail tie that bound his son to decency of conduct was snapped asunder. He rapidly developed into a confirmed drunkard and a scamp; or rather the evil passions of his nature, held awhile in check by circumstances, were again let loose to work their destructive will.

The race-course and the gambling den; the resorts of fast life saw more and more of Rupert Mansford after his father's death: the farm saw less and less of him. His wife was all but utterly deserted, and he gave himself over to the service of sin and the devil without restraint. Debts accumulated, and resources diminished. His circumstances became fearfully embarrassed, and it was patent to all observers that ruin, utter ruin, was coming upon him as an armed man. In vain his hapless wife made effort to stem the destructive tide. Lower and lower he sank, dragging Anice along with him down into the abyss of want and misery. At last he forsook her and went, nobody knew where, and certainly nobody cared, leaving the worn and weary Anice, and her hapless little darling Nora, to face the world alone.

This last heartless deed, however, was the best thing he could have done for the well-being of those whom he ought to have loved and cherished. Being free from the dead weight, and what was worse, the pain and worry of his unmanly presence, Anice bravely set to work to obtain a livelihood for herself and her sprightly and beautiful child. There is good reason to believe that Abram Hardale and his wife rendered her substantial help. After Mrs. Hardale's death, Anice hoped that she might be asked to reside with her brother-in-law; but for some reason or other—probably his strong objection to "petticoats"—Abram was silent on the subject and made no sign.

Anice Mansford had hard work to keep her head above water, and, but for her winsome little Nora, would have speedily given up the struggle and sunk beneath the waves. She was very clever at working in lace: it was her chief amusement in her happier days. She was skilful, too, with brush and pencil; and although this sort of labor was then, as now, ill-paid for, it enabled her, at any rate, to keep the wolf from the door; but full often its growl was fearful in her ears, and its near presence robbed her of her sleep.

She did not receive any aid from Abram Hardale. I suppose the cynical carpenter had written something sharp and painful, possibly more painful than he knew; at any rate, she felt hurt, and for the future bore her own burden—a burden lightened only by the sweet prattle and growing sweetness of her child.

No, not lightened only by this, for adversity had done for her what it has often done for others, and what but for its "sweet uses" might never have been done at all. It had driven her to seek help and comfort, strength and refuge in her God. We are sadly apt to forget Him who is the bountiful giver of our mercies, and the Redeemer of our souls, so long as comforts continue, health abides, or prosperity endures. Lest our neglect of Him should lead to ruinous results, He chastises us with His rod, rouses us by His judgments, and by the storms and frosts of winter softens the soil, which too much summer sun has hardened into unfruitful stone.

Anice Mansford's trials, so heavy, so long continued, had led her to pray with the simple trust and fervor which marked her devotions, when she uttered her petitions by her godly mother's side. Prayer brought God near her as a Saviour for she felt her sin and sorrowed for it; as a Father, for she felt her orphanhood and longed to be His child; a Comforter, for her sore, sad heart, needed balm; and in answer to her prayer, she felt and fully realized that He was pledged to "supply all her need."

It was a life-long blessing to the little dark-eyed damsel who called her mother, that this change had come to her; for henceforward to the day she died, it was her chief anxiety, her almost single care to instil true religious principles into her daughter's mind. Her lessons were made potent by example, and powerful by her prayers. Nora's future career I have to follow through these pages. It is a course marked by strange vicissitudes and experiences, but I think the reader will find that the prayers and the efforts of the poor, pale-faced and weary-hearted mother were not without an answer, but that she exercised an influence which did control, assist, endure.

Only once, and that after long years, did Anice hear again of her worthless husband. In a weekly newspaper which happened to fall in her way, she read of the wreck of a convict ship, and her husband's name as amongst those who were drowned. It was a sufficiently uncommon name to leave little room for the thought that possibly another Rupert Mansford was there referred to. Further inquiry on her part made it clear that he had been convicted of some serious crime, and had been sentenced to a long term of transportation beyond the sea. She felt again the bitterness of sorrow and of shame at the thought of his sad, sad end; and turning again with renewed resolve to the training of her darling, breathed many a prayer to heaven that the sins of the parents might not be visited on the guileless girl.

At length Anice Mansford was overtaken by serious illness. Worn and weak, she could not rally from the strong attack. Nora, who for the last few years had been able to help her mother in the struggle for bread, was a devoted and tender nurse. To her, her mother, whatever may have been her early faults, had been a mother indeed. As she saw the light dying out from her dear eyes, and heard her voice gradually dying into the final whisper which was to be hushed by death, her young heart surged with grief, and she longed that her fair young head might be laid with her mother in the restful grave. Then at last the weary wheels of life stood still. Anice Mansford found her long home in the suburban cemetery of a northern city; and Nora, the dark-eyed, dark-haired gypsy-looking orphan was left alone, alone with poverty in her perilous duty, alone, except that her mother's prayers, and faith, her orphanhood, and her own trust in the Divine Fatherhood had made her specially the ward of heaven. For some time she remained in the place where she was. Her skilful fingers were deft as her mother's among the lace, her hand more clever than her mother's with the pencil, and she earned enough at any rate to supply her table with frugal fare, and to clothe her dainty form in the deep, but plain, uncostly mourning which she wore for her dead mother; dead, but living, not in heaven only but in her orphan daughter's heart.

But she was alone! Oh, awful, desolate, word, whose mournful melancholy meaning cannot be read by any who are within whisper-reach or love-glance of one human being! She was alone, and her heart yearned for sympathy; for the voice of friendship;—to be linked somehow with somebody in this cold and heartless world. So she wrote, putting her heart into her pleadings, to her uncle Abram Hardale. Strange to say, there came back a letter, kind, and having indeed quite a tender strain. It contained a request, nay rather a command to Nora to make her way to Settleworth and her uncle's home without delay. So it was that the omnibus brought her to her uncle's door. So it was that she put the question, "Well, uncle, what are you going to do with me?" So it was that George Appleton, seeing her, and remembering the conversation between his master and himself, said, "And so do I."

Having now succeeded in locating my heroine amid Settleworth surroundings, it is only fitting that I should give my readers some faint glimpse of the locality. I am inclined to think that prolonged topographical descriptions in a story of this kind are only "good to skip." And yet if I failed to mention the grand old abbey church, reared by pious hands in days gone by; and in which the richly colored windows are as fresh and fair as if Old Time had never brushed them with his wings, the good folks of Settleworth might feel the slight. The market cross, too, with its elaborate carvings and cabalistic characters being "exceeding rare and old" ought to have special reference, particularly in these days when so many ancient things and places are remorselessly swept away; swept away by the verdict of a stern code of utility, drawn up by modern Philistines, who take for their unworthy models, the Goths and Vandals of a by-gone day. I fancy if these crusaders should make their appearance in the narrow streets and among the queer and quaint old houses of Settleworth, a general uprising of the people would take place, compelling a total and a quick retreat.

Settleworth is not only the name of the old town itself, but also of the fertile valley in which it lies. Through it a broad and rapid stream makes pleasant music, as it ripples and eddies, bickers and chafes on its onward course to the sluggish river which pours its waters into the German Ocean. The hills on either side are high, but their long and fertile slopes are cultivated without difficulty, and for trim farmsteads, productive farms and luxurious crops, Settleworth more than holds its own with all the shire.

In a small and comfortable cottage on the outskirts of Settleworth, and having a pleasant view of the valley and the stream, lived Mrs. Appleton, the mother of Abram Hardale's favorite workman, George. Although the old lady was well stricken in years, she was hale and hearty, comely withal, and thoroughly well able to occupy the post of house-keeper to her son whom she regarded, proud woman, as a man almost if not altogether without a peer.

She was a tall and rather stately-looking woman, and both as to manners and appearance would have been quite equal to a much higher position in society than that lowly one in which it was her lot to move. She was the daughter of an extensive farmer, in those days when farming meant profits, and big ones, too. She would "marry for love," despite the wishes of her people, and so "married beneath her." That, I think, is the usual way of putting it when plenty marries poverty, even though poverty is rich in something of vastly greater worth than money. When will this silly standard of "height" be kicked down by the sturdy foot of common sense? Her education and training had left enduring marks, and as she busied herself with household duties, or took her place in the abbey church, where she was a reverent and constant worshipper, or chatted in the fire-light with her son after his daily toil, it was easy enough to see that the verdict of her neighbors was quite true, and that Mrs. Appleton was "something better than common."

As for the cottage in which they dwelt, the reader will be able, after what I have said, to sketch it for himself. Suffice it to say, that besides being always clean and neat, always showing unmistakable signs of thrift and pains, there were present everywhere, in the pictures on the walls, in the few well-selected books upon the shelves, in the little ornaments and finishes which everywhere met the eye, the tokens of taste, the signs of education, evidences which amounted to proof positive that the cottage-home was something out of the common, too.

The advent of the dark-eyed daughter of Anice Mansford seemed fated to exercise a disturbing influence on several of the residents in Settleworth, amongst the rest, on Mrs. Appleton. She seemed to find something ominous in the appearance above her horizon her son's, of this bright peculiar star.

On the evening of that day when the fair winsome orphan took up her abode in the home of Abram Hardale, George Appleton, some later than his custom was, entered the bright and cheery cottage in which he and his mother had lived together in unbroken peace and comfort for many years. George's quick ear caught as he thought, a something just a little unusual in his mother's words of welcome; but, whether it was himself who was in an unfavourable mood, or whether she had heard of the coming, he could not tell. News flies far and rural regions, and no doubt all Settleworth were aware by that time that Old Crusty, for a while, had a guest, a guest in petticoats, and a guest wonder perhaps of all, a relation of his.

"Now then, mother," said George, in a merry mood, "Now, then, for a good wash, then a good cup of tea."

"It's quite ready, my lad," said his mother, referring doubtless to the tea which 'drawing' on the hob, while the kettle was quietly steaming on the other side, as if for the purpose of announcing that it was ready, to

"Thank you, mother mine," said George. "It generally is; all things are. Waiting meals isn't one of my experiences, is it? about a wife! It would be a long time before I could find one that could fill your shoes; or the matter of that could fill my heart as you do." Hereupon, honest, hearty George, printed kisses on his mother's cheeks,

Was there ever such a little cloud, a fit shadow on the widow's face as she repeated, "A wife, laddie, why who's been talking about one, I wonder;" and then, with a little laugh she continued, "has somebody caught you eye at last, George?"

"Nay, nay," said her son with a short laugh, "there's no danger of that just yet. You need not fear that I shall be running off with somebody or what would perhaps be even less likely, somebody will be running off with me. I'm good deal too well off as I am to trouble myself on that subject."

"Well, laddie," said his mother, "I'm sorry to hear it. Not that I don't want you to marry when Miss Allright comes;—I'm not sure of this—but you ought to be somewhat better than a journeyman carpenter before you take any more mouths to feed."

"Miss Allright, eh?" laughed George. "Abram Hardale thinks that Miss Dearlove will settle the business for me when she puts in her appearance; though he has a notion there's too much of the 'padlock' business about it to be safe."

"Then it's Abram that's been talking to you about a wife, is it?" said the widow, with a curiosity in her tone. "I shouldn't have thought that he was likely to give advice of that sort all reports are true."

"Which they aren't, mother, nor half of them, nor the half of each of them as you well know. Nevertheless, I think the old man fancies he can suit me now; and what is more to purpose, perhaps, from your point of view need not in that case continue to be a journeyman." Here George laughed gleefully, though there sounded, according to his mother's thinking, a slight constraint, not usual in the tone of his familiar and well-read voice. Again a wistful look came over her face, as she glanced at the son of whom she was so proud; and a look of indefinite foreboding influenced both her features as she said lightly and half carelessly:—

"Oh, indeed! That's where the wind blows from, is it? And who may she be, I wonder. Tell me, my son. Abram Hardale's judgment is a bit queer, I should think, on such subjects."

Dear old lady! She had been so long the undisputed monarch of her boy's heart and home, and had found her royal prerogatives so precious that she could not refrain from concluding the question lightly put, with a sigh that was not any means so light.

SPEAKS TO HIS SERVANTS.
W. H. M. H. AITKEN relates the incident: "I was called to the aid of a dear servant of God, who has by near the portals of the other one who has often stood upon the at this Conference (Mildmay)—and would be familiar to many of us joined it. Almost the first thing he me when I entered the room was by dear brother, I want to ask you on. Do you know much of God to you? I have no doubt you great deal of your speaking to God; you know anything of God's speak- you?" A few months ago, at a mis- as conducting at Salisbury, a ser- God who was helping there, and believe to be a very sincere and man, was walking with me in the id all at once putting his arms in said, 'My dear brother, I want to a question. Do you know very your own personal experience of speaking to you?' The same in- coming from two servants of God ferent circumstances—the one en- active life, and the other lying on of sickness—made a deep impres- my mind, the more so because I very much engaged on the sub- re." Reader, what answer could to such a question?

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Weak Arms Strong Arms
They're all on the same level when you wash with Pearl-
ine. The woman who is strong can keep her strength for something else; the woman who is weak will feel that she is strong. It isn't the woman that does the work—it's PEARLINE.
So it is with the clothes. They needn't be strong. The finest things fare as well as the coarsest. They all last longer, for they're saved the rubbing that wears them out. Work was never so easy—never so well done. And safe, too. Nothing that is washable was ever hurt by Pearlline. If it were other- wise—do you think we would continue to sell enough Pearlline yearly to supply every family in the land with several packages.
Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you some- thing in place of Pearlline, do the honest thing—send it back. 182 JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE MYSTERY OF LOVE.

We cannot see the twinings
In God's long cord of Love;
We cannot trace the windings
By matchless wisdom wove.

Even as a skein when unravelled
Still holds the hidden end,
So Love's mysterious windings Around our chastenings blend.

That cord can ne'er be broken,
'Tis held by God alone;
The Lord's seal is the token—
He Knows, He keeps His own.

And when the Father chastens,
His children's faith to prove,
The cord is held by Jesus—
The unseen end is Love.

Love, deep, divine, unsearchable
Love is the binding cord,
And hid beneath the chastening,
Twines round the saints of God.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD SERVICES AT THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—DR. TALMAGE ADDRESSING THE OVERFLOW MEETING.

JERUSALEM, THE GOLDEN.

DR. TALMAGE'S THIRD SERMON ON HIS TRAVELS IN THE HOLY LAND.

A City of Imperishable Memories—A Panorama from the House-top—Localities of Divine Associations—The Site of the Crucifixion—The Wonderful Grotto—A Relic for the Tabernacle—A Visit to the Reputed Site of the Sepulchre—Building Through Ashes—The Corner-stone of Solomon's Temple—Haggai's Signet Ring—The Mosque of Omar—The Jews at Their Wailing Place—A Mental Picture of the Ancient City—A Series of Sieges—The City of Jerusalem Restored.

[This sermon was preached in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last Sunday morning, Oct. 12, 1890. It was repeated in the evening before an audience of six thousand persons in the Academy of Music, New York, which as on the two previous Sunday evenings THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had secured for Dr. Talmage.]

"If I forget thee O Jerusalem, Let my right hand forget her cunning." Psalm 137: 5.

PARALYSIS of his best hand, the withering of its muscles and nerves, is here invoked, if the author allows to pass out of mind the grandeurs of the Holy City where once he dwelt. Jeremiah, seated by the river Euphrates, wrote this psalm and not David. Afraid I am of anything that approaches imprecation, and yet I can understand how any one who has ever been at Jerusalem should, in enthusiasm of soul cry out,

THE JAFFA GATE OF JERUSALEM.

whether he be sitting by the Euphrates or the Hudson or the Thames, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning!" You see it is a city unlike all others for its topography, for its history, for its significance, for its style of population, for its water-works, for its ruins, for its towers, for its domes, for its ramparts, for its literature, for its tragedies, for its memorable birth-places, for its sepulchres, for its conflagrations and famines, for its victories and defeats.

I am here at last in this very Jerusalem and on a housetop, just after the dawn of the morning of December 3, with an old inhabitant to point out the salient features of the scenery. "Now," I said, "where is Mount Zion?" "Here at your right." "Where is Mount Olivet?" "In front of where you stand." "Where is the Garden of Gethsemane?" "In yonder valley." "Where is Mount Calvary?" Before he answered, I saw it. No unprejudiced mind can have a moment's doubt as to where it is. Yonder I see a hill in the shape of a human skull and the Bible says that Calvary was the "place of a skull." Not only is it skull-shaped, but just beneath the forehead of the hill is a cavern that looks like eyeless sockets. Within the grotto under it, is the shape of the inside of a skull. Then the Bible says that Christ was crucified outside the gate, and this is outside the gate, while the site formerly selected was inside the gate. Beside that, this skull hill was for ages the place where malefactors were put to death, and Christ was slain as a malefactor.

The Saviour's assassination took place beside a thoroughfare along which people went "wagging their heads," and there is the ancient thoroughfare. I saw at Cairo, Egypt, a clay mould of that skull hill, made by the late General Gordon, the arbiter of nations. While Empress Helena, eighty years of age and imposed upon, by having three crosses exhumed before her dim eyes, as though they were the three crosses of Bible story, selected another site as Calvary, all recent travellers agree that the one I point out to you was, without doubt, the scene of the most terrific and overwhelming tragedy this planet ever witnessed.

There were a thousand things we wanted to see that third day of December and our dragoman proposed this and that and the other journey, but I said:

"First of all, show us Calvary. Something might happen if we went elsewhere and sickness or accident might hinder our seeing the sacred mount. If we see nothing else, we must see that and see it this morning."

Some of us in carriage and some on mule-back, we were soon on the way to the most sacred spot that the world has ever seen or ever will see. Coming to the base of the hill we first went inside the skull of rocks. It is called Jeremiah's grotto, for there the prophet wrote his book of Lamentations. The grotto is thirty-five feet high and its top and side are malachite, green, brown, black, white, red and grey.

Coming forth from those pictured subterranean passages, we begin to climb the steep sides of Calvary. As we go up, we see cracks and crevices in the rocks which I think were made by the convulsions of nature when Jesus died. On the hill lay a limestone rock, white but tinged with crimson, the white so suggestive of purity and the crimson of sacrifice, that I said, "That stone would be beautifully appropriate for a memorial wall in my church, now building in America; and the stone now being brought on camel's back from Sinai across the desert, when put under it, how significant of the Law and the Gospel! And these lips of stone will continue to speak of justice and mercy long after all our living lips have uttered their last message." So I rolled it down the hill and transported it. When that day comes for which many of you have prayed—the dedication of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, the third immense structure we have reared in this city, and that makes it somewhat difficult being the third structure, a work such as no other church was ever called on to undertake—we invite you in the main entrance of that building to look upon a memorial wall containing the most suggestive, and solemn and tremendous antiquities ever brought together; this, rent with the earthquake at the giving of the Law at Sinai, the other rent at the crucifixion on Calvary.

On a Bluff of Calvary.

It is impossible for you to realize what our emotions were as we gathered, a group of men and women, all saved by the blood of the Lamb, on a bluff of Calvary, just wide enough to contain three crosses. I said to my family and friends: "I think here is where stood the cross of the impenitent burglar, and there the cross of the penitent miscreant, and here between, stood the cross on which all our hopes depend." As I opened the nineteenth chapter of John to read, a chill blast struck the hill and a cloud hovered, the natural solemnity impressing the spiritual solemnity. I read a little, but broke down. I defy any emotional Christian man sitting upon Golgotha to read aloud and with unbroken voice, or with any voice at all, the whole of that account in Luke and John, of which these sentences are a fragment: "They took Jesus and led Him away, and He bearing His cross went forth into a place called the place of a skull, where they crucified Him and two others with Him, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst;" "Behold thy mother!" "I thirst;" "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise;" "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do;" "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." What sighs, what tears, what tempests of sorrow, what oceans of agony in those utterances!

While we sat there, the whole scene came before us. All around the top and the sides, the foot of the hill, a mob raged. They gnashed their teeth, and shake their clenched fists. Here the cavalry horses champ bits, and paw the earth and snort at the sight of the carnage. Yonder a group of gamblers are pitching up as to who shall have the coin of the dying Saviour. There are women all dead with grief among the crowd, His mother and His aunt, and some whose sorrows He comforted, and whose guilt He had pardoned. Here a man dips a sponge into sour wine, by a stick lifts it to the hot, and cracked lips. The hemorrhage of the five wounds has its work.

The Heavens Veiled.

The atmospheric conditions are such as the world saw never before or since was not a solar eclipse, such as astronomical record or we ourselves have seen. It was the bereavement of the heavens! Darker! Until the towers of the temple were no longer visible. Darker! Until the surrounding hills disappeared. Darker! Until the inscription on the middle cross becomes illegible. Darker! Until the chin of the dying Lord falls upon his breast, and He sighed with His last sigh, words, "It is finished!"

As we sat there, a silence took possession of us and we thought: this is the centre of the world which continents have been touched, and the world shall yet be moved. Toward the hill, the prophets pointed forward. Toward the hill, the apostles and martyrs pointed backward. To this all heaven pointed downward. To this with foaming execrations perdition pointed upward. Round it circles all his all time, all eternity, and with this scene, powers have covered the mightiest canvas, sculptors cut the richest marble, and orchestras rolled their grandest oratorios, and churches lifted their greatest doxologies, and he built its highest thrones.

Unable longer to endure the pressure of the scene, we moved on, and into a garden of olives, a garden which in the right season is full of flowers, and here is the reputed tomb

THE CHURCH OF THE SEPULCHRE.

Christ. You look at the Book say the midst of the garden was a sepulchre." I think this was the den, and this sepulchre, shattered and in ruins. At four steps we went into a chamber which seems a family tomb. There is room for about twenty bodies. We entered it, and found it about eight feet high, and nine feet wide, and fourteen feet long. The crypt where I think our Lord slept was about four feet long. I think that there once lay the body wrapped in His last slumber. On some of the rocks, the Roman government set its seal on the gate of this mausoleum on the first day of the morning, the angels rolled the stone, turning it down the hill. Up these steps walked the lacerated feet of the Conqueror, and from the heights, He looked off upon the city that He had cast Him out, and upon the world He had come to redeem, and at the heavens through which He would soon ascend.

But we must hasten back to the city. There are stones in the wall which Solomon had laid. Stop here and see a startling proof of the truth of prophecy. In Jeremiah, 31st chapter and 40th verse, it is said that Jerusalem should be built through the ashes. What ashes, people have been asking? Were those ashes just prophecy to fill up? No! the meaning has recently discovered. Jerusalem is built out in a certain direction where the ground has been submitted to chemical analysis, and it has been found to be the ashes left from the sacrifices of the ancient temples of the wood and ashes of bones of men. There are great mounds of ashes, the result of centuries of sacrifices. It has been found that these thousands of years of discovery in the temple meant when he said, "Behold, the city shall come saith the Lord that the city is built to the Lord from the tower of the wall unto the gate of the corner, and the valley of the dead bodies and of the living." The people of Jerusalem are at this time fulfilling that prophecy. One hand that has been at work which they are building to prove the divinity of the Scriptures! The place where the corner-stone of the temple was laid three thousand years ago.

The people of Jerusalem are at this time fulfilling that prophecy. One hand that has been at work which they are building to prove the divinity of the Scriptures! The place where the corner-stone of the temple was laid three thousand years ago.

Explorers have been Digging, they found that corner-stone seventy-five feet beneath the surface. It is fourteen feet and three feet eight inches high, and is fully cut and shaped, and near it was an altar that was supposed to have contained oil of consecration used at the ceremony of laying the corner-stone. Yonder from a distance of forty feet, a signet ring has been found up inscribed with the words "Haggai, prophet of Shebaniah," showing it belonged to the prophet Haggai, and to that seal ring he refers his prophecy, saying, "I will make thee a signet." I walk further on far under the city, and I find myself in Solomon's stables, and the places worn in the stone pillars by the feet of some of his twelve thousand soldiers.

Further on, look at the pillars on Mount Moriah was built. You know that the mountain was too small for the temple, and they built the mountain out on pillars, and the height of those pillars, each one strong enough to hold a mountain.

As we enter the Mosque of Omar, a throne of Mohammedanism, where we are met at the entrance by officials.

They bring slippers that we must put on before we take a step further. They adjust our feet on the sacred slippers. A man sitting to go in at the entrance, these slippers would be dead on the spot. These awkward sandals adjusted to our feet as we could, we are led to where there is a rock with an opening in it through which, no doubt, the blood of sacrifice of the ancient temple rolled down and away.

At the expense the Mosque has been built, but the more is the place I am glad to get through to take off the cumbrous slippers, and step into the clear air.

Under is a curve of stone which is part of a wall which once reached from Mount Moriah unto Zion, and over it David walked or rode on mules in the temple. Here is the wailing-place of the Jews where for centuries almost continually during the day-time, whole generations of the Jews have stood putting their heads against the wall of what was once Solomon's temple. It was one of the saddest and most solemn and impressive scenes I ever witnessed to see scores of these descendants of the patriarchs with tears rolling down their cheeks, lips trembling with emotion, a book of the law open before them, bewailing the ruin of the ancient temple and the captivity of their fathers and crying to God for the restoration of the temple in all its original splendor. Most touching scene! And such a prayer as that, after a century, I am sure God will answer, and in some way the departed grandeur will return, or something better. I looked over the shoulders of some of them and saw that they were reading from the mournful psalms of David, while I have been told that this is the litany which some chant:

"For the temple that lies desolate;
We sit in solitude and mourn;
For the palace that is destroyed,
We sit in solitude and mourn;
For the walls that are overthrown,
We sit in solitude and mourn;
For our majesty that is departed,
We sit in solitude and mourn;
For our great men that lie dead,
We sit in solitude and mourn;
For priests who have stumbled,
We sit in solitude and mourn."

I think at that prayer Jerusalem will come again to more than its ancient magnificence; it may not be precious stones and architectural majesty, but in a moral splendor that shall eclipse forever all that David or Solomon saw.

But I must get back to the house-top where I stood early this morning, and before the sun sets, that I may catch a wider vision of what the city now is and once was. Standing here on the house-top, I see that the city was built for military safety. Some old warrior, I warrant, selected the spot. It stands on a hill twenty-six hundred feet above the level of the sea, and deep ravines on three sides do the work of military trenches. Compact as no other city was compact. Only three miles journey round, and the three ancient towers, Hippicus, Phasaelus, Mariamne, frowning death upon the approach of all enemies.

The Earth's Metropolis.

As I stood there on the house-top in the midst of the city, I said, "O Lord, reveal to me this metropolis of the world, that I may see it as it once appeared." No one was with me, for there are some things you can see more vividly with no one but God and yourself present. Immediately the Mosque of Omar, which has stood for ages on Mount Moriah, the site of the ancient temple, disappeared and the most honored structure of all the ages lifted itself in the light and I saw it—the temple, the ancient temple! Not Solomon's temple, but something grander than that. Not Zerubbabel's temple, but something more gorgeous than that. It was Herod's temple built for the one purpose of eclipsing all its architectural predecessors. There it stood, covering nineteen acres, and ten thousand workmen had been forty-six years in building it. Blaze of magnificence! Bewildering range of porticos, and ten gate-ways, and double arches, and Corinthian capitals chiseled into lilies and acanthus. Masonry bevelled and grooved into such delicate forms that it seemed to tremble in the light. Cloisters with two rows of Corinthian columns, royal arches, marble steps pure as though made out of frozen snow, carving that seemed like a panel of the door of heaven let down and set in, the facade of the building on shoulders at each end lifting the glory higher and higher, and walls wherein gold put out the silver, and the carbuncle put out the gold, and the jasper put out the carbuncle, until in the changing light they would all seem to come back again into a chorus of harmonious color. The temple! The temple! Doxology in stone! Anthems soaring in rafters of Lebanon cedar! From side to side and from foundation to gilded pinnacle,

The Frozen Prayer of All Ages!

From this house-top on the December afternoon we look out in another direction and I see the king's palace covering a hundred and sixty thousand square feet, three rows of windows illumining the inside brilliance, the hall-ways wainscoted with all styles of colored marbles surmounted by arabesque, vermilion and gold, looking down on mosaics, music of waterfalls in the garden outside answering the music of the harps thrummed by deft fingers inside; banisters over which princes and princesses leaned, and talked to kings and queens ascending the stairway. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! Mountain city! city of God? Joy of the whole earth! Stronger than Gibraltar and Sebastopol surely it never could have been captured.

But while standing there on the house-top that December afternoon, I hear the crash of the twenty-three mighty sieges which have come against Jerusalem in the ages past. Yonder is the pool of Hezekiah and Siloam, but again and again were those waters reddened with human gore. Yonder are the towers, but again and again they fall. Yonder are the high walls, but again and again they were leveled. To rob the treasures from her temple and palace and dethrone this queen city of the earth, all nations plotted. David taking the throne at Hebron decides that he must have Jerusalem for his capital and, coming up from the south at the head of two hundred and eighty thousand troops, he captures it. Look, here comes

Another Siege of Jerusalem!

Assyrians under Sennacherib, enslaved nations at his chariot wheel, having taken two hundred thousand captives in his one campaign, Phoenician cities kneeling at his feet, Egypt trembling at the flash of his sword, comes upon Jerusalem. Look, another siege! The armies of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar come down and take a plunder from Jerusalem such as no other city ever had to yield, and ten thousand of her citizens trudge off into Babylonian bondage. Look, another siege! and Nebuchadnezzar and his hosts by night go through a breach of the Jerusalem wall, and the morning finds some of them seated triumphant in the temple, and what they could not take away because too heavy, they break up—the brazen sea, and the two wreathed pillars Jachin and Boaz.

Another siege of Jerusalem: and Pompey with the battering-rams which a hundred men would roll back, and then at full run forward would bang against the wall of the city, and catapults hurling the rocks upon the people, left twelve thousand dead, and the city in the clutch of the Roman war-eagle. Look, a more desperate siege of Jerusalem! Titus with his tenth legion on Mount of Olives, and ballistæ arranged on the principle of the pendulum to swing great boulders against walls and towers, and miners digging under the city making galleries of beams underground which, set on fire, tumbled great masses of houses and human beings into destruction and death. All is taken now but the temple, and Titus, the conqueror wants to save that unharmed; but a soldier, contrary to orders, hurls a torch into the temple and it is consumed. Many strangers were in the city at the time and ninety-seven thousand captives were taken, and Josephus says one million one hundred thousand lay dead.

But looking from this housetop, the siege that most absorbs us is that of the Crusaders. England, and France, and all Christendom, wanted to capture the Holy Sepulchre and Jerusalem, then in possession of the Mohammedans under the command of one of the loveliest, bravest, and mightiest men that ever lived, for justice must be done him though he was a Mohammedan—glorious Saladin! Against him came the armies of Europe, under Richard, Cœur-de-Lion, King of England; Philip Augustus, King of France; Tancred, Raymond, Godfrey, and other valiant men, marching on through fevers, and plagues, and battle charges, and sufferings, as intense as the world ever saw. Saladin in Jerusalem, hearing of the sickness of King Richard, his chief enemy, sends him his own physician, and from the walls of Jerusalem seeing King Richard afoot, sends him a horse. With all the world looking on, the armies of Europe come within sight of Jerusalem. At the first glimpse of the city they fall on their faces in reverence, and then lift anthems of praise. Feuds and hatred among themselves were given up, and Raymond, and Tancred, the bitterest rivals, embraced while the armies looked on. Then the battering-rams rolled, and the catapults swung, and the swords thrust, and the carnage raged. Godfrey of Bouillon is the first to mount the wall, and the Crusaders, a cross on every shoulder or breast, having taken the city, march bare-headed and bare-footed to what they suppose to be the Holy Sepulchre, and kiss the tomb. Jerusalem the possession of Christendom. But Saladin retook the city and for the last four hundred years it has been in possession of cruel and polluted Mohammedanism!

Another crusade is needed to start for Jerusalem, a crusade in this nineteenth century greater than all those of the past centuries put together. A crusade in which you and I will march. A crusade without weapons of death, but only the Sword of the Spirit. A crusade that will make not a single wound, nor start one tear of distress, nor incendiarize one homestead. A crusade of Gospel Peace! And the Cross again be lifted on Calvary, not as once an instrument of pain, but a signal of invitation, and the Mosque of Omar shall give place to a Church of Christ, and Mount Zion become the dwelling place not of David, but of David's Lord, and Jerusalem, purified of all its idolatries, and taking back the Christ she once cast out, shall be made a worthy type of that heavenly city which Paul styled "the mother of us all," and which St. John saw, "the holy Jerusalem descending out of heaven from God." Through its gates may we all enter and in its temple, greater than all the earthly temples piled in one, may we worship. Russian pilgrims lined all the roads around the Jerusalem we visited last winter. They had walked hundreds of miles, and their feet bled on the way to Jerusalem. Many of them had spent their last farthing to get there, and they had left some of those who started with them, dying or dead by the roadside. An aged woman exhausted with the long way, begged her fellow-pilgrims not to let her die until she had seen the Holy City. As she came to the gate of the city she could not take another step, but she was carried in, and then said, "Now hold my head up till I can look upon Jerusalem," and her head lifted, she took one look, and said: "Now I die content, I have seen it! I have seen it." Some of us before we reach the heavenly Jerusalem may be as tired as that, but angels of mercy will help us in, and one glimpse of the Temple of God and the Lamb, and one good look at the "King in His beauty" will more than compensate for all the toils and tears and heartbreaks of the pilgrimage. Hallelujah! Amen!

When Our Work is Done,

A SWISS MOUNTAIN RAILROAD.

ONE of the most picturesque lines of railroad in the world is that over Monte Generoso, a section of which is represented in the accompanying illustration. Monte Generoso is a spur of the Alps lying between Lake Lugano and Lake Como in Switzerland. Its summit is over five thousand feet above the level of the sea. It overlooks pretty little villages of the Italian character and the visitor is impressed on the one hand with the grandeur of Alpine scenery and on the other with the beauties of an Italian agricultural landscape.

The railroad which has just been opened starts from the quaint little village of Capolago at the southern end of Lake Lugano and rises by a steep gradient for two miles. The cog-wheel system is used for the ascent. At the end of that section the way is barred by a perpendicular precipice which has been pierced by a tunnel, at the end of which is the first station. The train passes through two more tunnels on its way to the middle station, called Bellavesta, which is on a natural terrace. From that point the ascent is exceedingly steep and the traveller has need of all his faith in the security of the cog-wheel arrangement to keep himself from panic. At the terminus, which is about half a mile from the summit of the mountain, the view is enchanting. It takes in a wide range of Italy, Switzerland and the Tyrol—a scene of beauty, unrivalled in all Europe.

STIRRING SCENES AT THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC DURING THE SERVICES BY DR. TALMAGE

Tens of Thousands Clamoring Vainly for Admission—Irving Place and Fourteenth Street Blocked—Talmage Speaks Outdoors—Singing Heard as far as Union Square—The Christian Herald Negotiating for Union Square Garden for the Remainder of the Season

NOT in many years has New York witnessed a tidal wave of religious interest the dimensions of that which has been stirred up by Dr. Talmage's Sunday Evening Services, at the Academy of Music on Fourteenth Street. People have flocked in vast multitudes to listen to the recital of the preacher's journeyings in the Holy Land, and to his descriptions, with the eloquence that came from his personal knowledge of the localities in the story of the grandest scenes and events of the world's history. It was to afford New Yorkers an opportunity to hear these Palestinian sermons that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a few days ago, leased the Academy of Music, intending to continue the services there until the completion of Dr. Talmage's new Tabernacle in Brooklyn.

Seldom indeed has such a crowd been gathered as that which filled Fourteenth Street and Irving Place on the evening of the first of the services—September 28. A few minutes past six o'clock, the great building, which has a seating capacity of 5,400, was densely packed; there was not even standing room. Over a thousand persons had been crowded in, and there remained fully 15,000 outside, clamoring in vain for entrance.

Irving Place was a Sea of Heads, and so was Fourteenth Street, and the parade as far as Broadway was lined with people constantly passing down to the Academy to swell the outside throng. On that occasion there were fully 20,000 unable to obtain admittance. The New York Times stated that the throng extended from Third to Sixth avenue a distance of half a mile. The singing of hymns could be readily heard as far as Union Square.

On the last Sunday evening Dr. Talmage again faced a phenomenal audience at the New York Academy. Notwithstanding that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had adopted all necessary precautions against over-crowding, the building was packed almost to suffocation, and an even larger crush than on the preceding occasion. But if the interior was crowded, the scene on Irving Place was certainly still more striking. Beneath the bright gleams of electric light were assembled not less than 12,000 people, a solid, compact, good-natured mass, who had come resolved to both see and hear the distinguished preacher. It was an orderly multitude, although those in the rear when they heard the announcement made by the door-keepers at a few minutes past six o'clock: "All Full," and saw the great double doors closed against them, could not give expression to their keen disappointment. At 7.30, Dr. Talmage was telling of his interesting journey through Palestine, and the great city arteries of travel were still packed.

Fresh Thousands into Fourteenth Street regardless of the fact that there was not a spare space inside the building up to the top. At 9 P. M., Dr. Talmage appeared at the Irving Place entrance, and standing on the steps of the portico between the great stone pillars spoke briefly to the thousands waiting outside. His presence was the signal for an instantaneous movement of the throng, which now very largely blocked Fourteenth Street and quite filled the southern end of Irving Place. A picture of this scene, as sketched by our artist, appears on the first page.

After a verse of the hymn: "All hail the power of Jesus' name," had been sung, Dr. Talmage said:

"To you who could not get into the Academy of Music to-night I want to commend a

A Watch was Used as a Compass Recently to the astonishment of a prominent journalist, who explains the method for the benefit of his readers. He says : "A few days ago I was standing by a gentleman, when I expressed a wish to know which point was the north. He at once pulled out his watch, looked at it, and pointed to the north. I asked him whether he had a compass attached to his watch. All watches, he replied, are compasses. Then he explained to me how this was. Point the hour hand to the sun and the south is exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII on the watch. For instance, suppose that it is 10 o'clock. Point the hand indicating 10 to the sun and XI on the watch is exactly south. Suppose that it is 8 o'clock, point the hand indicating 8 to the sun, and the figure X on the watch is due south. My friend was surprised that I did not know this. Thinking that very possibly I was ignorant of a thing that everyone else knew, and happening to meet Mr. Stanley, I asked that eminent traveller whether he was aware of this simple mode of discovering the points of the compass. He said that he had never heard of it. I presume, therefore, that the world is in the same state of ignorance." The world is in a state of ignorance also about other matters while it has the means of knowledge within reach. In matters of right and wrong, the conscience will decide rightly if it is appealed to ; only like the watch, it must be in working order, and in relation to the Sun of Righteousness. (Acts 24 : 16.)

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE.

S. S. LESSON FOR OCT. 26 BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 22 : 39-53 ; GOLDEN TEXT, Isa. 53 : 3.

Christ's Last Night—No More Temple Teaching—Last Opportunities—Neglect Followed by Judgment—The Garden Hallowed by Prayer—The Disciples Following—Could not Witness the Agony—The Pathetic Prayer—The Angelic Messenger of Comfort—The Battle Won—The Kiss of Judas—How Christ is Betrayed Now.

IT seems as though the Lord Jesus sought in every conceivable manner to teach His disciples the true nature of His mission. He asks them, "When I sent you forth without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye anything?" Their unanimous testimony was, "Nothing." And yet how little they understood that the kingdom and the service to which He called them were independent of earthly resources. Still unpossessed and unconquered by the Spirit of God, still living their own life, and governed by their own ideas and experiences, even in following Jesus, their thoughts rose no higher than material things. Peter had just been boasting, "I am ready to go with thee both into prison, and to death." His Master would indicate that the prison and the death which He was about to meet with, were altogether different from anything that Peter or the rest of the disciples could conceive or understand. A prison in which the sins of all mankind hemmed Him, a death as the great Sin-offering,—how far was this from their thoughts! The battles of Joshua, of David, of Asa, and Jehoshaphat, the glory of the temporal kingdom of Israel, purchased at the point of the sword—these were their ideas of the coming kingdom! Oh, how different were the Lord's! And yet, until they were made divine by the power of an indwelling God, how could it be otherwise with them? How is it with us? What are we seeking for in churches and our families? Prosperity which the eye of man can see, and the voice of man applaud? Or does the Lord speak to us about His coming, and is the one anticipation of our hearts that His Bride shall be ready to meet Him, by a preparation of conformity to His life and Spirit?

"And He came out and went, as His custom was, unto the Mount of Olives," never again to return to the temple to teach;

The Last Opportunity

of hearing God's Son in the temple at Jerusalem was gone forever from that generation. Henceforth He had no word for the world, and the disciples must, from this time forth, convey His messages to the lost. It was a solemn moment for Jerusalem, but she knew it not. It was an awful moment for the Pharisees and scribes, who had listened to him only to criticize. There is such a moment in the life of every immortal soul,—God has spoken for the last time, and now there remaineth only "a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries." (Heb. 10 : 27.)

"Jesus went as His custom was, unto the Mount of Olives." It was one spot where He was wont to meet with His Father. Every God-filled child of man has the "custom" of much prayer, his life and ministry are but the outcome of his communion with God. When a child of God only looks upon Him as a Referee, to turn to on special occasions, it will always be manifest in the lack of God's power in his life. "His disciples also followed Him." It is well for every disciple to follow Jesus in His life of intercession. His first thought was for them. They did not understand Him, they were living in the flesh, their spirit jarred Him, but even at such an hour, He suffered long and was kind. (1. Cor. 13 : 4.) "When He was at the place, He said unto them, pray that ye enter not into temptation." This was all they could do. A mightier battle than all the battles which earth had witnessed was about to take place, "and He was parted from them about a stone's cast." Farther they could not go, the flesh must not witness what should now transpire. No man can go through Gethsemane but as the Spirit of God has entire control of him, and manifests Christ in him.

Gethsemane

was no repetition of the temptation in the desert; every question there raised had been fully answered by the victorious Son of Man; the ground lost in Eden through the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," had there been regained, and every tempted sinner meets the enemy on ground already conquered, so that, through faith in Jesus, we may have certain victory. But now another and more terrible battle had to be fought. Jesus must die. He was, in the purpose of His Father, and in His own willing laying down of His own life (John 10 : 18), "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." (Rev. 13 : 8.) What then? Satan would anticipate His death, and bring all possible pressure to bear upon that human body of our Lord, so that He might die before He could accomplish His sacrifice upon the cross; die without redeeming the lost world. His heart was breaking: "the world knew Him not." His own, the Jews, "received Him not," His disciples did not understand Him, and yet He yielded Himself in sacrifice. The frail body could not stand the strain, it was a life and death struggle. Oh, let us draw nigh with holy silence in our souls as we look on; "it is holy ground." We cannot, dare not, let human imagination portray what there passed between God the Father, and God the Son. One glimpse is given us. O, God keep us from a profane, unhallowed Spirit as we listen, and as we look on!

"My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." Jesus never exaggerates. "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless not my will, but thine be done." He was heard, there appeared unto Him an angel strengthening Him. "And being in agony He prayed more earnestly; and His sweat was as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground." He was heard. "Who in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayer, and supplication with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared." (Heb. 5 : 7.) Yes; He was saved from death in Gethsemane that He might die on Calvary. He was saved from the failure of His human body to bear the strain put upon it, that He might offer up that body a sacrifice for the sin of man.

Jesus rose from prayer, the battle was won, but the heavy eyes, and dull perceptions of the disciples had discerned nothing of what had passed. They had been asleep, "sleeping for sorrow." He said unto them, "Rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation." There are times when the enemy is more than usually on the outlook to compass the fall of God's children. There is but one safeguard, "Rise and pray." Yet it was just now, that putting aside all His own unutterable suffering, Jesus excuses His disciples, "the Spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." (Matt. 26 : 41.)

The Flesh Could Not

follow Jesus here, it was not in the power of human energy or human devotion, to stand on Divine ground. The ardent Peter, who had declared, "I am ready to go with thee both into prison and to death," had not yet been able through the Spirit to "mortify the deeds of the body" (Rom. 8 : 13) and there was still the question in his heart, "We have left all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" (Matt. 19 : 27.) The flesh, which seeks its own, was still in possession. It was when the Holy Spirit had fully possessed them that none of the believers said "that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things common." It was then that they could rejoice "that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name." (Acts 4 : 32 ; 5 : 41.)

"While He yet spake, behold, a multitude, and he that was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and he drew near unto Jesus to kiss Him. But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?"

It was adding insult to injury; the thirty of silver were the attraction of Judas, made such treachery possible. And are not many who publicly kiss Jesus, who the work of God with their money and smiles and their patronage, but betray His way of carrying on business, worldly and un-Christlike principles which earn them in business and in family life. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, though man may be deceived, 'what a soweth that shall he also reap.'" (Gal. 6 : 7.) Alas, the Judases are plentiful in the Church of God, and Jesus is continually betraying gold and silver. "When they that were with Him saw what would follow, they said, shall we smite with the sword?" He bade them, "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one." Was not the moment to change His tactics? Hitherto had taught "I say unto you, that ye resist evil" (Matt. 5 : 39), but was there not a beyond which this kind of thing could not be carried and had it not arrived now? Master's words had seemed to warn Peter, without waiting for an answer, acted the impulse of the moment, and struck high priest's servant. But Jesus did not change His teaching or His practice under such circumstances. "Suffer ye thus far," He said. He exemplified His teaching and spirit touching the wounded ear and healing it, the very last He opposed only love to those who were at enmity with Him.

But why, the disciples might have thought, does He not make use of His wondrous power to deliver Himself? Here He heals the man who is armed to apprehend Him, though He would play into the very hands of His enemies. Yes, it was incomprehensible to those who do not see things in a heavenly light. In the Kingdom of God, conquests are by submitting, life comes out of death, out of suffering; it is all the reverse from way of the world.

"And Jesus said unto the chief priests, captains of the temple and the elders, who were come out against Him, Be ye come out against a thief, with swords and staves? I was daily with you in the temple, ye strove against me, but have found no hand against me;

But This is Your Hour and the power of darkness." Elders, scribes, chief priests, earth's great ones, all arrayed against God's Holy One, all arrayed against a love. But they were blind, they had longed against light; jealousy had blinded them; they envied the power Jesus had with the people. It was their hour, they should have waited, they should slay their Lord and Saviour. Then it should be His hour and the power of light and He should claim upon them for these His enemies the purchase price of blood, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Lost Treasures.*

SOME time ago I read the record of a man, who wanted Christmas presents for his son. He sought out the patron saint of the child. The saint received him smilingly, assured him he could gratify his desires. When he said, "I want a little hour that I may spend with a dying friend; and I want a place where I may spend my youth, to give now a word of old in sorrow; and I want a kind word to say, a smile I once shut me out upon, a caress I once forbore to give, may bestow them all now upon one who heart hungers for love," the face of the saint grew grave, and he answered, "I can not give these; you must go for these to the great house of Time." But when after a time he came to this place, and to hoary old of the late Dean Stanley, of Westminster the sick and suffering people there, and I could bear it," she said "if Lady Stanley be with me while it was being done."

Stanley was sent for. When the messen-

WILL JESUS COME AGAIN?

The Distinction Between Death and the Second Advent—Expressed in Christ's Words to Peter and John—Death a Curse—The Advent a Blessing—How the Truth Enters the Mind—An Experience of Enlightenment.

BY GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

ONE of our great surprises in connection with this subject is, that any thoughtful person should consider the experience of death, and the event of our Lord's Coming one and the same, or even think of them as of equal value. Very many say "Well, when I die the Lord will have come to me." Now, is this not a very perversion of Scripture language? Let any reader carefully go over a few texts where it is said Jesus is coming again, and substitute death for that hope. Will he not readily perceive the fallacy of the above statement? As for example: "This same death shall come again." (Acts 1: 2.) "Death shall descend from heaven with a shout." (1. Thess. 4: 16.) "Unto them that look for it, shall death appear a second time." (Heb. 9: 28.) "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for death." (Phil. 3: 20.) "And to wait for death from heaven." (1. Thess. 1: 10.) It would be just as absurd to read into such passages any other event, historical, ecclesiastical or providential, as that of death. Surely the Scriptures are clear enough in their literal statement and conclusive in their designed application.

That there was in the minds of the apostles a distinction between the article of death, and the advent of Jesus is proved from

Our Lord's Conversation

with Simon Peter as recorded in John 21: 18, 23.
The Master told him he would die a martyr, which led Peter to inquire concerning John "Lord, and what shall this man do?" The answer of Jesus, "If I will that he tarry till I come," led all of the disciples to believe that John would not die, but be found still living when their Lord returned from heaven. Not indeed that Jesus gave any such promise, yet what He did say called out from them the distinction between death and His return.

But further, this contrast is seen when we consider that death is a monster evil, the dread penalty of sin, (Rom. 6: 23.) while the Second Advent of Jesus will deliver His people from its dread power. (1. Thess. 4: 16, 17.)
Death is unnatural. From this terrible enemy we shrink with fear, while with glad hope we long to see the unveiled face of our glorious Lord. Death is a dissolution; a taking down of the tabernacle; a disrobing. For the unclothed state we do not pray, as we do for the re clothed condition. (II. Cor. 5: 4.) Death is a divider.
The grim messenger is neither softened by tears nor subdued by threats. He is independent of bribes, and mocks at every device to escape his chilling embrace. Kings and subjects, rich and poor are alike leveled by his sickle, while the spared friends are left to mourn in their grief.
(Gen. 37: 34, 35; John 11: 21, 32.) But when Jesus comes reunion will take place, for the sleeping saints and living believers shall be caught up together in the air. (1. Thess. 4: 17, 18.)

But again, death does not consummate our salvation; by it we are made incomplete: the body rests in the grave and the spirit rests with the Lord. (1. Thess. 14: 13; II. Cor. 5: 8.) When Jesus comes and gathers His people unto Himself, the corruptible shall put on incorruption, referring to those who have died, while the mortal shall put on immortality, referring to those who shall be found alive at His Advent. Then indeed, shall our

Salvation of Soul and Body be fully consummated, for we shall be crowned and glorified in that day. (II. Tim. 4: 8; Phil. 3: 20, 21.) Nowhere in the divine record are we taught to earnestly look for death, to pray for death, to love death, to be comforted with the hope of death, to hasten death or to watch for death. But always and everywhere these exhortations have direct reference to the coming of Christ; "waiting for the Son from heaven."

Not always does the narration of personal experience furnish proof of argument, although it may help to elucidate a subject, or prove a stimulant to investigation. The following narrative will show how a few humble souls were led to adopt the doctrine of Christ's personal return as an imminent hope, and to sweetly enjoy its blessed anticipation.

In the early part of the year 1861, when the great wave of revival broke upon the shores of Britain, the southern portion of Ireland was visited with the power of God in a very marked manner. Many persons of the Protestant faith, having a name to live, were quickened into newness of life. Realizing the need of Scripture instruction, and having no teachers, a number of the converts, the writer amongst them, were led to establish a weekly meeting for Bible study.
Carefully we sought to compare Scripture with Scripture, waiting in prayer before the Lord for light on difficult passages, until the Word became living, real, intelligible, precious.

A few of the brethren could read Greek which helped us in our critical examination of the New Testament. We were without previous theological training, and had few theories to bring to the Word for test or ratification. Coming to the Bible for instruction we earnestly sought to know the way of the Lord. The Bible became very precious in its literalness and adaptation to the need and craving of the heart.

It was then, in journeying through the Gospels, and the Epistles, we discovered the Prominence Given to the Second Advent of Christ. With limited ideas of what the world outside, or the Church around, believed, regarding this doctrine, we investigated the Word alone, being neither helped nor hindered by traditional theology. The glorious coming of our Lord as an event hastening near, became to our souls an inspiring, energizing hope. It was not death; it was no mysterious spiritual coming; it was not even a literal coming, thousands of years hence, which we were led to embrace, but an approaching crisis.

As years rolled on the members of our Bible-class separated. Some are to-day, thank God, able ministers of the New Testament, teachers in the Church of God; some are evangelists, while others are more private Christians engaged in the pursuit of business, each one, however, firmly adhering to the personal, premillen-nial Advent of Christ, as the hope set forth in Holy Writ. In later years some of us have given our attention to reading post-millennial writings, and we have conversed freely with intelligent brethren, anti-advent in creed and profession. By these we have been entreated to give up what was not popular, while others have ridiculed our faith. Notwithstanding every contrary argument and opposing counsel, the conviction of the scripturalness of our position deepens, and the hope grows more precious. With added light, and after more exact Bible study we are well persuaded that Jesus will come again, and lift the planet from the curse of sin and make the place of His feet glorious.

RAMBLES AMONG LEAVES.

I DO not know what the spiritual history of Horatius Greenough, the celebrated artist was, but I think he must have been a Christian, for he said when he came to die: "It will not do for me to pass away and give no sign that I, having by the grace of God been born in this land, have found life to be far from the irksome task with which they scared my youth." I think if we enter into the spirit of the Lord Jesus, the natural world will be prophetic, inspiring, and grandly elevating. As I went through the woods to-day, I thought what grand things the frost—though so much maligned—can do. We usually suppose that the business of the frost is to blast, is to tear apart, is positively to kill, and yet no painter ever made such exquisite tints as to-day I have seen scattered by the finger of the frost all through the woods. And just so, I thought, it is with the trouble which God sends upon a Christian soul. Some have supposed that it is to blast and destroy. Far from that. The mission of trouble in the Christian heart is to beautify and adorn and glorify. As the frost changes the colors of the leaves, so God intended trouble to kindle in the Christian soul harmonies and glories. I have seen men go into misfortune and trial, and the world said: "They will be utterly trampled on and crushed out," and we expected them to come out from the scene of their misfortunes without any heart left; but they came out singing the praises of God. Had it not been for the trial that God sent upon you, O Christian soul, you would not have attained one-half the height of Christian character that you have already attained, and you know that whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth. It was sanctified trouble that gave Paul so much positive exhilaration of spirit that he could say: "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing: poor, yet making many rich: having nothing, yet possessing all things."

I thought to-day, further, as I went through the woods; What a grand place heaven must be. If out of this sinful and ruined world, God can make so much that is attractive to the eye, what must that land be where there are no hurricane-blasts strewing the leaves into the dust—where sorrow and trouble never come.

If you look at a piece of tapestry, and find that the wrong side of it is exquisite, you argue that the right side must be more superbly beautiful, and I suppose all the colors God has scattered in the autumnal woods to-day is only the wrong side while heaven is the right side.

Oh, what a land that must be! They hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light upon them, nor any heat, for the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes. If out of this sinful earth God can weave so much that is attractive to the physical eye, out of the grandeurs of heaven, what a spectacle of light, and love and joy will God weave for our souls in the time that is to come.

I thought to-day, also, as I went through the woods, how everything is "passing away." Unless within a few days you go out in the forests, you will see nothing of this glory of which I have been speaking. They have already begun to sweep up the falling leaves, and in a few weeks all that now attracts the eye in the forests will have perished. And so it is with all earthly beauty, and all earthly associations. The places which know us now, will soon know us no more forever. Those with whom we mingle on earth must be scattered into other circles, or with ourselves must be gone.

But though the world perish, and its beauty be gone, and everything of an earthly nature go out of our grasp; holding Christ, we hold an eternal possession!

USEFULNESS THE TEST.

FORMS, creeds, liturgies are indispensable. Apples must have rinds; nuts must have shells; corn must have husks; rising walls must have scaffolding; and Christianity must have these outside forms and decencies. But mere outward propriety will not make a useful church. There are scores of churches where there is no discord in the music, and no breach of taste in the preaching, and through the long-drawn service the congregation, like the Amalekites that Gideon saw, sleep in the valley like grasshoppers for multitude. Splendidly executed anthem, solo, and trill may roll over the cultured tastes of gaily-apparelled auditory, and the preaching may be like the pathos of Summerfield, or the thunder-clap of a George Whitefield. Upholstery may bedeck and tassel the pulpit to utter gorgeousness, and chandeliers flash upon a congregation in which you see not one poor man's thread-bare coat, and yet that church may be a ghastly sepulchre, full of dead men's bones—an ecclesiastical ice-house. What a factory would be with water-wheels flashing, and bands pulling, and machinery drumming, yet producing no carpets, no shawls, no screws, no muskets, that is a church with all the ordinances in full operation, yet producing no glorious and enthusiastic results; a factory in full blast doing nothing.

MINISTERS' CLOTHES.

THERE seems to be a great variety of opinion as to what ministers ought to wear. There is much caricature of white cravat, and coat with buttons, clear up to the top, and black kid gloves on ordinary occasions. Others advocate these peculiarities of clerical dress, and do not like to see preachers walking about with coat and cravat and manners other people. It is said that there ought to be something to distinguish them from men of other occupations, and that then they will be more highly respected for their office, cannot see the force of either side of argument. Our feeling is, let every minister dress as his taste dictates. We do not see ministers have not the right to as much lift in matters of apparel as men of other professions. If the clergyman desires a white cravat and so many buttons on straight-cut coat vest, that it may seem to settle forever the disputed question of the nursery: "But button, who has the button?" we cannot have any objection. Certainly no question of modesty can be involved if he has paid for the buttons. On the contrary, we think the soft hat and sack coat and white pants, if the weather be hot, are just as allowable. I doubt the Pharisee had all the habiliment propriety; but the publican came out ahead of him. We deny the right of anyone to tell ministers what they shall wear. We shall not get the dolorous countenance of a minister of the Reformed Church, who once labored with us very seriously for the offence of side whiskers, saying he thought it might cripple our influence. We contend for the right of ministers to do as they please, provided they do not wrong.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.

AN eminent clergyman, travelling in the East, wrote home a letter in which he quoted the passage of Scripture as "the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees." The type-setter, not very familiar with the Bible, mistook the "going" for the word "gong." We could scarcely believe our eyes when we read about the sound of a gong in the top of the mulberry trees. We did not believe that it could have been possible that a man had climbed up into such a place with a familiar hotel instrument of music. If he had reached that elevated point with a gong, he would not have been able to poise himself enough to strike it to any advantage. We were disposed to pronounce the whole thing to be a libel, until we thought that it must have been a typographical error.

But what writer or speaker has not suffered from similar mistakes? Hon. Daniel S. Ineson told us that he thought the type-setter had shortened his life by ten years. After a man did really say has gone through through four different hands, the speaker would not recognize his own deliverance. We read in a Boston paper two columns of a sermon which once or twice reminded us of something that we ourselves had said, when on the platform, and on finishing we looked up to the heading, and to our surprise found it our own. The process through which the sermon had gone had changed its tire texture. But faults are often charged upon reporters and printers which belong really to the speaker or writer. If people realized that many inarticulate utterances come from the platform and forum, the reporter would be excused for occasional mistakes. If people realized how much infamous chirography comes to the writing office, they would be more sympathetic with people who publish newspapers and

Mrs. Booth began preaching about 1863, or before her husband left the regular denominational ministry. In all her husband's egelistic tours during last twenty-five years, shared his exhausting rs, and her ministry been a marvellous power good, bringing many sands to Christ. The rd of her Christian t has already been re- ated at length in THE ISTIAN HERALD. The ral took place in London, on Monday, 12th , and was the occasion of a great demon- tion, thousands of the officers of the Sal- on Army attending the obsequies. The ices were held at Hammersmith, in a hall ing 24,000. On Tuesday, between 3,000 and 5 officers of the Army followed the remains to an ancient burial-place at Cambridge, where nterment was made.

Fourteen Hundred Canadians Arrived in New City, on Wednesday, October 8, for the purpose of viewing the sights of the American metropolis. The party included groups from just every town of consequence in the Do-don, and representatives of almost every thing. Naturally, the arrival of so large a ingent excited considerable comment. Talk-with American friends, they gave the impression that Canada was undergoing an experience and times, and that the feeling in favor of exaltation with this country was steadily growing. Money is scarce in Canada, and the pres-season has been an exceedingly bad one for the crops.

nine Years After His Martyrdom by the Savspearmen of King M'Wanga, on the shores Lake Victoria Nyanza, Bishop Hannington's body has been recovered by Mr. Jackson, an agent of the British East Africa Company. It is that after the murder the tribes, fearing the presence of the corpse of a white man among them would bring evil, took it from place to place, each tribe successively refusing to bury it. In this journey of the dead, a native had been a servant of the Bishop accompanying the body. At last, after many weeks, it reached Busoga, far north of the place where the murder was committed. The people there refused to allow it to rest, provided the servant should take care of it. It was deposited on a raised platform, and the servant kept guard, fighting off the beasts of prey and the venomous birds, and being supplied with food by the natives. This season the harvests were not a failure and the people, attributing this to the presence of the body, made haste to be-bury it. The body was restored to Mr. Jackson and given decent burial in the region where the tyrant bishop lost his life, and which is now given over to the whites.

New York Feels somewhat Sad over the recovery, on a recount of the population, the official figures of which they compared were not so very far out of the way, for all. Census Commissioner Porter made the figure a little over 1,500,000, while the police enumeration will probably make it 1,650,000.
 This is a disappointment to those who expected to find that the big city had very nearly touched the two-million mark.

That Even Truly Great Men may be Forgotten ing their life-time, is demonstrated in the e of Rev. Dr. George B. Cheever, who, had died thirty years ago, instead of last week, had have been mourned by almost a nation.
 man of rare scholarship and intense activity, was one of the most energetic spirits of olition days, and was the companion and assiate of Henry Ward Beecher, Wendell Phil-and William Lloyd Garrison. He was powerful both as a preacher and a lecturer, and from the time of his ordination, when 23 years of age, to the Howard Street Congregational Church, at Salem, Mass., in 1831, until 1867, he took a prominent part in all the great questions that came up before the country. His sturdy and uncompromising attitude on the temperance question, led to his imprisonment in Salem jail for thirty days. After 1846, he devoted himself to the anti-slavery agitation incessantly. Since 1867 he has done but little public work. The product of his leisure has been several books of a religious character. He was 83 years old when he died.

A Prominent Figure in the Controversy on the methods of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, which is now in progress at Minneapolis, is the famous Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale College, Dr. George P. Fisher, whose portrait is here given. Professor Fisher is a member of the Committee on Administration, which was appointed last year at the meeting of the Board in New York. The whole question turns upon the fact that the board had rejected certain men, who offered themselves as missionaries to heathen lands. They were admitted by the Board to be eligible so far as character, piety, and ability were concerned, but were rejected because they held doctrines on the question of eternal punishment not in harmony with those held by the Board. It appears that the Board's action has alienated the support of some of the churches, which have in consequence, withheld contributions. The Committee on Administration presented its report on Thursday last. From this document it appears that in the last ten years, as far as church contributions for foreign missions are concerned, there has been no increase, while all the other agencies of the church have advanced eighty per cent. The great Otis and Swett bequests for these missions are rapidly becoming exhausted. In view of this financial weakness, the Prudential Committee has decided to reduce the pledges for general work in foreign fields to sixteen per cent in old fields, and thirty two per cent in new work. This will be a great calamity to many over-burdened missionaries, and unless generously and promptly remedied, will involve the discharge of many native helpers. The Board is thus placed on its defence, and its side of the case will now be awaited with interest.

Whatever Else Switzerland may be Accused of, blood-letting is not one of her faults. The recent revolution will go down to posterity as the only movement of the kind in a century that was accomplished with the loss of but a single life. This was largely owing to the fact that the leaders on both sides were eminently men of peace. Rainaldo Simen, the father of the revolution, is an editor, and his associates, Perruchi, Bruni and Battaglini, are lawyers, Lepori, a civil engineer, being the only revolutionist of note with military experience. Gioachimi Respini, the deposed President, whose portrait is given in this column, and who met disaster because his Government tried to override the right of pub-appeal, belongs to the large Italian element which is merged with the Swiss Confederation. He has been throughout his public career an advocate of peace measures. He is about 48 years of age. Sturdy Col. Kunzli, the Federal Commissioner from Berne, whose arrival on the scene of the trouble at Bellinzona with two battalions of troops, effectually put an end to any military plans either side may have indulged, liberated the deposed officials from prison and set about restoring harmony, a task in which he seems to have succeeded. The revolutionary party won in the elections by a small majority.

President Harrison's Tour in the West has been a succession of pleasant receptions from old army comrades and acquaintances. At Galesburg, Peoria, Canton, and other places in Illinois, his old Grand Army friends turned out in large numbers to greet him. At Topeka, Kansas, where the State Reunion of Soldiers and Sailors is in session, the President, with Secretaries Tracy and Rusk, and other official friends, was present. Although there were many informal speeches delivered during the tour, they were almost wholly of the patriotic order, and politics was not intruded. At Peoria, the President reviewed his old command, the First Brigade, and laid the corner-stone of the alumni hall of Knox College. At Ottumwa, Ia., he visited the Coal Palace, a picture of which was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a recent issue.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. F. De Witt Talmage, the son of the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, has been elected orator to represent the junior class in the Union Theological Seminary at the reception to be given to the class by the upper classmen.

The Deaconess Training Institute, connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church, held its first session in Grace Church, New York, on Oct 1. Arrangements have been made to establish Institutes in Philadelphia, Cleveland, O., and Richmond, Va.

At the Twentieth Anniversary of the Southern New York Baptist Association, held last week in Calvary Church, New York, it was stated that the income for benevolent purposes for the year was $27,000, and for current expenses, $21,000. All the churches were reported making satisfactory progress.

A meeting of Jews was held last week in the Synagogue, Chrystie Street, New York, to devise plans and to raise money for sending the persecuted Jews of Russia to Palestine. About $1,000 was paid down at the meeting, and a large fund is being raised. Many wealthy and influential Jews in the city are interested in the effort. A secular daily journal calls attention to the movement as a fulfilment of prophecy.

Mr. George Muller, the octogenarian philanthropist, has been busy holding meetings in Stuttgart, Germany and its neighborhood. His physical and mental activity and true spirituality of thought, seem to furnish themes for wondering comment on the part of the Protestant press. One writer confesses to great surprise at meeting the venerable preacher in the streets of the city carrying his own carpet-bag.

Rev. Jacob Freshman lectured on Oct. 8, in the Pilgrim Church, of New York, of which Dr. Virgin is pastor, on "My trip to Egypt and Palestine." The lecture was deeply interesting, and will be followed by others on the same subject. Pastors of churches, by inviting Mr. Freshman to lecture in their churches, will do two good things : they will afford their people an opportunity of gaining knowledge about Bible-lands, and they will help Mr. Freshman to extend his work among the Jews of New York.

Contributions to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $17. They were from: Warren, N. H., $5; Philadelphia, Pa., $2; Porters, Del., $1; Portland, Me., $1; Louisville, Ky., $1; Peekskill, N. Y., $1; South Meriden, Conn., $1; Kansas City, Mo., $1; Curryville, Mo., $1; Winterset, Ia., $1; Baldwinville, Mass., $1. There was a typographical error in our acknowledgment last week. Though the total $18.50 was correct, the sum of $5. from Hoboken, N. J., was omitted and the amount from Newark, N. J., should have been $3, not $5. We are glad to get these contributions as we have a large number of applications from colored ministers, whose need is urgent, and evidently of the kind this journal is adapted to supply.

Rev. S. Hahnemann Bayley, who has labored in the Barbadoes for sixteen years, is now, in New York on a brief visit. He was here also five years ago. Then he was almost in despair. Severe illness had prostrated him, and the physicians here, whom he came to consult, gave him no hope of recovering sufficiently to return to his work. He left them, and trusted Christ for healing, was entirely cured, went back to Barbadoes and resumed his work. Since that time he has not lost a single service through sickness. He has opportunities of extending his work in the Barbadoes to adjacent islands, and his object in coming here is to get books and Christian literature, and other help for the work. He is depending wholly on God for support. Friends willing to assist him may send money or books addressed, Rev. S. Hahnemann Bayley, care of Rev. J. C. Thomas, Methodist Book Concern, New York.

DAVID'S DECISION.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

David's Refuge in His Trouble—His Confidence Established—I. His Resolve—Though Aged He would go On—To Warfare—A Lady's Bank Account—To Suffering—A Pair of Panniers—To Death—II. His Reliance—On Strength Already Received—Strength which Sanctified his Going—Adapted to His Need—To Fresh Peril—A Dangerous Place on a Mountain—III. His Message.

"I will go in the strength of the Lord God; I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." Ps. 71:16.

THIS is a psalm of David's old age, and we will carefully notice the characteristic feature of it. It is not addressed to men concerning God, but it is addressed to God Himself for He was David's dearest friend. Our psalms and hymns are not for man's criticism, but for the Lord's acceptance. This is the tenor of the psalm: he has been with his God, and he is now ready for anything. This grand old man, in his latter days, is exposed to enemies quite as fierce as those which he had to encounter in his earlier times; but instead of gathering his friends together, and conversing with them, and seeking their counsel, he gets quite alone, and begins to cry, "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust: let me never be put to confusion." Trusting alone in God makes us grandly independent toward men.

Now, if there are any here very much like David; if they are growing aged; and if, being aged, they are also surrounded by slander, persecution and reproach, let them see what David did. If they are met by great difficulties, and even by malicious adversaries, let them go where David went. Go and sit before the Lord, and pour out your heart before Him.

I. Now, here is, first.

His Resolve.

"I will go," saith he. See! he has come a long way already, and he is getting weary and faint, and the flesh suggests to him that he has had enough of it; while the devil hints to him that he has done too much already, and that the best thing he can do now, is to give up struggling, battling, warring and contending, and just sit down, and let things go as they like. Do you not hear the advice of unbelief, "Let affairs drift. You cannot help yourself, old man. You have got into a very sad condition. Give up your confidence in heaven. Perhaps you have been under a delusion all these years, and trust in this God of yours is sheer fanaticism. Do not go on with it. Be reasonable, like the many that are round about you who are criticizing, and amusing themselves, and while professing everything, are believing nothing. Give up the contest, and drop the sword with which you contended for your Master, and let things go as they may." So whispers Satan. So murmurs the flesh. So advises the worldly friend. The brave old man gets up, and cries, "No, I will go. I will not sit still. I will not give it up. I have not finished my life-work. I have more to do. I have further testimony to bear for my Master. Bring me my staff. I will go with the rest of the chosen company. See! he girds himself once again to follow the Lord, and he goes forward as bravely as when he first started.

The Aged Warrior.

It is my impression that David meant, "I will go to warfare." He was a man of war from his youth up; and, of course, after many years of fighting, which is by no means pleasant work, and after many serious risks, it might naturally suggest itself to the aged man that he had better quit the tented field. But there was "fight" in the old lion till the very last. The same spirit that made him go as a boy to fight with Goliath still burned in him when he became an old man, and he still said, "I will go." When he could not literally go to any physical conflict, you can see that, to the end, he fought for God and for truth, by his laws, his government, his influence, and his prayers. David turned a bold front toward the enemy to the very last, setting his face like a flint, resolving that he would administer justice and maintain the cause of God in Israel, as long as he lived. Well, dear friends, you are not called to be soldiers in the literal sense—the most of you, at any rate—but you are called to be soldiers of the Cross. These are fighting times, and no one must back out of the conflict. Be not cowards; be not neutrals. Show your colors, and fear no opposition.

A Wife's Economy.

Do you not think that large numbers of God's people are contented with a very poor form of spiritual life, because they do not think it possible to advance further? They have little joy, and little strength, because they are content with the joy and strength they have, and do not aspire to more. We make a great mistake, dear friends some of us, as to the whole style of our life. I met with a story, which seemed to me a rather pretty one. There was a young woman, fair to look upon, who was seen by a very wealthy man, who determined to make her his wife. She had been brought up to habits of rigid economy, for the family was straitened in circumstances. Her father was not of the very poorest, certainly, but still poor enough; and on her marriage-day he gave her all that he could afford, namely, five pounds, and that was put into the bank. Her husband, on that day, told her that he had placed money in the bank in her name, and he handed her a cheque-book, that she might draw money as she desired.

Unnecessary Trepidation.

Well, having been properly brought up, she spent her money very, very carefully. Five pounds was an enormous sum to her, and she felt frightened at running through so vast a sum. She found, however, that in the circle in which she was called to move, her five pounds was at last gone; and so she even ventured to draw a cheque for ten pounds. In considerable fear she went down in the carriage to the bank, to see whether they really would give her ten pounds all at a time. And when she got it she was surprised and overjoyed. She drew again until at last she had actually spent fifty pounds! One day her husband said to her, "Don't you know how to manage a cheque-book, my dear? I scarcely understand your account at the bank." She modestly replied, "I hope I have not been extravagant." "You little goose," he said, "I put a thousand pounds in the bank for you, and I thought you would soon expend it. Most women would. But instead of that, you have only spent fifty pounds, and you cannot behave yourself as my wife on such a pittance. Remember, you may be a poor man's daughter, but you are a rich man's wife; so just begin to spend according to my riches, and not according to your father's economy." This is our case in reference to our Lord Jesus. We know

We Are a Poor Man's Children

My original father "broke" long ago. There was nothing left of all the family estate. When father Adam was in business, he became a bankrupt, and he left us nothing but a sea of debt. But then we are married to King Jesus, who is heir of all things, and He puts the cheque-book of the promises into our hands, that we may draw from the riches of divine grace. Very few women need encouragement to spend money; but very many Christian women and Christian men need very great encouragement to draw upon the goodness of God, and to live at that high and noble rate of grace to which they are entitled by the call of the Holy Spirit, and by their heavenly union with the Lord Jesus Christ. I wish that we could pluck up courage and say, "I will go in for great grace and eminent holiness and close conformity to Christ. I will draw upon His riches in glory."

Let us cheerfully use this text whenever any service is proposed to us. A young man has been asked to preach at a small cottage meeting. He has been hesitating during the last two or three days whether he shall go or not. I want him to feel that, if this is a work in which he can glorify God, he should say, "I will go in the strength of the Lord God." There is a sister here who has been invited to take a class of young women. She thinks she is hardly fitted for the Bible-class proposed to her; yet she is the only person available, and evidently the finger of God points to her. I want to say, with David, "I will go in the strength of the Lord." Have you rendered no service your Saviour? Have I the unhappiness of addressing some member of a church who really done nothing for the Redeemer? Do you understand what the Gospel is? Do you know what its effect upon the heart is? How can you remain idle? I do not understand you or your religion.

We have also before us a man who will be suffering with holy resignation. A sister, now sent a letter, asking us to pray for her while she undergoes an operation. May Lord sustain her! It is a prayer we often like to put up, in this large congregation some of the very dearest and best among us. Dear friends, the text is for you with regard to the suffering you have to encounter: may you go forward to it without fear! Some of us have taken turns at the two forms of appointed exercise: we are sometimes serving, sometimes suffering; and occasionally we carry and both work and suffer. The Lord will with us under every form of trial: He will sustain us under personal pain, or bereavement, business care, or cruel persecution. Therefore, believer, do not linger, but say, "I will go."

Beloved, may it be so when we come to the end of our journey. In a short time unless the Lord shall come, and I will have to go up-stairs and gather up my feet in the bed, and die our fathers' God to me. Well, if it should happen to be some day which gives us warning and opportunity to think beforehand, we will go onward, to death in full view, without any trepidation, in the strength of the Lord. Some of us have what it is to lie for days and weeks, looking eternally, till our eyes have been able to steadily on death and all the future, and we have grown so used to the prospect, and so peaceful in reference to it, that we have almost been ready to come back again to life, and its trials and sins. When we were so prepared and even jubilant in the prospect of passing into the world of spirits, we almost reluctantly turned our face earthward again. When the time actually arrives, our God will give us grace to say, "I will go: I will go. My Lord has called me over the river, and I will go. I hear His strong and mighty voice saying, 'Arise my love, fair one, and come away!' I answer to it, 'My Master, I will come.'"

II. Now, secondly, notice

His Reliance.

He is ready to go, but he tells us how—"I will go in the strength of the Lord God." He was going glorifying in strength already received. He was a wonderful picture to me. While others were in another strength, he takes God's might as his armor. He has been displayed in his past career, and he puts it on as his armor. He would not put on Saul's armor, nor any fabric of carnal wisdom, neither now nor when he went against Goliath. He said to the giant, "I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts;" he put on a coat of mail the secret strength of God which he had verified and demonstrated in his past career, when he slew the lion and the bear. What a wonderful thing it is for a child of God to stand clothed with those garments of grace and beauty which are made up of what God has wrought in him and wrought for him!

In the Path of Duty.

He felt that he would go, also, in a path which sanctified his going. "I will go in the strength of the Lord God." Where will a man go in that strength? To the theatre? Verily, it is a sort of constructive blasphemy to imagine a Christian's going there in the strength of the Lord. Will he enter upon a speculation which he will, in all probability, rob other people if he succeeds, and injure others if he is disappointed? No, not in the strength of the Lord God. There are a thousand things that a man could not think of doing in the strength of the Lord God; and yet professing Christ venture upon them, to their sin and shame. the strength of the devil a man might attempt many of the doubtful enterprises and usements of modern professors; but in the strength of the Lord God—no. It were propriety to talk of it. Do you see what a limit this is upon a Christian's action? And yet it is a limit which in the least restricts his gracious activity. It is such a boundary as he himself could set up. You are strong to do what you ought to do.

Strength for all Crises.

Again, in this text I notice that he is confident to the sufficiency and adaption of God's strength to every trial or work to which he might be called; for the Hebrew, being plural, is at this. "I will go in the strengths of the Lord God." If I shall require mental vigor, God will give it me. If I shall want physical strength, He can give it me. If I shall need spiritual power, He can give it me. If the particular command is a clear sight, that I may detect and He the cunning of the enemy, He can give it.

If I require courage and quick resolve, He will give them me. If my special need be firmness of mind in the day of temptation, He can give it.

If it be a patient temper, He can give it.

Nothing is wanted by a believer, but that which the strength of God supplies when it is needed. As our days our strength shall be. We will find the supply always equal to the demand.

"Oh," says one, "my way is very strange. Could not tell you the singular difficulty of my way." Dear friend, I do not wish to know the particulars; but I am sure that, however strange the case is to me and to you, it is not strange to God; and if you go in the strength of the Lord God, you have exactly that which is needed for your perplexing path of pilgrimage.

A Peril on a Mountain.

Or, possibly, you have come to a fresh peril. You have reached a very hard bit of the road where real danger lurks. I remember that, in going over the Grimsel, we came to a place which was called "Hell Place." It was a narrow road by the side of a precipitous gorge. The way was very slippery, and the horses began to slip about. We soon dismounted and then we had to walk over a bit of rock, which was as smooth as ice. You do come to such a place now and then in the road of life, and you feel more than half inclined to go back: but you must not go back. Believers may not go back. It is written, "If any man draw back, his soul shall have no pleasure in him." You must to-night put down your foot, and resolve that you will never turn to the right hand nor to the left, but keep your face forever Zionward. Say, "I will go in the strength of the Lord God."

A Peril on a Mountain.

Or, perhaps, you are going away from us altogether, dear friend. You have come in here for the last time to-night, for you are going to be far away in the country. Or you have already taken your passage to New Zealand, or Australia, or Canada. Very well, go in the strength of the Lord God. That is the way to go to unknown lands.

"Oh, it is not that!" says one, "but mine is a miserable family trouble. There is a lot in it that is wrong—mischief I cannot tell to anybody. I seem to get no help." Well, go in the strength of the Lord God. That is the right way to go. If you have nobody else to help you, go in His strength. I told you of a good woman who was speaking about Mr. Hudson Taylor some years ago. She said, "Poor Mr. Hudson Taylor! I do not think that he can depend upon any of the missionary societies to help him. He has nobody to trust to but God." She said it in that kind of style too—"nobody to trust to but God." And whom do you want to trust to but God? It is a glorious thing to get all the dog-shores locked away, that the ship may be launched and may float upon the great ocean.

III. Now, I have only a minute to speak upon the last point. I will save that for another time, I think. David informs us as to his message. He will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." The only testimony that he was going to bear for the rest of his life would be a testimony to the righteousness of the Lord God. Here was enough work for a lifetime, and here was the man who was at home in the work. I cannot go into it. Therefore I say this: Bear your testimony to the righteousness of God in providence. Stand to it that the Lord never does wrong. He is never mistaken; but whatever He ordains is, and must be, unquestionably right. Bear witness, next, to His righteousness in salvation; that He does not save without an atonement; that He does not put away sin without being strictly just; that He does by no means spare the guilty, but has laid on Christ that which was due to human sin, that He might be "just and the justifier of him that believeth." Go on, then, to tell everybody that the righteousness that saves you is Not Your Own Righteousness.

Declare the righteousness of God as to a future state. Declare that whatever Scripture speaks of the ungodly is true and that God is righteous in it. Never mind the cavils and the inventions of this present age: God's character can never be harmed by these dreamers. Stand you by your God, and you may rest assured that time shall never change the essential truth that He is a holy and a righteous God, and will justify His ways to men.

But the time has gone, so I have only to say this: there is no other righteousness worth talking about; but if you will mention the righteousness of God, you will do much good. Make mention of the righteousness of God to convince men of their unrighteousness. Talk of it to win their admiration for the Lord Jesus. Oh, that everybody in this place knew how righteous the Lord Jesus was, not only in life, but in nature! Talk of the righteousness of God to show men the way of salvation. Tell them how the Lord laid help upon Christ, and that, while He is infinitely gracious, He is infinitely just. Then go on to point convinced sinners to where righteousness is to be had. Here is a happy vocation for the remainder of our sojourn here below. For ever and only make mention of God's righteousness. To Him be glory forever. Amen.

JOSIAH DEAN'S BAR.

PART III.

MRS. Dean did not appear to share Kate's view of the humiliation involved in Joe being sent to a Reformatory. She said: "But, daughter," I had just as soon have it known that a son of mine was at a Reformatory, as that he deserved to go."

"Why no, mother," replied Kate impatiently, "I can think of nothing so disgraceful as to have a member of our family at such a place. That he deserved to go would not be so generally noised abroad as that he was there. What does Richard say? He never wrote me anything about it! I suppose he will want our engagement broken. He will not care to marry a girl whose brother has so disgraced himself and his family."

"You do not know Richard Murdock very well, if you say that of him. Since you have been away, he has been more of a son to me than my own boys," returned her mother.

"Joe and Rob don't feel very friendly toward him," said Mr. Dean. "They half suspect him of going to the judge."

"Oh, surely, they are wrong! He would not have done such a mean thing."

"Well, I am sure I do not know," rejoined her father.

After tea, Kate strolled out alone into an orchard that sloped toward a brook which ran not far from the house. Her mind was in a very unsettled state. She had been so mortified to hear such news of her brother. And then the hint her father threw out, in regard to

Richard, troubled her. She felt that she would rather meet him for the first time without having any eyes upon them. She did not have long to wait. In fact she had only reached the edge of the brook and had hold of the branch of a low spreading oak, looking thoughtfully into the water, before she felt herself seized by a pair of manly arms, while Richard, whose approach had been unheard, on account of the noise of the brook, said:

"My own darling Kate! How glad I am to have you at home again!"

Kate was so taken by surprise she could not summon at once the dignity that she had intended to assume. She was glad to be at home, glad to see Richard, and she could not help but tell him so. And he could not help but tell her how beautiful she had grown, and a thousand other sweet things that he had been longing to say to her. Together they strolled down by the stream. The beautiful twilight hour, the peaceful scene, and their reunion—there was enough happiness in these conditions to crowd out everything of an unpleasant nature, for a while at least. So Kate and Richard found it. They followed the brook until they came to a large maple (a land-mark in that section of the country) where they sat down, and the first pair in the Garden of Eden might have envied them. But as the fall came to disturb the happiness of Adam and Eve, so recollections of home troubles, occurring to Kate, made her thoughtful and sad. Richard guessed what made her sad and did not ask her. At length she said:

"Richard, do you know what was almost the first thing I said, after hearing of the terrible disgrace that has befallen my brother?"

"No, what was it?" inquired Richard.

"I said," replied Kate, "I thought you would not want to have anything more to do with me."

"But you surely did not mean what you said. You could not have thought so meanly of me as that would imply. If I was anything of the friend to you that I professed to be, you ought to have known that trouble would have drawn us closer together."

"Ah, yes; trouble of a certain kind would; but not such a family disgrace as having a brother in a reformatory."

"But, Kate my darling," said Richard, tenderly kissing her, "do you not see, this disgrace as you call it, may turn out to be a blessing? Your brother will be taught, and kept away from all evil, especially from liquor and these two years may be the turning-point in his life."

Just at this juncture, there was a rustle in the bushes not far away and both turned, expecting to see some one emerge, but as no one did, they concluded the noise came from the moving of cattle.

"Richard," said Kate, rising and drawing away, "you talk as if you might have been the one who influenced the judge to change his decision. I should be very angry if I thought that of you."

"Listen, Kate!" said Richard, trying to take her hand which she refused to let him have. "As God is my witness, everything I did in that matter I did with a view to gaining the greatest good for your brothers and mother. You don't know how bad your brothers are getting to be. You have not the faintest idea how terribly I feel over the thought that I was the one to give you the wrong advice, in regard to watching over them, and trying to influence them in the right direction. With that idea haunting me, since you have been away, it has been my great aim to undo the evil, by trying to get them under the right influences. I saw in this decision a way to remove Joe to better surroundings and I acknowledge frankly, I did what I could to have him taken away. You do not blame me? Or, if you do, at least you will tell me you believe that my motives were sincere. You will say you believe in me, Kate?" said her lover, holding out his arms to receive her, as a dear pledge of her faith in him.

Kate hesitated: as she did so the movement in the bushes increased, a bright flash, followed by a sharp report of a pistol, broke the stillness of the evening air, and the arms that were held out for her were thrown up, as Richard fell heavily to the ground.

"We will say we believe him to be a most infernal scoundrel, eh, Kate?" said her brother Robert, laughing a coarse, drunken laugh, as he staggered out from the bushes.

What a terrible moment for Kate! She bent anxiously over Richard, and as she did so, Robert spoke:

"If he stirs again, I have another load that will finish him."

"Is it possible my brothers have fallen so low?" thought Kate.

"Robert," she said, advancing firmly towards him, "give me that pistol."

"Not much, my beauty. I will put a ball through you if you anger me."

Kate never knew how she did it, but with the quickness born of despair she snatched the pistol out of her brother's hand, and when he sprang towards her to regain the weapon, she jumped towards the bank of the stream. This was her salvation, for in going after her, his foot slipped and he rolled over into the water. Kate was not afraid her brother would be harmed, the water was only a couple of feet deep, and throwing the pistol as far up the stream as she could, she hastened to Richard's side.

He lay motionless, the blood flowing from both arms. Those dear arms that had been held out to her, entreating her to believe in him. What if she never should have the chance to assure him of that belief? How noble his conduct appeared to her now! And how contemptible her own feeling of mortified pride. While these thoughts were occupying Kate's mind, she was hard at work, tearing first her handkerchief, and then her skirt into bandages to stanch the blood. So intent was she that she did not notice what her brother was doing, till she heard a trembling voice say:

"Well, I suppose I shall have to swing for this."

She looked around, and there stood Robert. The sudden plunge had dispelled the effects of the whisky. He was dripping with water, but with a very different expression of countenance.

"Oh, Robert," moaned Kate, "How could you do anything so terrible?"

"Why, Kate, you know very well I would not have done it if I had not been drunk. How is a fellow to help doing things when he's tipsy?"

"Bring me some water in your hat, Robert," said Kate, "the bleeding has almost stopped, and I think we can bring Richard to himself."

They were successful, and in a minute, Richard opened his eyes. He made an effort to raise himself. Kate tenderly placed his head on her shoulder and encircled him with her arms. No words could tell how precious he was to her now.

"How did all this happen?" he asked in a faint voice, looking into Robert's face. "Oh, yes, now I remember. But you did not mean to do it, did you Robert? You were under the influence of liquor, were you not?"

"Yes," said Robert, burying his head in his hands, and sobbing aloud. "But I am too bad to live! I shall deserve anything the law gives me. I am going to give myself up right away."

While Robert hurried up to the house to tell his father and mother of the sad "accident," and to have the hired man bring the easiest carriage for the wounded man, Kate endeavored to make him as comfortable as she could.

"If you want to help me get over this," said Richard, speaking with great effort, "you will make me a solemn promise and we three will enter into a compact. You will promise not touch another drop of any kind of liquor?"

There was a long pause, when Robert raised his tear-stained face and said solemnly:

"Richard, I promise, so help me God."

Soon Mr. Dean with bowed head and Mrs. Dean wringing her hands, appeared.

"Richard, my boy, this is bad, bad business," exclaimed the old man, in a trembling voice.

"Not so bad as it might be," replied Richard cheerfully, "and if you should feel inclined to do as much for me, as Kate and Robert are doing to do, it would turn out a blessed time."

"Richard, I thought you knew me better than to doubt my willingness to do anything my power to serve you, after what has happened. There is nothing that you might ask, that I would not joyfully do."

"Even to closing your bar and having for this time forth a strictly temperance hotel," asked Richard.

"All right, Richard, it shall be as you say."

That was the end of Josiah Dean's Bar after Richard recovered, and Kate became Mrs. Murdock, the cause of Temperance had more earnest supporters in Brewster than Dean and Murdock families.

THE SITE OF ANCIENT LACHISH.

IN a former number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, mention was made of the very interesting excavations recently made in Syria by the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund. In the district around Khurbat Ajlon, in the country of the Amorites, these excavations have brought to light what is believed to be the site of the ancient town of Lachish, which, with its sister town of Eglon, was among the chief cities of the Amorites in the days when Sihon was the king of Heshbon, and Og king of Bashan. Khurbat Ajlon is about fourteen miles northward of Gaza. The site of Lachish lies upon a great mound, known as Tel-el-Hesy.

On April 14th, Mr. Petrie, of the Exploration Fund, having secured permission from the Ottoman authorities, began digging in the mound. Lachish was probably at the height of its fame and prosperity about the time of King Rehoboam. Some of the stone slabs, with sculptured ed pilasters and beautiful decorations, are believed to have been executed by workmen of the same school with those who built Solomon's Temple. The fragments of pottery found are supposed by archaeologists to belong to the twelfth century before Christ, although many are evidently much older. Some of the pottery has a fine glaze, and is ornamented with scratched lines in a peculiar manner. The pieces shown in the illustration are of this class.

This is the first occasion upon which explorers have come upon any remains of the ancient Amorites. Lachish was captured by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah's reign, and on one of the sculptures on the walls of the palaces at Babylon is portrayed the taking of the fortress. As it fell under Assyrian rule, another layer of buildings was added to the preceding deposits. Then came the Macedonian conquests and these were followed by a Greek town springing up on the ruins of the Assyrian buildings. The Amorite foundation lowest of all is of prehistoric antiquity. That nation seems to have been at one time the most powerful in all Syria, having dominion over Moab and other great races, about the time that Moses undertook the holy mission, under God's inspiration, of delivering Israel out of the hands of the tyrannous Egyptians.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY,

Author of "Nestleton Magna," "Simon Holmes, the Carpenter," "Will it Lift?" etc., etc.

GEORGE dropped the towel which he had been using, and said, as he kissed her brow. "What mother! sighing at the very thought of it! Nay, then, I'll tell you no more. Be quite sure the woman isn't born yet that could ever come between me and the most precious mother in all the world. Besides, it's all nonsense. What put it into the old man's head, I don't know. I expect it'll go out again just as oddly. But you know of old, when Abram gets a notion into his head, how he does run on."

Hereupon, Mrs. Appleton recovered her content, or thought she had, and smiled her satisfaction. Then after the old, old fashion of her kind, she began to seek for further information. "Very well," said she, "I think, as you say, that I can gauge Abram pretty well. And what prize, then, in the matrimonial line has he found for you? And how are you to secure it, as you say, and gain promotion at the same time?"

"Why, you see," quoth George. "The old man's niece has come to live with him. I don't seem to think that he's over well pleased about it. He's hardly the man, Abram isn't, to change his household arrangements, especially if it means an accession of 'petticoats.' Possibly that's the reason why he is willing to give me his vote and interest. Well, no, not that, exactly," he continued, warned by the rising cloud to be very careful, "but I can put this and that together, you know, mother mine."

"You mean that the scheming old fellow wants to put you two together," interposed

Kate Dean Fears her Lover is Dead.

Mrs. Appleton, betrayed by her rising feelings into a pun, which was not very much in her line. "I'll warrant Old Crusty's got some secret end to answer, if the truth was known."

"Nay, I think I can read him pretty clearly, mother, this time. After all is said and done, I think he has some regard for me, and would like me to have the business after him: and I fancy he thinks that I might be induced to take Miss Nora, too."

"Nora, eh? You've soon found out her name. What's made him have her here, I wonder, when he wouldn't have her mother? Though it is no other than right and just he should," continued Mrs. Appleton. "He ought to care for his own kith and kin. But why he should let the mother die in the cold, so far as he was concerned, and then fetch the daughter home, I can't—"

"Nay, but think a minute, mother," said George, sympathetically. "Mother and daughter were together then. Now, the poor lassie's all alone. God help her! And she's far too handsome to be left unfriended."

Mrs. Appleton thought there was a very needless amount of emphasis in that last expression of opinion, and her quick glance was again directed to her son. George did not see it, however; he was too busy unlacing his boots. "Then you've seen her, have you, George?"

"Yes. I saw her when she left the stage. I helped to carry her portmanteau indoors. Afterward I had to go into the kitchen to melt some glue, and there she was, chatting with her uncle about her journey, and a right pleasant voice she had."

"And is she really so good-looking?" asked Mrs. Appleton, with a tremor in her voice, for she was a good deal disconcerted, and was of far too transparent a character herself to hide it. She was anxious to gauge the strength of George's first impressions. George was going to speak with needless emphasis.

He began: "I don't think I ever saw—"

He happened to catch a glimpse of the reflection of his mother's face in the little mirror above the mantelpiece; he paused for half a second, and then finished the sentence thus—"any woman so attractive as my mother, and I'm willing to wait long for a wife if I can meet her match at last."

It was well both for mother and son that they were no strangers to the power of real religion to guide, to guard, and to sustain. All its consolations and support will the mother need; all his strength of principle and love of truth will her son require, because of the advent of the bright-eyed, gypsy-looking lassie, whose shadow even now has fallen on their hearth.

There was yet another individual who was a good deal stirred and ruffled by reason of Nora Mansford's arrival under Abram Hardale's roof tree. Tabitha Crowle, the carpenter's house-keeper, was offended, angry, wrathful. I am not sure that I can find a word which would do justice as a description of the state of mind of Tabitha Crowle when, on her return from feeding a small flock of goslings in the paddock beyond the garden, she found a strange woman unbonneted, and evidently at home, sitting in her own kitchen as if she did not mean to leave it;—and worse still, Abram Hardale sitting in the old-fashioned, bees-waxed and polished Pembroke chair, which had been her own by right of unquestioned and undisturbed appropriation for full a dozen years last past.

Abram Hardale had never during the whole of that time, come and sat with her in that friendly fashion, and Tabitha had learned to look upon the kitchen as her own domain, her peculiar manor in which trespass was to be dared, only at a risk and cost. Woe to the 'prentice lad, who came in on some errand from the shop, if he did not wipe his feet on the straw mat at the door until his boots were as clean as the sanded red-brick floor, and the carefully whitened hearth. Not seldom the youngster would prefer to pull off his boots, and make the passage in his stockinged feet, rather than risk a possible broadside from Tabitha's battery of guns. It was this bright, clear, winsome and cosy aspect of Tabitha's kitchen which had delighted Nora, who went and took possession of it, as though it were her peculiar right, and Abram, loath to follow her, did so rather than confess to her that it was more than he dared to do.

Short, squat, plump and rosy was Tabitha Crowle. For a "woman with a temper" she was a remarkably well-preserved and buxom body, wearing her five-and-forty years as lightly as if they had been fewer by full fifteen. It is fair to say that Tabitha's temper was not generally what may be called "hot" except in matters that had regard to the cleanliness of her house, of which she had sole charge, and which was certainly, to use her own description of her ideal:

"Spick span, clean as a pin, Monday out and Sunday in."

The one other direction in which Tabitha's temper was apt to boil over was—Abram Hardale. How these two had managed to dwell in the same house together for a dozen long years was a perennial conundrum in Settleworth, and its astounded population seemed to be compelled to "give it up." The only way I think of accounting for it is this—satirical Abram and keen-tongued Tabitha had each met their match.

No sooner did Tabitha Crowle find herself inside her invaded dominions, than she gave tongue: "Hoity-toity! Upsee daysee! Who's come hither-away? What do you mean, Mister Abram Hardale, a comin' into my kitchen, without either a 'with your leave' or a 'by your leave'; let alone mekin' a stranger as free as yourself."

"All right," said Abram, in troubled tones, a cross between anger and deprecation, and then, as if willing to explain, he proceeded: "This is my niece, Tabby; I wouldn't have brought her in here, but she took such a fancy to your kitchen that I couldn't possibly keep her out of it. She said she could eat her dinner off the floor, it was so beautifully clean, an' that she could see to do up her hair in the oven door, it was so wonderfully bright."

I don't believe that Nora said any such thing, though she certainly had spoken of her surroundings there in language of admiration. Abram Hardale had evolved it, out of his inner consciousness, hoping to flatter his irate handmaiden into a more placable frame of mind. But it wouldn't do for Tabitha.

"Niece, eh? Might niver ha' known you had one for all you iver said about her. She didn't come down on you unexpected, I suppose, like a tile on a windy day!" With this parting shot she bounded through the kitchen toward some part of her dominions still further in the rear, leaving surly Abram to wish that he had taken the trouble to warn her a little beforehand of the impending advent of his niece.

Abram knew from past experience that what had transpired was only the pioneer dropping and souging of a storm of some severity—at least his experience gave him reason to think so. "We had better go into the parlor," he said, "Tabby's going to spit. I never told her you were coming."

"Then you did very wrong, Uncle, and Tabby, as you call her, has some reason to be cross," said Nora. "Spit, is she? Please go, then; but let me stay. Tabby will purr; not spit, for I'll stroke her down—the right way, you know. Did you ever try that plan with people when they are cross, Uncle Abram?"

Uncle Abram retired without answering. If he had answered, and truthfully, he would have surely said, "No, I never did;" for he had never tried. Abram Hardale had no sooner made his exit from the special territory of Tabitha Crowle, than that plain-spoken henchwoman was surprised by another and, if possible, still more unwarrantable invasion of her domain. Nora followed her into the regions at the rear, and found her busily engaged in scouring the tin pail from which the young goslings had just been fed. Without so much as a "with your leave" she placed her two hands on Tabitha's shoulders. No sooner was Tabitha's face turned in wondering inquiry than the little gypsy kissed her heartily.

"There!" said she, when this act was accomplished to her complete satisfaction. "O what a comfort it is to have a bonnie face to kiss!"

Her remark had an effect besides that which she intended. She suddenly remembered that the lips of her own dear mother were the last that had received any imprint of her own until now, and altogether false to her own programme, the dear lassie burst into tears. This was not by any means what Nora intended; but there is no question that it answered her purpose sooner and more effectively. She meant to conquer Tabitha by merriness and candid overtures of friendship and I am far from saying that her efforts would have been in vain. But in that case she must have laid long siege and have been content to win a victory by slow process. Her unintentional tears added infinite weight to her artillery, and at once she took the place, Tabitha's heart, by storm, and made it her own.

"Nay, bairn, nay," said Tabitha deprecatingly, "I didn't mean to scare you. I was only lettin' Abram know a bit o' my mind. I hadn't common patience with him. He's that worritin' that I've afeared I shall do him a 'armsturn some o' these days. There is hope o' some folks mendin', even i' their old age, but him mend? Yes, like sour milk i' summer, only, he can't be much sourer than he is already." Then noticing for the first time Nora's black dress and the mourning-locket hung on her neck by a chain of jet, further light dawned on Tabitha and she continued still more placidly, "you see, dearie, he telled me nothing about anybody coming, an' it was just as like as not that the spare bed would be unmade up and the blankets at the wash. But if I had known it was somebody that has lost—somebody that—that wanted somebody to kiss, why—"

Tabitha, sensible body that she was, thought the best way for her to finish was to weep with them that weep, and to return the kiss with interest. So the covenant was made between them both, and Tabitha Crowle and Nora Mansford were at one.

I think this good understanding between them was materially strengthened by two considerations, which it may be well to mention. Nora's habit was to put things and leave things in a state of disorder. Thoroughly neat, and almost painfully particular so far as her own person was concerned, Nora was not "tidy" as Tabitha put it; in fact, she was, I am afraid, downright untidy. Like many other young folks, she thought it quite enough to shut the door and hide the topsey-turveydom from public view; not that she always contributed even that much to the maintenance of order and decorum. She left things about, or to quote the exemplary Tabitha on the subject: "Miss Nora's gotten quite a humbly-jumbley way with her of tossin' her things about; sometimes they're all of a heap in a corner like a upset rag-bag; an' sometimes they're scattered about so there is ever such a bother to side 'em up again."

Not seldom, too, the young maiden had to submit to reproof for standing on the white hearthstone with boots that would not bear critical inspection in the matter of freedom from yard gravel and garden soil.

But all this was as it should be, and accorded admirably with the eternal fitness of things. Think of a very pink of perfection like Tabitha Crowle residing continually with an equal pink of perfection! Both of them equally, perfectly, unfalteringly clean and fidgety. Surely they would be the death of each other. Nora's careless ways gave piquancy to Tabitha's love of order, found her honest work to do, and cause for saying reasonable things. This latter point is a general godsend to the female mind, and to those of the male sex who are not given to silent musing, as their favorite form of speech.

The other thing that helped to strengthen the bond and covenant between Tabitha and the young newcomer was this. Nora did not seem to go in the slightest fear of her Uncle Abram. "She can stick up to him as well as I can," was Tabitha's wit-ness on this subject. "Yes, an' better, for she keeps her temper solid like, an' mine falls into thousands of pieces."

Soon after Nora had settled down a little in her new home, Abram had treated her to a few of those scarifying and sarcastic sentences of which he was so cool a master. When they were uttered in Tabitha's hearing, she shrank under them for Nora's sake, feeling the clean cut of the knife for her, though she did not mind the snap of her finger for still sharper words directed to herself. But when she found that Abram Hardale's biting utterances elicited from Nora a laugh, a joke, and sometimes a keen retort, all the more keen for being feathered by a smile, Tabitha was delighted and could not help boasting to the spare old cynic himself—

"There's two folks," she said "that doesn't care any more for the rough side of your tongue than they do for the smooth. You find me a bit of a prickly-back;" by this Tabitha meant a hedge-hog, "an' Miss Nora turns the edge o' your razor, till there's no more cut in it than in your shaving brush."

"Very good," said Abram, dryly, "You've both of you more sense than folks wi' less. You can take your medicine an' not grin; but it tastes as sweet as the roll in the revelation did, after it's gone."

Here the old fellow chuckled out a hard, slow, dry laugh, as Thomas Carlyle says, as though he were "whiffing through wool."

Then Tabitha lost her temper, and bore down upon him in rough Yorkshire homespun, far more vigorous than elegant, leaving her mistress of the field by sheer dint of talking him down, and talking him out. Usually she gave him a final shot as he passed the window with a sardonic grin on his face, and his ego whiskers quite electric with satisfaction at the storm he had raised.

WHY DOST THOU WAIT?

POOR trembling lamb! Ah! who outside the fold
Has bid thee stand, all weary as thou art, angers around thee, and the bitter cold Creeping and growing to thy inmost heart?
Who bids thee wait till some mysterious feeling,
Thou know'st not what—perchance may'st never know—
Shall find thee when in darkness thou art kneeling,
And fill thee with a rich and wondrous glow
Of love and faith; and change to warmth and light
The chill and darkness of thy spirit's night!

For miracles like this who bids thee wait?
Behold "the Spirit and the Bride say,
'Come,'"
The tender Shepherd opens wide the gate,
And in His love would gently lead thee home.
Why should'st thou wait? Long centuries ago,
Thou timid lamb, the Shepherd paid for thee!
Thou art His own. Would'st thou His beauty know,
Nor trust the love which yet thou can'st not see?
Thou hast not learned this lesson to receive:
More blest are they who see not, yet believe.

Still dost thou wait for feeling? Dost thou say,
"Fain would I love and trust, but hope is dead,
I have no faith, and without faith, who may Rest in the blessing which is only shed
Upon the faithful? I must stand and wait."
Not so. *The Shepherd does not ask of thee
Faith in thy faith, but only faith in Him.*
And this He meant in saying "Come to Me."

In light or darkness, seek to do His will,
And leave the work of faith to Jesus still.

"A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho," Luke 10: 30.

IT is the morning of December 5, in Jerusalem and we take stirrups for the road along which the wayfarer of old fell among thieves who left him wounded and half dead. Job's picture of the horse in the Orient as having neck "clothed with thunder" is not true of most horses now in Palestine. There is no thunder on their neck, though there is some lightning in their heels. Poorly fed and unmercifully whacked, they sometimes retort. To Americans and English, who are accustomed to guide horses by the bridle, these horses of the Orient, guided only by foot and voice, make equestrianism an uncertainty, and the pull on the bridle that you intend for slowing up of the pace may be mistaken for a hint that you want to out-gallop the wind or wheel in swift circles like the hawk. But they can climb steep and descend precipices with skilled foot, and the one I chose for our journey in Palestine shall have the praise of going for weeks without one stumbling step, amid rocky steeps where an ordinary horse would not for an hour maintain sure-footedness.

There were eighteen of our party, and twenty-two beasts of burden carried our camp equipment. We are led by an Arab sheik with his black Nubian servant carrying a loaded gun in full sight, but it is the fact that this sheik represents the Turkish Government which assures the safety of the caravan.

LED BY AN ARAB SHEIK.

We cross the Jehoshaphat Valley which, if it had not been memorable in history and were only now discovered, would excite the admiration of all who look upon it. It is like the gorges of the Yosemite or the chasms of the Yellowstone Park. The sides of this Jehoshaphat Valley are tunneled with graves and overlooked by Jerusalem walls—an eternity of depths overshadowed by an eternity of architecture. Within sight of Mount Olivet and Gethsemane and with the heavens and the earth full of sunshine, we start out on the very road mentioned in the text when it says: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves." No road that I ever saw was so well constructed for brigandage—deep gulleys, sharp turns, caves on either side. There are fifty places on this road where a highwayman might surprise and overpower an unarmed pilgrim. His cry for help, his shriek of pain, his death-groan would be answered only by the echoes. On this road to-day we met groups of men who, judging from their countenances, have in their veins the blood of many generations of Rob Roys. Josephus says that Herod at one time discharged from the service of the temple forty thousand men and that the great part of them became robbers. So late as 1820, Sir Frederick Henniker, an English tourist was attacked on this very road from Jerusalem to Jericho and shot and almost slain. There has never been any scarcity of bandits along the road we travel.

With the fresh memory of some recent violence in their minds, Christ tells the people of the good Samaritan who came along that way and took care of a poor fellow that had been set upon by villainous Arabs and robbed, and pounded and cut. We encamped for lunch that noon close by an old stone building, said to be the tavern where the scene spoken of in the Bible culminated. Tumbled in the dust and ghastly with wounds, the victim of this highway robbery lay in the middle of the road—a fact of which I am certain, because the Bible says the people passed by on either side. There were twelve thousand priests living at Jericho and they had to go to Jerusalem to officiate at the temple. And one of these ministers of religion, I suppose, was on his way to the temple service and he is startled as he sees this bleeding victim in the middle of the road. "Oh," he says, "here is a man that has been attacked of thieves." "Why don't you go home?" says the minister. The man in a comatose state makes no answer or, with a half-dazed look, puts his wounded hand to his gashed forehead and draws out "What?" "Well," says the minister, "I must hurry on to my Duties at Jerusalem.

I have to kill a lamb and two pigeons in sacrifice to-day. I cannot spend any more time with this unfortunate. I guess somebody else will take care of him. But this is one of the things that cannot be helped, anyhow. Beside that, my business is with souls and not with bodies. Good morning! When you get well enough to sit up, I will be glad to see you at the Temple." And the minister curves his way out toward the overhanging sides of the road and passes. You hypocrite! One of the chief offices of religion is to heal wounds. You might have done here a kindness that would have been more acceptable to God than all the incense that will smoke up from your censer for the next three weeks and you missed the chance. Go on your way! Execrated by the centuries!

Soon afterward, a Levite came upon the scene. The Levites looked after the music of the temple and waited upon the priests and provided the supplies of the temple. This Levite passing along this road where we are to-day, took a look at the mass of bruises and laceration in the middle of the road. "My! my!" says the Levite, "this man is awfully hurt and he ought to be helped. But my business is to sing in the choir at the temple. If I am not there, no will carry my part. Beside that, there may be enough frankincense for the censers and wine or oil may have given out, and what a full balk in the service that would make. One of the priests might get his breast-plate crooked. But it seems too bad to leave man in this condition. Perhaps I had better try to staunch this bleeding and give him a little stimulant. But, no! The ceremony at Jerusalem is of more importance than taking of the wounds of a man who will probably be dead, anyhow. This highway robbery ought to be stopped, for it hinders us Levites on way up to the temple. There, I have lost minutes already! Go along, you beast!" shouts, as he strikes his heels into the side of the animal carrying him, and the dust rising from the road hides the hard-hearted official.

The Good Samaritan.

But a third person is coming along this road. You cannot expect him to do anything by way of alleviation, because he and the wounded belong to different nations which have abominated each other for centuries. The wounded man is an Israelite, and the stranger now coming on this scene of suffering is a Samaritan. They belong to nations which hated each other with an obprobrium and malediction diabolical. They had opposition temples, one on Mount Gerizim and the other on Mount Moriah. I guess this Samaritan when he comes up to give the fallen Israelite another clip and says: "Good for you! I will just finish the work these bandits began, and give you one more kick that will put you out of your misery. Here is a rag of your coat that they did not take and I will take that. What! Do you dare appeal to me for mercy? Hush up! Your ancestors worshipped at Jerusalem and they ought to have worshipped at Gerizim. I take that! And that! And that!" will say Samaritan as he pounds the fallen Israelite.

No; the Samaritan rides up to the scene suffering, gets off the beast and steps down looking into the face of the wounded man and says: "This poor fellow does not belong to my nation, and our ancestors worshipped in different places, but he is a man, and that makes him my brother. God pity him, as I do!" And he drops down on his knees and begins to examine the wounds, and straighten out his limbs to see any of his bones are broken, and says: "My fellow, cheer up, you need have more care of yourself, for I am going to take care of you. Let me feel of your pulse. Let me listen to your breathing. I have in these bottles two liquids that will help you. The one is oil, that will soothe the pain of the wounds and the other is wine, and your pulse is feeble, you feel faint, and that will stimulate you. Now I must get you to the nearest tavern." "Oh, no," says the man, "I can't walk; let me stay here and die." "Nonsense!" says the Samaritan. "You are not going to die. I am going to put you on this beast, and I will carry you on till I get you to a place where you have a soft mattress and an easy pillow."

Now the Samaritan has got the wounded man on his feet, and with much tugging and lifting puts him on the beast, for it is astonishing how strong the spirit of kindness will make one. You have seen a mother after three weeks' sleepless watching of her boy, down with smallpox, lift that half-grown boy, heavier than herself, from couch to lounge. And so the sympathetic Samaritan has, unaided, put the wounded man in the saddle, and at slow temporized ambulance is moving toward ern. "You feel better now, I think," says maritan to the Hebrew. "Yes," he says, "I better." "Halloo, you landlord! help me his man in and make him comfortable." The Samaritan sat up with the Jew, him water whenever he felt thirsty and his pillow when it got hot, and in the ig before the Samaritan started on his he said "Landlord, now I am obliged to take good care of this man and I will be here soon again and pay you for all you do. Meanwhile here is something to meet expenses." The "two pence" he gave diord sounds small, but it was as much dollars here and now, considering what d there and then buy of food and lodging.

God multiply all the world over the number of good Samaritans!

In Philadelphia a young woman was dying. She was a wreck. Sunken into the depths of depravity there was no lower depth for her to reach. Word came to the midnight mission that she was dying in a haunt of iniquity near by. Who would go to tell her of the Christ of

ROAD TO JERICHO.

Mary Magdalen? This one refused, and that one refused, saying, "I dare not go there." A Christian woman, her white locks typical of her purity of soul, said, "I will go and I will go now." She went and sat down by the dying girl and told of the Christ who came to seek and save that which was lost. First to the forlorn one came the tears of repentance, and then the smile as though she had begun to hope for the pardon of Him who came to save to the uttermost. Then, just before she breathed her last, she said to the angel of mercy bending over her pillow: "Would you kiss me?" "I will," said the Christian woman, as she put upon her cheek the last salutation before in the heavenly world, I think, God gave her the welcoming kiss. That was religion! Yes, that was religion. Good Samaritans along every street, and along every road, as well as this one on the road to Jericho.

But our procession of sight-seers is again in line, and here we pass through a deep ravine, and I cry to the dragoman: "David, what place do you call this?" and he replied: "This is the brook Cherith where Elijah was fed by the ravens." And in that answer he overthrew my life-long notions of the place where Elijah was waited on by the black servants of the sky. A brook to me had meant a slight depression of ground, and a stream fordable, and perhaps fifteen feet wide. But here was a chasm that an earthquake must have scooped out with its biggest shovel or split with its mightiest battle-axe. Six hundred feet deep is it, and the brook Cherith is a river, which when in full force, is a silver wedge, splitting the mountains into precipices. The feathered descendants of still wing their way across this ravine, but are not like the crows we supposed them to be. They are as large as eagles, and one of them could carry in its beak and clinched claw at once enough food for a half-dozen Elijahs. No thanks to the ravens; they are carnivorous and would rather have picked out the eyes of Elijah, whom they found at the mouth of his cave on the side of Cherith, waiting for his breakfast, having drunk his morning beverage from the rushing stream beneath, than have been his butlers and purveyors. But God compelled them, as He always has compelled and always will compel black and cruel and overshadowing providences to carry help to His children if they only have faith enough to catch the blessing as it drops from the seeming adversity; the greatest blessing always coming not with white wings but black wings. Black wings of conviction bringing pardon to the sinner. Black wings of crucifixion over Calvary, bringing redemption, for the world. Black wings of American revolution, bringing free institutions to a continent. Black wings of American civil war, bringing unification and solidarity to the republic. Black wings of the Judgment Day, bringing resurrection to an entombed human race. And in the last day, when all your life and mine will be summed up, we will find that the greatest blessing we ever received came on the wings of the black ravens of disaster. Bless God for trouble! Bless God for sickness! Bless God for persecution! Bless God for poverty! You never heard of any man or woman of great use to the world who had not had lots of trouble. The diamond must be cut. The wheat must be threshed. The black ravens must fly. Who are these nearest the throne? "These are they who come out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

But look! Look what at four o'clock in the afternoon bursts upon our vision—The plain of Jericho and the valley of Jordan and the Dead Sea. We have come to a place where the horses not so much walk as slide up on their haunches, and we all dismount, for the steep descent is simply terrific, though a princess of Wallachia, who fell here and was dangerously injured, after recovery, spent a large amount of money in trying to make the road passable. Down and down! till we saw the white tents pitched for us by our muleteers amid the ruins of ancient Jericho, which fell at the sound of poor music played on "ram's horn," that ancient instrument which taken from the head of the leader of the flock of sheep, is perforated and prepared to be fingered by the musical performer, and blown upon when pressed to the lips. As in another sermon, I have fully described that scene, I will only say that every day for seven days, the ministers of religion went round the city of Jericho, blowing upon those ram's horns, and on the seventh day without the roll of a war-chariot, or the stroke of a catapult, or the swing of a ballista, crash! crash! crash! went the walls of that magnificent capital.

On the evening of December the 6th, we walked amid the brick and mortar of that shattered city, and I said to myself: All this done by poor music blest of God, for it was not a harp or a flute, or a clapping cymbal, or an organ played, at the sound of which the city surrendered to destruction, but a rude instrument making

BROOK CHERITH.

Rude Music Blest of God

to the demolition of that wicked place which had defied the Almighty. And I said, if all this was by the blessing of God on poor music, what mightier things could be done by the blessing of God on good music, skilful music, Gospel music. If all the good that has already been done by music were subtracted from the world, I believe three-fourths of its religion would be gone. The lullabys of mothers which keep sounding on, though the lips that sang them forty years ago became ashes, the old hymns in log-cabin churches, and country meeting-houses, and psalms in Rouse's version in Scotch kirks, the anthem in English cathedrals, the roll of organs that will never let Handel or Haydn, or Beethoven die, the thrum of harpe, the sweep of the bow across bass viols, the song of Sabbath Schools storming the heavens, the doxology of great assemblages—why, a thousand Jerichos of sin have by them all been brought down.

Seated by the warmth of our camp-fires that evening of December 6th, amid the bricks and debris of Jericho, and thinking what poor music has done and what mightier things could be accomplished by the blessings of God on good music, I said to myself: Ministers have been doing a grand work, and sermons have been blessed, but would it not be well for us to put more emphasis on music? Oh, for

A Campaign of Old Hundred!

Oh, for a dashing cavalry charge of Coronations! Oh, for an army of Antiochs and St. Martins and Ariels! Oh, for enough orchestral batons lifted, to marshal all nations! As Jericho was surrounded by poor music for seven days and was conquered, so let our earth be surrounded seven days by good Gospel music, and the round planet will all be taken for God. Not a wall of opposition, not a throne of tyranny, not a palace of sin, not an enterprise of unrighteousness could stand the mighty throb of such atmospheric pulsation. Music! It sounded at the laying of Creation's corner-stone when the morning stars sang together. Music! It will be the last reverberation, when the archangel's trumpet shall wake the dead. Music! Let its full power be now tested to comfort and bless and arouse and save.

While our evening meal is being prepared in the tents, we walk out for a moment to the "Fountain of Elisha," the one into which the prophet threw the salt, because the waters were poisonous and bitter, and lo! they became sweet and healthy; and ever since, with gurgle and laughter, they have rushed down the hill, and leaped from the rocks, the only cheerful object in all that region being these waters.

Now on this plain of Jericho the sun is setting, making the mountains look like balustrades and battlements of amber and maroon and gold; and the moon, just above the crests, seems to be a window of heaven through which immortals might be looking down upon the scene. Three Arabs as watchmen sit beside the campfire at the door of my tent, their low conversation in a strange language all night long a soothing rather than an interruption. I had a dream that night never to be forgotten, that dream amid the complete ruins of Jericho. Its past grandeur returned, and I saw the city as it was when Mark Antony gave it to Cleopatra and Herod bought it from her. And I heard the hoofs of its swift steeds, and the rumbling of its chariots and the shouts of excited spectators in its amphitheatre.

And there was white marble amid green groves of palm and balsam; cold stone warmed with sculptured foliage: hard pillars cut into soft lace: Iliads and Odysseys in granite; basalt jet as the night, mounted by carbuncle flaming as the morning: upholstery dyed as though dipped in the blood of battle-fields: robes encrusted with diamond; mosaics white as sea-foam flashed on by auroras: gaities which the sun saw by day, rivaled by the moon saw by night: blasphemy built against the sky: ceilings stellar as the midnight heavens: grandeurs tur-retted, archivoluted and intercolumnar: wickedness so appalling that vocabulary fails, and we must make an adjective and call it Herodic.

The region round about the city walls seemed to me white with cotton such as Thenius describes as once growing there, and sweet with sugar cane, and luscious with orange and figs and pomegranates, and redolent with such flora as can only grow where a tropical sun kisses the earth. And the hour came back to me when in the midst of all that splendor Herod died, commanding his sister Salome immediately after his death to secure the assassination of all the chief Jews whom he had brought to the city, and shut up in a circus for that purpose, and the news came to the audience in the theatre as some one took the stage, and announced to the excited multitude: "Herod is dead! Herod is dead!" Then in my dream, all the pomp of Jericho vanished and gloom was added to gloom, and

Desolation to Desolation, and woe to woe, until, perhaps the rippling waters of the Fountain of Elisha suggesting it—as sounds will sometimes give direction to a dream—I thought that the waters of Christ's salvation and the fountains "open for sin and uncleanness," were rolling through that plain and rolling across that continent, and rolling ous reality as surely as God is true and C Gospel is the world's Catholicism. "Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen."

A HOME FOR RUSSIAN JEWS.

AN event of interest to students of prophecy occurred in New York a few days ago. One of the signs of the last years of the present dispensation is, as we learn from prophecy, the restoration of the Jews to their own land. God promised them that, "It shall come to pass when all these things have come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, and thou shalt say in thine heart, Why hath the Lord done thus unto me? . . . then the Lord God shall turn thy captivity and have compassion upon thee and will return thee and gather thee from all the nations whither the Lord hath scattered thee." (Deut. 30: 1-3.) These causes will doubtless contribute to the fulfillment of this prophecy. One of these causes is the event referred to. It was a meeting, by wealthy and influential Jews in New York, to consider the condition of their brethren in Russia. That meeting reached the conclusion that the best solution of the problem was to assist the Russian Jews to settle in Palestine.

round the earth, until on either side of their banks all the thorns became flowers, and all the deserts gardens, and all the hovels mansions, and all the funerals bridal processions, and all the blood of war was turned into dahlias, and all the groans became anthems, and Dante's Inferno became Dante's Divina Commedia, and Paradise Lost was submerged by Paradise Regained, and tears became crystals, and cruel swords came out of foundries glistening ploughshares, and, in my dream, at the blast of a trumpet the prostrated walls of Jericho rose again. And some one told me that as these walls in Joshua's time, at the sounding trumpets of doom went down, now at the sounding trumpet of the Gospel they come up again. And I thought a man appeared at the door of my tent, and I said: "Who are you and from whence have you come?" and he said, "I am the Samaritan you heard of at the tavern on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, as taking care of the man who fell among thieves, and I have just come from healing the last wound of the last unfortunate in all the earth." And I rose from my pillow in the tent to greet him, and my dream broke, and I realized it was only a dream, but a dream which shall become a glori-

Those people promptly raised a sum of $1,000 for the purpose, and appointed a committee to collect subscriptions.

Circulars printed in Hebrew and English, signed by Chief Rabbi Jacob Joseph, and the Rev. Dr. Philip Klein, of the Norfolk Synagogue, and Abram Rosenberg, President of the Society, Choc'be Zion of New York. The speakers said in substance, that the last ten years conspicuous Jews all over the world, had been convinced that the only solution of the "Jewish question" was the return of the Jews to Palestine. Since the last Jewish immigration in Roumania, about 1882, the movement to Palestine has played a most important part in the destinies of east European Jews. There are now twenty colonies, with a population of over four thousand souls, have sprung up on the soil of the Holy Land.

The history of the movement has shown that it costs ten times as much, to enable Russian and Roumanian Jewish emigrants, to establish a livelihood in this country, as is required to establish them in Palestine. Thus, as Palestine has always been in the fulfilment of prophecy, the Jews are becoming unconsciously the instrument of effecting God's purposes. Though the Jews of New York, might not be anxious to see their brethren to Palestine, on religious grounds, they become anxious for it when they see the cheapest method of solving the present social problem.

Little Baby Plunged Four Stories from a burning hotel in Chicago, in the arms of its mother, on the night of the 12th inst. The had gained such headway that all means were cut off, and the frantic mother, with other occupants of the hotel, to the window. Crazed with fright, she remembered her child, and wrapping it in clothing, hugged it closely to her breast in such a manner that when she fell a mass on the stony pavement below, her body acted as a cushion for the little. She died a few moments after, but the mother, whom she had gladly given her own life for, escaped wholly uninjured. One naturally asks what the future of that babe will be. It will be a melancholy sequence to so heroic a life that cost so much should be a sin and evil influence. The responsibility that child is very great, but how much is that of every Christian, whose life was purchased by the precious blood of God. (Heb. 9:14.)

There is a Town Without a Post-Office in Carolina. Last year when Mr. Wanamaker making changes in the postmasters after the advent of the Republican Administration, removed the Postmaster of Bishopville, S. C. The colored man was appointed in his place and he duly qualified. But the townspeople showed considerable resentment, and insisted on getting back their former postmaster. At the time they starved the office, by buying stamps and mailing their letters at the office of the adjacent towns. As this system did not have the desired effect, they had the postmaster and his assistant arrested, on a charge of carrying concealed weapons. The man informed that if he would resign, the charge against him would be withdrawn. The colored man consented, and the townspeople hoped that their former postmaster would be reinstated. But Mr. Wanamaker appointed a white citizen. The appointee, however, did not qualify, as owing to the public feeling he would give bonds for him. The Post-General began to suspect the nature of the difficulty, and sent an inspector to Bishopville to investigate. After receiving the inspector's report, it was decided to close the office. The stamps and pouches were accordingly packed up and sent to Washington. The town will consequently be without postal facilities until it consents to accept a postmaster appointed by the Department. The condition of the town might furnish an illustration for a theological discussion on Free-will. As the townspeople cannot, it appears, have postal facilities without yielding their own will, so the free man is free to reject Christ, but cannot enter the kingdom without accepting Him. (Hosea 13:4.)

Death of a Famous Dog is Chronicled with a full obituary notice by the Times, of St. Louis, Mo. It states that in the fall of 1887 a soldier who had been wounded in a fight with the Indians on the plains, in the Custer campaign, stopped at the Union Pacific Depot, on his way to his home in the East. He became very ill in the depot, and was sent to a room where he died. With him was a black dog, the soldier said, had been his companion in the campaign. In some way the dog came into the sight of the soldier, when he was sent in a wheelbarrow from the depot to the hospital. He remained at the depot, and for days wandered over the tracks, under the cars and upon the Union Avenue hunting for his master. He was evidently distressed. At last he located in the Union Pacific ticket-office, opposite the entrance to the depot and stayed there. A ticket agent took him under his special protection, and the dog became a great favorite of the clerks. He has been there from that time until he died last week. Every day, no matter what the weather, the dog would go across to the Union Depot, where he would make the rounds of the building and also the offices along the avenue, then he would return to the ticket-office apparently convinced that his master had not returned, and the next day he would renew his search. All those eleven years, to the day of his death, he made the same search every day. He was looking for his master, and in spite of all the disappointments continued to look for him to the last. So much cannot be said for some Christians, who appear to have forgotten the promise of their Master's return. As Christ predicted, they say, "My Lord delayeth His coming," and they become careless and worldly. (Matt. 24:48-51.)

A Day of Polyglottic Study was Spent in New York recently by a citizen of Vermont. It was Sunday, and during the day he listened to twelve languages beside his own. He went to a Hebrew Christian Church to enjoy Hebrew in the forenoon. He listened to Bohemian in the afternoon, and Platt-Deutsche in the evening; while he took his breakfast at an Italian eating-house, his dinner at a Spanish posada, his supper at a French restaurant, and afterwards spent a couple of hours in strolling through the polyglot streets on the east side. In this way he passed Sunday from morning till midnight, but found that he had as yet learned but very little of the multiplex glottology of New York. He has made up his mind to spend another Sunday here, and get a few more lessons in the languages of our other races, including the Chinese, the Celtic, and the Swedish. Afterward he hopes to return to Vermont, and hear the voice of his Green Mountain mother. He might have spent his Sunday more profitably, but if he is a man of reflective mind, he must have been impressed with the fact that, as on the day of Pentecost, to every nationality in its own tongue, was proclaimed salvation through Christ, and it was found suitable to every race, and men of every clime found in Jesus a Saviour adapted to their need. (Acts 2:8-11.)

A Young Husband's Dilemma is Described in a press dispatch from Mount Vernon, N. Y. A few days ago a lady arrived in that town from St. Louis, and going to a certain house, inquired for a lady who formerly boarded there, but had left. She asked permission to remain for a night as she was sick, and knew no one in the town. Her request was granted, and she was very grateful. The next morning she was much worse, and before night she was dangerously ill. As she was evidently in mental distress an effort was made to find her friends through the clue furnished by letters in her pocket. It was found that her husband was a young physician who had married her clandestinely. His mother had discovered the marriage, and had given him the alternative of leaving his wife or being disinherited. After a painful struggle he chose the former, and a legal separation was arranged. The poor wife tried to support herself by teaching languages, but had not succeeded, and her failure, combined with the distress over her husband's conduct, had brought on the attack of sickness. Happily her hostess in Mount Vernon was kind to her, and is nursing her back to health. Not many men so situated would have decided as her husband did, however large might have been the fortune involved. But men who would scorn to act as he did are sometimes found recreant to their Lord when money is to be gained by unfaithfulness. (II. Peter 2:15.)

A Certain Jewish Baron in France is Current-ly reported to have paid $40,000 to a poor but aristocratic person in Paris, to obtain for him invitations to the houses of influential families, and to introduce him to society. So far his effort has been unavailing, and the story of his failure has brought ridicule on his name, especially from the pens of American editors. It would appear, however, that New York has men of a similar stamp. A writer in a society journal says that there are three men whose names stand high in Wall Street and are well known among the wealthy people of the city, who have for years been vainly struggling for the recognition of the "old families." "One of them spends an income of $70,000 or $80,000 a year in a reckless effort to push his way in, but without success. The doors of society are closed against him. Many men of less intelligence and fewer personal advantages than he, are securely settled inside, but they have never shown a desire to enter, which is always deemed a fatal impediment." It would appear that money, which according to popular belief, "answereth all things," will not purchase social position. Neither will it purchase entrance into the highest of all circles—the family of the sons of God: but is rather a hindrance. There is this difference, however, that a manifest and eager desire to enter the true Church of Christ, so far from being an impediment, is a condition of entrance; "He that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." (Matt 7:8.)

Why the Leopard is Beautiful and the Hyena ugly, is explained by a philosopher of Equatorial Africa in a fable which Emin Pasha heard while residing there and publishes in his new book. Ages ago, runs the fable, the leopard and the hyena were of the same solid color. The leopard was vain, wished to have a fancier dress, and went about the country asking every other beast how he might get his skin ornamented. He was eventually referred to a man who offered to beautify his coat for a bit of fine game daily. The leopard agreed to this, and every day brought to the man a fat sheep, or goat, or antelope. In return the man painted spots all over him. The leopard was doubtful of the beauty of his new dress at first, but as he ran away through a village to the woods he heard everyone praising his appearance, and was delighted. A hyena saw and admired him, and went eventually to the man to get the same ornamentation. The terms of the man were the same as they were with the leopard. The hyena was miserly, however, and always ate the best parts of his game and gave the man the leavings. So the man painted the hyena all over with ugly patterns, so that till this day the miserly beast has been an eyesore to all mankind. A naturalist would reject so childish an explanation of the contrast in the two animals, but there is truth in the principle it suggests. The uncomeliness of moral character is frequently traceable to selfishness and cupidity. (Ezekiel 22:12, 13.)

A Husband was Offered for Sale in New York on Oct. 9. A case was on trial in Justice McMahon's Court in which a handsome but somewhat dissipated-looking German was charged with abandoning his wife. The wife, who was much older than he, looked worn and faded. She said he had neglected her for some months past and had drawn money from her, which she had earned by washing, instead of contributing to her support. She also complained that he spent his time with a young woman of questionable character. The justice confessed his inability to help her, but was willing to punish the man by sending him to prison. The wife did not wish her husband punished, as that would not benefit her, but said she was willing to sell him to the other woman for a fair price. "If they pay me thirty dollars," she said, "I want no more than that for him." The husband answered promptly that thirty dollars was too much. "Well," she said, "I take twenty-five." The justice interposed here with the warning that he would not have such dickering in court, about a violation of the law. The man must support his wife and, if he married the other woman with or without the payment of the twenty-five dollars, he would be sent to State's prison for bigamy. The husband, thereupon, promised to pay his wife two dollars a week and with that understanding he was discharged. The bargain proposed by the woman was immoral as well as illegal. It showed that her idea of the sanctity of the marriage relation, like her estimate of the value of her husband, was very low. In the latter case, however, he thought it was more than he was worth, and he was probably right. Such men we often speak of as "worthless fellows," yet Christ does not think so of any sinner. He thought them worth dying for. (Luke 19:10.)

JESUS ACCUSED.

S. S. LESSON FOR NOV. 2, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 22 : 54-71 ; GOLDEN TEXT, Isa. 53 : 5.

Jesus Deserted by His Disciples—Peter Unable to Leave the Scene—Approaching the Time of Trial—Christ's Warning Forgotten—The Critical Moment—The Third Denial—The Warning Signal—Christ's Look—His Patient Silence—His Avowal—Prediction of Antichrist.

"THIS is your hour, and the power of darkness," was the word with which Jesus surrendered Himself to His persecutors who were come to apprehend Him. The enemies of the Lord have their allotted time, during which they seem to carry all before them. But "the Lord reigneth." (Ps. 93 : 1.) Man could do only what God's "hand and counsel determined before to be done." (Acts 4 : 28.) And so it is ever. Sooner or later, everything that happens works out the purpose of God. Let us learn not to fear, His hand is upon the main-spring of all that occurs; neither man nor devil has the last word. When an unusual pressure comes upon a child of God, let him know that the "hour" of the instruments used to bring it about, and "the power of darkness," will not last forever. The prince of darkness is not almighty, has its limits. They took Jesus "and brought Him into the high priest's house." The great High Priest who "ever liveth to make intercession for us," whose priesthood is "unchangeable," stood before a fallible, sinful, high priest, who was set upon His ruin and death. It was indeed their "hour and the power of darkness." And the disciples, what of them? "Then all the disciples forsook Him, and fled." (Matt. 26 : 5, 6.) What, even Peter who had talked of following Him to prison and to death? Yes, Peter must prove that all the power and devotion of a human heart cannot suffice to stand an unexpected strain. The first impulse of the impetuous disciple was to give way to despair and forsake Jesus with the rest. But there was a great struggle in Peter's mind. God the Father had revealed to him that Jesus was "the Christ, the Son of the living God;" he could not ignore this heavenly communication. And yet things had turned out so contrary to his expectations! A second impulse took possession of him, and breaking away from the little band of fleeing disciples, he followed his Lord afar off, "and when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall," Peter drew nigh among the rest, and warmed himself.

"The Power of Darkness"

The time which Jesus had foretold was approaching, and Peter would deny his Lord. Let us study the situation. Peter had been quite confident of his loyalty to Jesus, and had not taken in the lesson taught a few hours before, "Without me ye can do nothing." The hour was a critical one. The prince of darkness, he "that had the power of death," even the devil (Heb. 2 : 14), was in the ascendant. Powers of darkness were around, and Peter had no armor which could shield him from the attack of a victorious enemy. Satan's instrument was a maid who recognized him as a follower of Jesus, and who said, "this man was also with Him."

It was a Critical Moment.

The foundations of his faith seemed to have given way; he had lost all by following Christ, what could it avail him to own Him now in these unexpected circumstances of shame? At least he would save himself the obloquy and danger of this. So Peter said: "Woman I know Him not." Peter's fall had taken place, and he hardly seemed conscious of it. Another recognized him, saying: "Thou art also of them." And Peter said, "Man, I am not." A whole hour passed by, the darkest hour in Peter's whole life. The sun had gone down in his experience, there was darkness on his soul, he was estranged from his Lord. As yet no look of recognition had passed between the suffering Lord and the treacherous disciple. But "about the space of one hour after, another confidently affirmed, saying: Of a truth this fellow also was with Him; for he is a Galilean." And Peter said, man, I know not what thou sayest." Thus far the Lord permitted it to go. Thus far must Peter learn his weakness. "And immediately, while yet he spake, the cock crew." And then there was a look of recognition. It was not Peter who looked at Jesus, it was the Lord who "Turned and Looked upon Peter."

It was enough. A revelation as new and powerful as that which announced to him that Jesus was the Christ, now made him know his own heart and his utter weakness. Up to this time, Peter had acted as though he were to succor Jesus, as though he, in a measure, were to sustain his Lord. But now the tables were turned; he could no longer counsel the Lord to pity Himself, could no longer boast of his loyalty, or draw his sword in his defense against Malchus. "Peter went out." The care of his own soul was enough for him now; he could defend his Lord no more. And Jesus, more alone than ever, remained in the high priest's house. The hirelings who held Jesus captive—Him who came to set other men free—"mocked Him, and smote Him, and blindfolded Him," and "struck Him on the face" with the insulting words, "Prophecy, prophecy unto us thou Christ, who is he that smote thee?" (Matt. 26 : 68.) But there was no retaliation in Jesus, they could not provoke Him to wrath by this blasphemous mockery of His Messiahship, and this challenge that He, whose works were supernatural, should now act the detective among His persecutors. The poor miserable men, set on by their superiors, little knew Him with whom they had to do; they could not understand that that which would have appealed to the pride and self-love of other men touched no chord in Jesus' heart. He had no pride which could be wounded, He was not bent upon sustaining His reputation as a prophet, but upon rescuing from eternal damnation the very men who insulted Him.

All through that night, offence and blasphemy were heaped on Him whose only crime was that He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him." (Acts 10 : 38.) Time, money and effort were expended to discover some ground of accusation against Him, but with all their trouble, they could not make the witnesses agree in their testimony, they were at variance, so that they could not bring a legal charge against Him. Their object was to prove Him a political offender, and dangerous to the government. They attempted to make something seditious out of His words, when speaking of the temple of His body, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." (John 2 : 19.) Out of this they fabricated an accusation in these words: "This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days." (Matt. 26 : 61.) "I am able" was not the tone of Jesus' testimony. He did not bear witness of Himself. "Every day they wrest my words," (Ps. 56 : 5.) He said in prophecy. When men make use of all possible ingenuity to make God's people say what they have neither uttered nor thought of, let them not be discouraged. "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master."

Day broke, but it was the darkest day that ever dawned. With the dawn came an early meeting of "the elders of the people, and the chief priests, and the scribes." What a sight! He who shall judge the world, standing before men whose sins He was about to bear! They "led Him into their council saying, Art thou the Christ? tell us." It was a prophetic word which Jesus spoke in answer:

"If I Tell You, Ye will not Believe."

If the wondrous works which He had done had no voice for them, if His pure and holy life, if His wondrous teaching, speaking "as never man spake," if His fulfilling of well-known prophecies in His birth at Bethlehem, in His healing works, and even His raising from the dead, in His riding upon an ass into Jerusalem, if all this was to go for nothing, the mere assertion that He was the Christ would not convince them. "And if I also ask, if I question ye will not answer me nor let me. Their minds were made up beforehand what to do; they would not yield to God, and they must yield, or Christ must suffer; and would not give way. If they owned Him the Christ, then all their action had been useful, wicked and blasphemous; this they not accept, and now there was but one alternative. They had risked everything, staked even their soul's salvation, and they could draw back. It was an awful game, and played over again by every Christ-rejector.

Jesus added: "Hereafter shall the Son of Man sit on the right hand of the power of God." Then said they all, Art thou the Son of God? And He said unto them, ye say that I am "I am that which you say." I am the Son of God. Without weighing His claims, with moment's reflection whether, after all, might not be the Christ, they took for granted that He was an impostor, and said, "need we any further witness? for we ourselves have heard of His own mouth." Oh, how true the words of Jesus: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. (John 43.) Many false Christs and false prophets have arisen, but a greater, the future Antichrist, will soon arise, and all over the world will worship him. He will come in his own name. He will come to exalt man, and flesh, and the world, and all which is contrary to Christ. The world is ripening for the Christ. Men are impatient of control, unwilling for self-denial, eager after money, without being willing to work for it. Christ-likeness, even manliness is dying out from our age; selfishness, covetousness, love of ease, are getting the upper hand; and soon the Antichrist will appear as the impersonation of the twentieth century, and Christ's word will be fulfilled: "Him ye will receive."

ARTHUR SEYMOUR'S IMPRISONMENT

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Nov. 2.
"He was wounded for our transgressions:
bruised for our iniquities." Isaiah 53 : 5.

NO one could have been more delighted with a letter than Arthur Seymour with one that he received from his brother Henry, one bright October morning. Henry was an orphan lad, supporting himself by a kind of work that offered itself on the streets in his native village. But he was studious, and had fitted himself for better work. No opportunity had come. Henry, who was at a city bank, wrote him to come over at once as a place was open in the bank, which he might have.

"You will have to begin at the bottom ladder," Henry wrote, "but that is where I began, ten years ago, and now I am getting to the top."

That was true. Henry had behaved well, and had gained the confidence of his employer, though he commenced on a very small salary. He was now receiving enough money to be married, which he had done. Arthur had heard of this, and when he received Henry's letter, he considered his fortune made. Just then, however, he had not enough money to pay his way to the city; but one of his friends was going to market and Arthur got a free ride in his wagon. The farmer was as much surprised as Arthur was, when they reached Henry's home, to find him in elegant appointments. Neither of them had ever seen furniture so rich and beautiful.

"You must be doing well, Mr. Seymour," the farmer said.

"Oh yes, well enough," was the reply. "I had to get furniture when I married, you know, and it is always cheapest in the end to get the best. It is for life; I shan't have to do it again."

"Yes; but it's splendid," said the farmer, looking around with admiring eyes. "You men know how to make money. Well, well, I am glad you can afford it."

That young Seymour must have married a wife," the farmer told his neighbors when returned. "He's got a little palace over there, fit for the President. Small, but good. He's got hold of money, somehow. It cost a pretty penny, I know."

The farmer was right about the cost, but not about the means of payment. Henry Seymour had not married a rich wife, nor had he "got hold of money somehow." He had credit and, he would not have to pay for the things at once, he had bought good ones, as they were for life," and hoped to put aside some part of salary every month toward the payment for them. It was difficult at first, as there were many small matters to be bought which were gotten at the outset, but each month would, thought, be the last of those outgoings and then he would begin to save. But the end of the first year had come and the bills for the furniture were still owing. There was a baby at home, now, and Henry Seymour, feeling responsibilities of his new relationship, before the year with a firm resolve that economy would be his watchword for the future.

It was at this stage that Arthur became an inmate of his brother's home, and the occupant of the vacant desk in the bank. It was a delightful change for him, for which he felt unending gratitude to his brother. But it was a sister-in-law and the little baby boy who had the warmest place in his heart. He loved them both with all the long, pent-up love of his nature. They were so dear to him that he felt he could do for them, if need were. In his boyish enthusiasm, he imagined a fire breaking out in the house, and saw himself rushing in to save them, at the peril of his life. Or he thought of them drowning, and saw himself bravely swimming out to save them. He felt himself equal to any emergency for their sakes. He loved his brother, too, but Henry's temper was unsteady, and there was often a cloud on his brow, the cause of which Arthur was beginning to suspect. As the months passed by, the cloud deepened and Arthur knew that his brother's creditors were pressing for payment.

One night—it was nearly two years after Arthur came to the city—his brother came home. There was some trouble at the bank. Arthur had heard of it, during the day. A considerable sum of money was missing. A remittance from an out-of-town customer, which should have been delivered, had disappeared. Arthur was distressed beyond measure, for he had seen in Henry's room at home, a large envelope bearing the post-mark of the town from which the missing money should have come. There was no doubt in his mind that his brother, being sorely pressed for money, had stolen it. Arthur could not sleep that night. He thought of what misery was coming on the home. His imagination pictured Henry being led away to prison, his beloved sister-in-law weeping heart-broken over her babe. The thought was a torture to him, but he could not shut it out. Was there nothing he could do to save them? Toward morning, a plan defined itself in his mind. He rose and crept stealthily to his brother's room. He felt about cautiously for that envelope, found it, and went back quietly.

There was a sensation in the bank the next day. The missing remittance had been traced, and the thief discovered. The firm expressed its regret that they had ever for a moment suspected their trusted head-clerk. They were amazed that his character had been vindicated, and consoled with him on the disgrace that his young brother had brought on his name. Every one was surprised. Arthur seemed so quiet and steady that no one would have suspected him of dishonesty. But there was no doubt of his guilt, for the empty envelope, in which the money had been sent, was found in his pocket. And Henry kept silence. People said he was ungracious not to upbraid the boy who had disgraced him. Every one was sorry for him, and had no words strong enough to denounce a boy whose ingratitude was so shameful.

And Arthur went to prison. He would not plead guilty, though urged to do so, and though assured that his sentence would be lighter if he did. The judge was irritated at his contumacy, and thought him sullen, urged him to confess, to repent and amend his ways. His jailers had a different opinion of him. Never was there a more gentle, cheerful prisoner. He seemed buoyed up with some inner joy that none could understand. They treated him as kindly as the prison rules would admit. But neither kindness nor harshness unsealed the boy's lips, nor to any soul did he tell that he was innocent, but suffering imprisonment and disgrace voluntarily that he might save those he loved from sorrow and shame.

WILL JESUS COME AGAIN?

A Question of Paramount Importance—Will Christ Come while the World is Unconverted?—Our Age Sketched in the New Testament—What the Last Times Will Be—Growing Belief in Pre-Millennialism—The Objections.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

THE question of paramount importance to every humble believer, who desires to know the truth concerning our Lord's expected return is, whether He will come, when the world is unprepared; while it continues in its sinful course, and the majority of mankind steeped in every form of heathen superstitions? Or, Will He delay His advent until the whole world is converted, sanctified and made wholly free from the presence of sin? The Scriptures teach explicitly that there will be

A Period of Universal Blessedness, when holiness shall prevail among all nations. But shall that glad day be ushered in by present agencies of Church and State, or by the personal presence of Jesus Himself? If He is not to come until a converted world is ready to receive Him, then we cannot possibly expect Him soon. We cannot watch for His appearing as imminent. On the other hand if, when He comes again, the world is found a world of carnality, of unpreparedness, of general unbelief, then may we not expect to hear His joyful shout of victory any moment?

Our present age is sketched, not only in its general features, but in its minute details throughout the New Testament. For the saints, living godly in Christ Jesus, there will be tribulation, persecution, cross-bearing and suffering. In the professing Church will be found hypocrisies and apostasies. The love of many shall wax cold. There will be the outward form of godliness, without the inward power. In the world there will continue every manifestation of evil. Infidelity, rebellion against God, corruption, superstition and idolatry. Yet none shall be alarmed concerning the approaching crisis. The worldly-minded will sing, "peace and safety," even when destruction is at hand. (1. Thes. 1: 2, 3.) Of

of this age, the Spirit hath spoken expressly that "some shall depart from the faith giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of demons." (1. Tim. 4: 1, 2.) The same warning Spirit hath also declared "that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers—lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God." (II. Tim. 3: 1, 3.) If such will be the condition of the world when Jesus comes, it would seem that there is no room for a millennial period of holiness unto the Lord, prior to His advent. Must we not then fall back upon the other alternative, namely, that our blessed Lord will first descend from heaven in order to establish this new era of universal blessedness?

In recent years the subject of the future Advent has come to the front. It has indeed met with bitter and wide-spread opposition from theologians of many schools. But many of these have been won over to the adoption of Premillennialism as the right key with which to unlock the subject of Biblical prophecy. Is not the Spirit of God reviving this long-forgotten hope once again in the hearts of believers? A long list of names could be given, of fathers in the Church in early and later times, whose godly character and earnest lives were above reproach, who watched for the coming of their Lord. And the list increases each day, numbering now the names of leading ministers in all denominations, nearly all of the well-known evangelists, and a host of studious, devout men and women in this and other countries. Thus, the subject is taking hold on spiritual Christians. To convert men to a dogma, a creed, an ecclesiastical formula—what of that? But to be instrumental in bringing lost men to Christ, and introducing to beloved saints this joyous, comforting, purifying, invigorating Hope, is what we earnestly covet. Other truths have their place: other doctrines which endear the Saviour to our hearts, must not be ignored; but why, oh! why, does the church, in any of her teachers or members, crowd out and persistently reject a truth which runs through all the Word and enriches the experience of those who hold it in righteousness?

The Objections

raised against a personal and premillennial advent are chiefly based on misrepresentation. Take, for instance, the following conversation which took place between a Christian minister and the writer, the objections presented by him being the same in substance as those raised by others at different times.

"What is your candid objection against the doctrine of our Lord's premillennial advent?"

"The advocates of that doctrine differ so widely amongst themselves, and present so many conflicting views, that there is no possibility of determining who are nearest right."

"I admit there are different views held by premillennialists regarding chronology and the order of events, the details of anti-christian development, and national judgments and the signs preceding, or following our Lord's appearing; but all agree on the prominent features of the Advent itself, viz: The Lord coming in person in His glory, to take His people to Himself, and to commence a new era of things, differing from all previous dispensations, according to the prophetic Word."

"But then the thought of Christ's near coming has a tendency to weaken Gospel efforts and make little of the Gospel itself."

"Come, now, do you really believe those men who are governed by this hope are less diligent than others, and have less faith in the Gospel as the means which God ordained to gather out a people to His own name? Was Horatius Bonar guilty of the charge?"

"No." "Was McCheyne?" "No." "Was Dr. Chalmers after he embraced that view?" "No." "Is Mr. Spurgeon?" "No." "Is George Muller?" "No." "Are the leading evangelists who are all expecting Jesus to come?" "No."

Thus it is that prejudice, cold indifference, or respect for prominent divines who oppose this truth, hinder many from accepting and rejoicing in that part of God's revelation which tends to make Christians unworldly, spiritual, unselfish and earnest in their lives. The Church in later centuries has lost sight of her true hope, and with rare exceptions, effort is paralyzed, idleness, hardness, heartlessness and worldliness have flowed in like a setting tide, sweeping away the Church's testimony to heavenly-mindedness, and heavenly anticipation. Her influence begins to wane as "the salt," and "light," from the moment her professed members begin to say, "My Lord delayeth His coming."

The soul's reception of this doctrine, not as a theory only, but as a living hope, that at any moment our Lord may come, and call His people to Himself, will bring new life, and love, and power into the soul, and will energize us for the work we are called to prosecute. His cry, "Behold, I come quickly," is the cheering cry of the great Commander to nerve His Church to faithfulness unto the end. Shall we not gladly respond, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus," for "yet a little while and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry."

JUST THE DIFFERENCE.

THERE are two ways of reading the Bible. One is an intellectuality. The other is a heart experience. It is a beautiful poem, and you read it as you do Tennyson. It is a fine statement of principles of law, and you read it as you do Blackstone. It is a fine mental discipline, and you read it as you do Dugald Stewart, or Sir William Hamilton, or William Reed. But the Holy Spirit in some good hour comes to your heart. You open that Bible. How you read it then! All your soul goes out toward it. You feel: "If I don't find pardon and light through the instructions of this Book, I will never find them at all." With all the concentrated energy of your soul you read it. There is an old sea captain who has not been on the water for twenty years. He is sitting in his home, and his grandchild is playing at his feet with the chart, and the sea-glass, and the compass—very beautiful playthings. The old captain has no use for them, so he lets his grandchild have them. But while the grandfather looks down and sees the compass, and the sea-glass, and the chart, his mind goes back to the time when he handled those things under very different circumstances. He thinks of the euroclydon that came down on the sea, and the time when he saw the froth of destruction on the mouth of the wave, and the heaven swinging back its mantle of darkness to strike with sword of fire, and it seemed as if they must all perish. Oh, then, how the captain examined the compass! Oh, then, how his finger trembled over the chart. In the one case it is a child's toy; in the other, it is shipwreck or rescue. So there are men who come to read the Bible, this glorious chart. It is very beautiful to look over, and they say: "There is a rock, and here is a rock, and there is a lighthouse, and here is the gulf-stream of God's mercy." But, after awhile, the Holy Spirit comes upon the soul. The man says: "It is high time now I found out my latitude and longitude. Where am I?" And the storm howls through the heart. The man says: "What is to become of me? Shall I go down, or shall I go up?" How he reads the Bible then! How he looks at the chart then—at this rock, at that rock, at that lighthouse, this gulf-stream, that promontory! Oh, it is a different chart then! In the one case, he ran his intellectual finger across the page and examined it as a curiosity. In the other case, he examined it with reference to his immortal rescue.

A BOTHERED MINISTER.

WE received from a correspondent the following:—

"Suppose you were a young minister, scarcely in the service one year, with only a common education, and only a practical preparation for the work, with some little what we call 'Western grit,' which means energy and enthusiasm. More tact than theology. And suppose, everywhere you preached, scores of souls, old and young, were brought to the blessed Jesus. And suppose, just near where you were conducting a revival meeting, there should be a brother minister in charge of a church—a very wise ex-Presiding Elder, one of those stiff, self-esteeming, self-exalting lords over God's heritage—and suppose he should sit at home within a stone's throw of your meeting, when souls were coming to Jesus by the score every night, and never come near. And then, after you had closed the meeting, and had preached nothing but Jesus, he should come at you and your church like, as they say out here, 'a ram at a gate post,' and as far as he could, butt you out of existence, ecclesiastically, and then turn on his own flock and butt them terribly, because they went over there to meeting. And suppose, as the result, a good share of his flock should come into your flock on profession of faith in Jesus; would you receive them?"

"And further: suppose you should go on preaching Jesus and Him crucified, clubbing no sect or denomination, and sinners were converted continually; and this ecclesiastical ram should continue to butt at you, would you turn and butt him, or would you go on preaching Christ, and let him butt until he had butted his whole congregation into yours?"

"A SUBSCRIBER."

Our advice is to make it as easy for the ex-Presiding Elder as possible. Make a soft place for him to butt against. He cannot help it. Probably somebody once butted against him, and he is only "making change" for what was once given him. Probably his digestion is poor. Perhaps his wife keeps him awake nights with curtain-lectures. There must be something the matter. Perhaps if your liver and spleen were as much out of order as his are, you would butt against his fence as hard as he butts against yours. We apologize for him. Sometimes we have had four or five rams with their heads down, going for our gate post as violently as he goes for yours. It is a case for sympathy; for we heard of one such ram that continued in his assault upon a stone-wall until the horns were worn off, and then the neck, and then the fore-quarters, and, lastly, the rump, leaving nothing but the tip end of a tale, the moral of which is: "Let everyone mind his own business."

THE CREMATORIES.

THESE places for speedily reducing the human body to ashes are multiplying, and we see no objection to them, and if people want that disposition made of their remains they ought to have their wish observed. Scientific journals contend that our cemeteries are the means of unhealthy exhalations, and that cremation is the only safe way of disposing of the departed. Some have advocated the chemical reduction of the physical system. We have, as yet, been unable to throw ourselves into a mood sufficiently scientific to appreciate this proposal. It seems to us partly horrible and partly ludicrous. We think that the dead populations of the world are really the most quiet and unharmed. They make no war upon us, and we need make no war upon them. We are very certain that all the damage we shall ever do this world will be while we are alive. It is not the dead people that are hard to manage, but the living. Some whistle to keep their courage up while going along in graveyards; we whistle while moving among the wide-awake. Before attempting this barbaric disposal of the human form as a sanitary improvement, it would be better to clear the streets and "commons" of our cities of the pestiferous surroundings. Try your cremation on the dogs and cats with extinct animation. We think Greenwood is healthier than Broadway, and Laurel Hill than Chestnut street, Pennsylvania than Champs Elysees. Urns, with ashes scientifically prepared, may look very well in Madras or Peking, but not in a Christian country. Not having been able to shake off the Bible notions about Christian burial, we adhere to the mode that was observed when devotional men carried Stephen to his burial.

BRIEF NOTES.

Ben Hogan is laboring with much success among the miners of Butte City, Mont. The Opera House is filled to overflowing every night. Many remarkable conversions have occurred.

Evangelist H. W. Brown has been holding service in Dayton, Ohio, during the past two weeks. The Linden Avenue Baptist Church, in which he has been preaching, has been crowded at every service, and many souls have been brought to Christ.

Dr. Arthur Mitchel, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, says that during his journey through China he found cities of from 75,000 to 300,000 population, which have not one missionary of any denomination, or even one native helper.

The Central Union Mission, of Washington, D. C. celebrated its sixth anniversary on Oct. 19. The success of this Mission in an exceptionally difficult field, is striking evidence of the marvellous zeal, devotion, and consecration of the workers. It is the model Mission of the United States.

The corner-stone of the New Temperance Temple, Chicago, which is to cost $1,200,000, and which will be the headquarters of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, will be laid on November 1. Prominent members of the Union from all parts of the country are expected to be present.

Rev. Thomas Harrison is beginning Revival Service in Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, New Haven, Conn. At the expiration of those services, he is coming to New York, and will commence on November 16, a series of services in the Seventeenth Street Church. Mr. Harrison has been somewhat indisposed through excess of work, but is now fully recovered, and is in excellent trim for a winter of hard labor.

Dr. Justin D. Fulton has accepted the call from the Grace Baptist Church, Montreal. He proposes to make that city his "tenting ground" for the winter. The church offered $60,000 for the meeting-house of the First Baptist Church, but failing to acquire it, has leased Queen's Hall, for a year. This is a large and centrally building well adapted for the aggressive work Dr. Fulton intends to carry on. His church is in full sympathy with him and his mission.

The Revision Committee of the Presbyterian Church closed its sessions in Pittsburgh last week. It will resume its work on February 4, 1891, in Washington, D. C. In the interval, sub-committees will discuss questions relegated to them, and report to the General Committee on its reassembling. The results of the deliberations have been kept secret, but it is gratifying to learn that all the changes thus far made have the unanimous endorsement of the Committee.

Rev. E. P. Telford will commence a series of services next Sunday, in the Centenary M. E. Church, Jersey City, N. J. The services he has just concluded in Paterson, N. J., were remarkably successful. A novel feature of them, and one worthy of imitation, was an effort to reach workingmen. Mr. Telford went to the various factories in the dinner-hour, and gave Evangelistic addresses at the gates. Large crowds gathered to hear him, and were very attentive. At the Rogers Locomotive Works, a thousand men listened for half an hour, and paid the closest attention. At the Passaic Rolling Mills, and other works, there were also large audiences.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Sudden Death of Ex-Secretary Belknap, at Washington, removes one of the best known figures at the National Capital. He has not been seen since Saturday, 11th inst. When discovered on Monday in his room, he had been extinct for many hours. William B. Belknap, (whose portrait is given in this issue), was born at Hudson, N. Y., in 1831, his father being General

John G. Belknap, a hero of the Mexican war of 1812. He died for the bar, then the Civil War broke out, he joined the army and was present at the battles of Shiloh, Corinth and Vicksburg. He was promoted to the rank of Major-General, later to that of Lieutenant-General. In 1869 he was appointed President Grant's Cabinet as Secretary of War, resigning during the latter's second term.

He was impeached and tried before the Senate on the charge of bribery, but his resignation before impeachment left that body without jurisdiction. Since quitting politics, he had quietly in Washington with his wife and children. The cause of death was heart disease.

Army of Unemployed in London this morning is said to greatly exceed that of any previous season. This the cable attributes to a variety of causes, among others to the prevalence of strikes in Britain and the effect of the American tariff which has compelled some manufacturers abroad to reduce their output materially, and others to transfer their factories to the United States. There is a gloomy prospect ahead for the British workingman. It is felt, too, that the distress will be taken advantage of by the Socialists to foment trouble. A Workingman's Committee was appointed a few days ago to organize the unemployed and to petition the London city authorities to begin public works on an extensive scale, for the purpose of relieving the general idleness and misery.

Shocking Calamity Occurred in Syracuse, on the night of the 15th, when the splendid Hotel, one of the finest in that part of the country, caught fire and ten lives were lost, while a large number of persons were more or less seriously injured. Mr. Lewis D. Lewis, a cousin of the proprietor, discovered the fire, which started in the store-room. An alarm was immediately given, but the flames spread so rapidly that before a majority of the guests could be awakened, the centre of the building was a vast, seething furnace. The guests crowded halls and stair-cases, and were overcome by the smoke, but were rescued away by friends. Some appeared at windows on the fourth and fifth floors, and were seen to fall backward into the flames, while others leaped to the street, some to safety, and the rest fortunately to be caught in a net. Three women ran to a window, shrieked for help, and then fell back into the flames. There were dozens of narrow escapes. One of the killed who jumped was a man named Harrop, from New York City; his victims were female servants in the hotel.

Two persons are missing, and probably dead. A majority of the injured were also employees. The loss on the building was supposed to be fire-proof and furniture estimated at $100,000, exclusive of the personal losses of the guests, many of whom saved except what they wore. Henry Rucker, a colored elevator boy, heroically saved the lives of five servant girls at the risk of his own.

Band of Assassins Belonging to a Secret Society, known as "The Mafia," killed Chief Hennessey, the Chief of Police of New Orleans, on the night of the 15th inst. They entered the block in which he lived, and at midnight, when he was going home, shot him down, and escaped in the darkness. Chief Hennessey had made himself obnoxious to the organization by his efforts to stamp it out, and to bring its criminal members to justice. In New Orleans "The Mafia" seems to have been chiefly used for the purposes of the vendetta, and it has flourished among the Italians there, they having adopted it from the Sicilians. Many murders have been committed, but they have, in almost every instance, been confined to Italians.

The Flames of War may, According to the latest cable dispatches, lighten up Eastern Europe before the close of the present year. The Armenian agitation continues to be the chief feature in Eastern affairs and Russia seems determined to force matters to a crisis as rapidly as possible. The Czar is constantly adding to the Muscovite troops massed along the Turkish frontier, and it is asserted that there are now 100,000 Russian soldiers, prepared to attack the Turks in the neighborhood of Erzeroum. Meanwhile terror reigns in Armenia, where the Christians are in apprehension of a massacre. The condition of the people of that province for a year past has been something deplorable, and no amount of diplomatic negotiation at Constantinople seems to improve matters. Arbitrary arrests, shocking maltreatment of prisoners, and other cruelties, are the latest aspect of the situation.

If Chicago Cannot Have an Eiffel Tower at the coming exhibition, it is determined to have a structure that will eclipse the French edifice both in height and originality of conception. It is to take the form of a mammoth monument to Columbus. A picture of this unique tower is given above. The design is by Alberto de Pallasio, a countryman of Columbus, and represents a gigantic globe resting upon a pedestal or base. The latter is graceful enough, but the globe, designers affirm, will appear unwieldy, since its diameter is to be equal to that of the Eiffel. The base will be three hundred feet high. Surmounting the whole will be a full-rigged ship, whose masts will be 1,400 feet above the ground. A gallery will encircle the globe, and on the surface of the latter will be marked the oceans and continents of the world. From the equator to the top will be an inclined railroad, nearly four miles long. There will also be an observatory at the summit. The cost of the whole is estimated at $5,000,000, the machinery alone being worth $800,000.

A Grand Triumph for Christianity is taking place in Utah. According to the latest advices, the Gentiles believe that the action of President Woodruff of the Mormon Church in announcing the definite abandonment of the polygamic principle—which has just been confirmed by the Mormon Conference—marks the culmination of the contest begun two generations ago, and that the polygamous marriage will never again flourish on American soil. The belief there is general that the Mormons have accepted the alternative of abandoning this doctrine or leaving the territory, and that the moral and material welfare of Utah will be grandly advanced.

Death Invaded the Supreme Court of the United States on the 13th inst., when Justice Miller, who, several days before had been stricken with paralysis and had gradually grown weaker, despite the efforts of his physicians to fight off the end, passed quietly away. On the day of his demise, the Supreme Court adjourned out of respect to the deceased. Samuel F. Miller was born at Richmond, Ky., in 1816. In early life he practised medicine, but afterwards changed to the study of law. During the anti-slavery agitation, he espoused the humanitarian side, in spite of the fact that public opinion in his own State did not agree with him. Going to Iowa, he soon acquired prominence in both law and politics, but never until appointed a Justice of the Supreme Court by President Lincoln, did he hold office. He was unquestionably one of the greatest lawyers ever known in this country and his professional skill and knowledge aided in perfecting such important measures as the Legal Tender Act, the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Constitutional Amendments and the Reconstruction measures.

Montreal is Stirred up Over the Approaching visit of the Count of Paris, who is expected to reach that city on the 25th inst. There is a very strong feeling among the French Canadians against tendering him an official reception, and at a meeting in that city a few nights ago, Republican sympathizers declared that such a reception would be "throwing an insult in the face of France." A motion to abandon the proposed demonstration was lost and the arrangements will go on.

The Escape of the Irish Nationalists, John Dillon and William O'Brien, while under bail to appear for trial at Tipperary, Ireland, on the charge of inciting tenants to conspire against paying rent, has been a puzzling problem to the English Government detectives during the past week. The two accused, after eluding their watchers, embarked on a yacht and sailed for France, where they were sheltered by M. Rafalovitch, the wealthy father-in-law of Mr. O'Brien. They intend to sail shortly for this country where, in company with Timothy Harrington and T. D. Sullivan, they will make a tour of agitation. Meanwhile the trial of the two fugitives goes on in their absence.

That Hardy Old Veteran, Ex-President Joubert, of the Transvaal Republic in South Africa, arrived on these shores a few days ago. It is just nine years since Joubert's name was everywhere heard as that of the brave farmer-general of the Dutch Boers, who had led them victoriously in battle against the British troops in a dozen different encounters, the most conspicuous being that at Majuba Hill, which was fought on Sunday, February 27, 1881. Under Joubert's leadership, the farmer-soldiers—all of them skilled marksmen—performed prodigies of valor. Three noted British generals—Sir Frederick Roberts, Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir G. P. Colley, fell in the Boer campaign. Since that time, the Transvaal has secured a certain measure of independence.

THE LIGHT OF LIFE.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Promises for Dark Hours—In Time of National Gloom—The Hope of the Messiah Given to Cheer—I. The Crisis of the Text—Jesus the Sign of Coming Light—The Holdfast in Time of Darkness—The Ground of Hope for Final Triumph—II. Jesus as Immanuel—As the Great Light—Must be Accepted—As Ruler—As King—An Emancipated Slave Girl—As the Sanctifier.

"But there shall be no gloom to her that was in anguish. In the former time he brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, but in the latter time hath he made it glorious, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the nations. The people that walked in darkness hath seen a great light: they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined." Isaiah 9: 1, 2. R. V.

WHEN Judah was in sore distress, the sign that she should be delivered was Immanuel. "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." (Isaiah 7: 14.) When no other ray of comfort could be found, light came from the promise of the wondrous birth of Him whose name is "God with us." God alone would be the deliverer of Judah when overmatched by her two enemies. God would be with them, and He gave them as a pledge, a vision of that time when, in very deed, God would dwell among men, and wear their nature in the person of The Virgin-born.

It is noteworthy that the clearest promises of the Messiah have been given in the darkest hours of history. If the prophets had been silent upon the Coming One before, they always speak out in the cloudy and dark day; for well the Spirit made them know that the coming of God in human flesh is the lone star of the world's night. In the worst times we are to preach Christ, and to look to Christ. In Jesus there is a remedy for the direst of diseases, and a rescue from the darkest of despairs. It is God's comfort to troubled hearts in all the ages; it is God's sign of grace to us this morning. The sure hope of sinners and the great joy of saints is the incarnate Lord, Immanuel, God with us. May He be your joy and mine even this day. He it is who is the great light of the people who dwell in the land of the shadow of death: if any among you are in that dreary land, may He be light and life to you!

I. There is to be a light breaking in upon the sons of men who sit in darkness, and this light is to be found only in the incarnate God. Let me illustrate this fact by the context. I must carry you back to the fourteenth verse of the seventh chapter.

The Sign of Coming Light is Jesus. "Therefore the Lord Himself shall give you a sign; Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel." In Judah's trouble, the Virgin-born was God's token that He would deliver, and that speedily; for in less time than it would take such a child to reach years of knowledge, both Judah's royal adversaries would be gone. The sign was good for Ahaz; but it is better far for us. Behold the incarnate Son of God, born of Mary at Bethlehem; what can this intend for us but grace? If the Lord had meant to destroy us, He would not have assumed our nature. If He had not been moved with mighty love to a guilty race, He would never have taken upon Himself their flesh and blood. It is a miracle of miracles that the Infinite should become an infant; that He who is pure spirit, and filleth all things, should be wrapped in swaddling bands, and cradled in a manger. He took not on Him the nature of angels, though that would have been a tremendous stoop from Deity, but He descended lower still; for He took on Him the seed of Abraham. "He was made in all things like unto His brethren:" though "He counted it not robbery to be equal with God." It is not in the power of human lips to speak out all the comfort which this one sign contains. If any troubled soul will look believingly at God in human flesh, he must take heart of hope.

We have comfort in the fact that our Lord was truly man. He whom we worship became one with us in nature. He grew up from childhood to youth, and from youth to manhood, passing through all the gradations of human weakness, even as we have done; and he was obedient to his parents, even as other children should be. He is, therefore, really and truly a man; and this fact is a bright, particular star for sinners' eyes. Come to Jesus, all ye who languish under terror and dread because of the majesty of Deity; for here you see how compassionate He is, how sympathetic He can be, yea, how near of kin He has become. He is God; but He is God with us. He is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, a brother born for adversity; and here the most trembling may be at rest. God in our nature is a grand prophecy of salvation and bliss for us.

Further on we see our Lord Jesus as the holdfast of the soul

In Time of Darkness.

This is your own hope: if you believe in Jesus you belong to Jesus; if you trust Him, He has redeemed you with a price, and will also redeem you with power. If you cast your guilty soul at His dear feet, and take Him to be your own Saviour, you are not your own, but bought with a price; and sooner shall heaven and earth pass away than one whom Jesus calls His own shall be left to perish.

Further on in the chapter we learn that Jesus is our star of hope as to the destruction of the enemy. The foes of God's people shall be surely vanquished and destroyed, because of Immanuel. In Him, even in our Lord Jesus Christ, dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and He has brought all that Godhead to bear upon the overthrow of the foes of His people. Let the powers of darkness consult and plot as they may, they can never destroy the Lord's redeemed. Lo! I see councils of evil spirits: they sit down in Pandemonium, and conspire to ruin a soul redeemed by blood. They lay their heads together, they use a cunning deep as hell: they are eager to destroy the soul that rests in Jesus. In vain are their devices, for the incarnate God is embodied wisdom.

The Morning Light:

Further on we find the Lord Jesus as the morning light after a night of darkness. The last verses of the eighth chapter picture a horrible state of wretchedness and despair: "And they shall pass through it, hardly bestead and hungry: and it shall come to pass, that when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, and look upward. And they shall look unto the earth; and behold trouble and darkness, dimness of anguish; and they shall be driven to darkness." But see what a change awaits them! Read the fine translation of the Revised Version: "But there shall be no gloom to her that was in anguish." What a marvelous light from the midst of a dreadful darkness! It is an astounding change, such as only God could work.

Many of you know nothing about the miseries described in those verses; but there are some here who have traversed that terrible wilderness; and I am going to speak to them. I know where you are this morning: you are being driven as captives into and for the last few months you have been tramping along a painful road, "hardly bestead and hungry." You are sorely put to it, and your soul finds no food of comfort, but it is ready to faint and die. You fret yourself: your heart is wearing away with care, and grief, and hopelessness. In the bitterness of your soul you are ready to curse the day of your birth. The captive Israelites cursed their king who had led them into their defeat and bondage; in the fury of their agony, they even cursed God and longed to die. It may be that your heart is in such a ferment of grief that you know not what you think, but are like a man at his wits' end. Those who led you into sin are bitterly remembered; and as you think upon God you troubled. This is a dreadful case for a soul to be in, and it involves a world of sin and misery.

In such a case, none can give you comfort save Immanuel, God with us. Only God, espousing your cause, and bearing your sin, can possibly save you. See, He comes for your salvation! Hold, He has come to seek and to save that which was lost. God has come down from heaven and veiled Himself in our flesh, that He may be able to save to the uttermost. He can be the chief of sinners: He can save you. Come to Jesus, you that have gone furthest into transgression, you that sit down in despondency, that shut yourselves up in the iron cage of despair. For such as you there shines this light of the first magnitude. Jesus has appeared, save, and He is God and man in one person, man that He may feel our woes, God that He may help us out of them. No minister can do you, no priest can save you—you know it right well; but here is One who is able to save to the uttermost, for He is God as well as man.

Once more, dear friends, we learn from which follows our text, that the reign of Jesus is the star of the golden future. He came to Galilee of the Gentiles, and made that country glorious, which had been brought into contempt. That corner of Palestine had very often borne the brunt of invasion, and had felt more than any other region the edge of the Assyrian sword. It was with a mixed population, despised by the Jews; but that very country became glorious with the presence of the incarnate God. It was there that all manner of diseases were healed, there the seas were stilled, and the multitudes were fed; it was there that the Lord found His apostles, and there He met the company of His followers when He had risen from the dead. That first land to be invaded by the enemy was made the head-quarters of the army of salvation: this very Zebulun, Naphtali, which had been so down-trodden and despised, was made the scene of the mighty works of the Son of God. Even so, at this time His gracious presence is the day-dawn of our

When Jesus comes, you shall have eternal peace; for His battle is the end of battle. Think I see it now. My sins, which were weapons of my foes, the Lord piles in heaps. What mountains of prey! But see! He blows the fire-brand of His love from the altar of sacrifice, and He sets fire to the gigantic pile. How they blaze! They are utterly consumed forever. The enemy has now no weapon which he can use against my soul. The incarnate God has broken the power of the adversary, for sin is death, and that He has made an end of. He has thus destroyed the war waged in our souls, and now He reigns as Prince of peace, and we have peace in Him.

II. But now, secondly, I want to press home certain truths connected with my theme. Immanuel is a grand word. "God with us" means more than tongue can tell. It means enmity moved on our part, and justice vindicated on God's part. It means the whole Godhead engaged on our side, resolved to bless us.

But you say to me, "Who is this? Are you sure that Immanuel is Jesus of Nazareth?"

Jesus is Immanuel.

The Saviour is God with us. Jesus, a Saviour, is, in the Hebrew, Joshua, or Jehoshua, the Jehovah saving. The sense is the same as of Immanuel, or "God with us," or "for since God for us is sure to save us. The names are the same in essential meaning. Strong Son of God! Immortal Love! We do not see thy face; but we can trust thy power, and rest upon thy love. Thy very birth brings hope; but as for thy death, when thou dost bear our sins in thine own body on the cross, this is the fulfilment of all our desires, in the cancelling of sin, the removal of wrath, and the securing of eternal life. Yes, Jesus is God with us.

Perhaps you wish to know a little more of the incident in the text which exhibits Jesus as eat light. Yes, beloved, our Lord made His home in the darkest parts. He looked about and saw no country so ignorant, no country so sorrowful, as Galilee of the Gentiles, and therefore He went there, and lifted it up to heaven—priceless privileges! His ministry of repentance and faith was in itself a glorious light; it He did many mighty works to confirm it. Why, the whole country round was full of sick folk whom He had restored. You could not go a mile but what you met a blind man, who told of how Jesus had restored his sight, or a sick woman who had been raised up from a fever, or some paralytic who had been made whole. That country must have been glad indeed. Multitudes would never forget how they heard Him by the sea. They said, "What sermons He preached! He made our hearts dance for joy; and then He fed us, and we ate of barley loaves and little fish till we were filled. He is a wonderful prophet, and this is a wonderful country; so dark enough, but now Enlightened by His Presence."

Beloved, I pray that Jesus Christ may come to you if you are in the dark to-day, and work miracles for you, feed you, and teach you, and make you glad, so that, though you were the most unhappy of beings, you may become the happiest of mortal men. Galilee plundered, spoiled, despised, became, by-and-by, glorious, because of Him who is Immanuel. This is a happy omen for you, dear friends; if you have been the most sorrowful of beings, the Lord Jesus may come at once to you and make you rejoice with great joy. Jesus rescues from contempt, from ignorance, from misery, from despair, and therein reveals Himself as "God with us."

I received a note from one of my hearers, who reads, "Tell me, sir, what faith is; tell me what you mean by believing and trusting." My dear friend, I am always telling you that, and I mean to keep on always telling you it, so long as I have a tongue to move. By a daring act of appropriation, take Jesus to be yours, and say with me—oh, that we could all say it in one great shout!—"Unto us a child is born, unto us a son given." God gives Him,

We Take Him.

He is born, we take Him up in our arms, and feel ready to cry, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." He is a Son given. Shall we not accept this gift of gifts, and love Him because He has first loved us? To believe is to take freely what God gives freely. It is the simplest thing that can be. If you want Christ, you may have Him. If you desire to have God with you, He waits to be gracious unto you. If you wish for Immanuel, behold Him in Jesus. "Oh, but I wish I had some sign that I might be sure!" What sign do you want beyond the gift of God, the birth of Jesus? Away with demands which are wild and ungenerous. The Word of God bids you believe and live. The moment you believe in Jesus He is yours. Say, then, this morning, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," and say it with fulness of delight.

As Ruler.

Be sure that you go on with the verse to the end—"and the government shall be upon His shoulder." If Christ is your Saviour, He must be your King.

"But know, nor of the terms complain,
Where Jesus comes He comes to reign:
To reign, and with no partial sway;
Lusts must be slain that disobey."

"The moment we really believe in Jesus as our salvation we fall before Him, and call Him Master and Lord. We serve when He saves. He has redeemed us unto Himself, and we own that we are His. A generous man once bought a slave-girl. She was put upon the block for auction, and he pitied her and purchased her; but when he had bought her, he said to her, 'I have bought you to set you free. There are our papers, you are a freewoman.' The grateful creature fell at his feet and cried, 'I will never leave you: if you have made me free I will be your servant as long as you live, and serve you better than any slave could do." This is how we feel towards Jesus. He sets us free from the dominion of Satan, and then, as we need a ruler, we say, "And the government shall be upon His shoulder." We are glad to be ruled by "Immanuel, God with us." This also is a door of hope to us. That Jesus shall be the monarch of our hearts is our exceeding joy. To us He shall be always "Wonderful." When we think of Him or speak about Him, it shall be with reverent awe. When we need advice and comfort, we will fly to Him, for He shall be our Counsellor. When we need strength, we will look to Him as our Mighty God. Born again by His Spirit, we will be His children, and He shall be the Everlasting Father. Full of joy and rest, we will call Him Prince of Peace.

Are you willing to have Christ to govern you? Will you spend your lives in praising Him? You are willing to have Christ to pardon you, but we cannot divide Him, and therefore you must also have Him to sanctify you. You must not take the crown from His head; but accept Him as the monarch of your soul. If you would have His hand to help you, you must obey the sceptre which it grasps. Blessed Immanuel, we are right glad to obey thee! In thee our darkness ends, and from the shadow of death we rise to the light of life. It is salvation to be obedient to thee. It is the end of gloom to her that was in anguish to bow herself before thee. May God the Holy Spirit take of the things of Christ and show them unto us, and then we shall all cry—

"Go worship at Immanuel's feet!
See in His face what wonders meet!
Earth is too narrow to express His worth, His grace, His righteousness."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Two Pictures.*

"ONE beautiful afternoon in August, there came to me the broken-hearted wife of a State-prison convict. We tried to plan for his pardon and restoration to home and the world. It was a very sad case. He was the only surviving son of a very noble man—one who lived only to serve the poor, the tempted, and the criminal. All he had, all he was, he gave unreservedly to help thieves and drunkards. His house was their home. His name their bail to save them from prison. His reward their reformation. It was a happy hour to hear him tell of the hundreds he had shielded from the contamination and evil example of prisons, and of the large proportion he has good reason to believe permanently saved. Out of the hundreds, he once told me, only two left him to pay their bail, forfeited by neglect to show themselves in court according to agreement—only two!

"Bred under such a roof, the son started in life with a generous heart, noble dreams, and high purpose. Ten years of prosperity, fairly earned by energy, industry and character, ended in bankruptcy, as is so often the case in our risky and changing trade, then came a struggle for business, for bread—temptation—despair—intemperance. He could not safely pass the open doors that tempted him to indulgence, forgetfulness and crime. How hard his wife wrought and struggled to save him from indulgence, and then to shield him from exposure! How long wife, sister and friends, labored to avert conviction and the State prison! 'I would spare him gladly,' wrote the prosecuting attorney, 'if he would stop drinking. He shall never go to prison if he will be a sober man. But all this wretchedness and crime comes from rum.'

"Manfully did the young fellow struggle to resist the appetite. Again and again did he promise, and keep his promise perhaps for a month, then fall. He could not walk the streets and earn his bread soberly, while so many open doors—opened by men who sought to coin gold out of their neighbors' vices—lured him to indulgence. So, rightfully, the State pressed on, and he went to prison. An honored name disgraced, a loving home broken up, a wide circle of kindred sorely pained, a worthy, well-meaning man wrecked. Sorrow and crime 'all comes from rum,' says the keen-sighted lawyer.

"As I parted from the sad wife on my doorstep, I looked beyond, and close by the laughing sea stood a handsome cottage. The grounds were laid out expensively and with great taste. Over the broad piazza hung lazily an Eastern hammock, while all around were richly painted chairs and lounges of every easy and tempting form. Overhead were quaint vases of beautiful flowers, and the delicious lawn was bordered with them. On the lawn itself gayly dressed women laughed merrily over croquet, and noisy children played near. A span of superb horses pawed the earth impatiently at the gate, while gay salutations passed between the croquet-players and fashionable equipages that rolled by. It was a scene of beauty, comfort, taste, luxury and wealth. All came from rum. Silks and diamonds, flowers and equipage, stately roof and costly attendance—all came from rum. The owner was one who, in a great city, coined his gold out of the vices of his fellow-men.

"To me it was a dissolving view. I lost sight of the gay women, the frolicsome children, the impatient horses, and the ocean rolling up to the lawn. I saw instead the pale convict in his cell, twelve feet by nine; the sad wife going from judge to attorney, from court to Governor's Council, begging mercy for her over-tempted husband. I heard above the children's noise, the croquet, laugh, and the surf waves, that lawyer's stern reason for exacting the full penalty of the law—all this comes from rum."

The Conversion of Wendell Phillips.

A personal friend asked him, not long before his death: "Mr. Phillips, did you ever consecrate yourself to God?" "Yes," he answered, "when I was a boy fourteen years of age, in the old church at the North End, I heard Lyman Beecher preach on the theme, 'You belong to God;' and I went home after that service, threw myself on the floor in my room, with locked doors, and prayed, 'O God, I belong to thee; take what is thine own. I ask this, that whenever a thing be wrong it may have no power of temptation over me; whenever a thing be right, it may take no courage to do it.' From that day to this it has been so. Whenever I have known a thing to be wrong, it has held no temptation. Whenever I have known a thing to be right, it has taken no courage to do it." The event here referred to occurred in 1826, a year previous to his matriculation. With this seriousness upon him, like the halo around a saint's head on the canvas of the old painters, he went to college.

Six Alls.

He followed his principles wherever they took him. A logical conclusion had no terrors for him. In England there is an inn called "The Six Alls." On the sign that hangs in front stands the Queen, in her robes of state, and she says: "I rule all." On her right hand is a priest, who says: "I pray for all." Below him is a soldier, who says: "I fight for all." On her left hand is a lawyer who says: "I plead for all." Below him is a doctor, who says: "I cure all." At the very bottom stands a workingman in his shirt-sleeves, grimy, beaded with perspiration, and he says: "I pay for all!" Mr. Phillips' idea was that, since the workingman paid for all, he was entitled to consideration. What created capital? Labor. Very well: then give labor its fair proportion of profits. Make legislation guarantee this.

A Division of Profits.

In the course of the season, Mr. Phillips addressed the Lyceum at Gloucester, Mass., and, returning home by the cars the next morning, fell in with a lady who got upon the train at a way-station. She was a Southern refugee, who had been suddenly reduced from affluence to poverty, and was supporting herself and her fatherless children by giving an occasional lecture before a country audience. It was a struggle; for the field was full, and she was almost unknown and friendless; but with a brave heart she worked on, never asking a dollar of aid from any society or individual. Mr. Phillips saw her get upon the car, and asked her to take a seat beside him. It was a winter day; she was thinly clad, shivering from the exposure of a long ride in the open air of the cold morning. Observing this, Mr. Phillips asked:

"Where did you speak last night?"

She told him it was at a town about ten miles distant from the railway.

"And—I wouldn't be impertinent—how much did they pay you?"

"Five dollars, and the fare to and from Boston."

"Five dollars!" he exclaimed why, I always get one or two hundred; and your lecture must be worth more than mine—you give facts, I only opinions."

"Small as it is, I am very glad to get it, Mr. Phillips," answered the lady. "I would talk at that rate every night during the winter."

He sat for a moment in silence; then he put his hand into his pocket, drew out a roll of bank-notes, and said, in a hesitating way:

"I don't want to give offence, but you know I preach that a woman is entitled to the same as a man, if she does the same work. Now, my price is one or two hundred dollars; and, if you will let me divide it with you, I shall not have had any more than you, and the thing will be even."

The lady at first refused; but, after a little urging, she put the bank-notes in her purse. At the end of her journey, she counted the roll, and found it contained one hundred dollars. It may add a point to this incident to say (what is the truth) that the lady was a niece of Jefferson Davis.

A LETTER FROM CHINA.

IN a letter just received from Kuang-feng, Kiang-si, China, by the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Miss Hattie D. Turner writes: "We receive regularly THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and enjoy very much the reading of its contents. In one of the April numbers (I believe it was*) we read an extract from a letter written by Miss MacIntosh of Yuli-shan, about a mother's grief for her son, during Miss M's visit to Kuang-feng for the first time. Since then it has been a great joy to my companion (Miss Fitzsimons) and I to be able to live in this city and work among the dear women who have never-dying souls just as we have. We (two) have now been living here for nine months right among the people and as near 'one' with them as we can; our joy was great on June 17th to witness eight from here publicly confess Christ as their Saviour and Lord and King. Two of these eight are the parents of the boy that Miss MacIntosh refers to in her letter; the dear mother still very often refers to her son who died not knowing of Jesus: these both are very bright but very poor.

"I was so pleased about reading the short piece in that number and knowing that that dear anxious mother was a believer and looking for the Blessed Hope that I could not refrain from passing on to you the glad news."

CHRISTIAN WORK IN INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

A DEEPLY interesting narrative of missionary labor in Western Bengal has been sent by the Rev. R. T. Edwards, from Tarokeshar, with two pictures, of which the accompanying illustrations are copies. The first represents one of those self-imposed penances by which the superstitious benighted people hope to win the favor of their deities. Mr. Edwards says: "I saw this poor creature, as I have others, painfully making his way through this ordeal. He had made a vow that he would visit Tarokeshar and 'walk on his breast' to the temple. On his arrival he came to the tank, and after bathing with much ceremony, he proceeds in this fashion to the shrine. From the very water's edge he has to commence measuring. Then the steep, slippery bank has to be climbed, and thence along the crowded thoroughfare, under people's feet, he has to make his way.

"The practice is to fall upon the knees, then flat down upon the breast, next the hands are pushed out to full length, and a mark is made from which to commence the next prostration. Before rising the devotee presses his forehead on both sides against the ground. Of course he soon gets covered with dust or mud, as the case may be, and presents a most unnatural spectacle. Arrived at the temple, he is fortunate if he is not trampled under foot by the surging crowd. There he makes his salaam to the stone idol, and presents his offering to the Mohunt (the chief priest), who gives him his blessing, and he may go. Of course he takes to himself great credit for having performed this meritorious act. But I have written as if only men performed this ceremony. But that is not so. The women—mostly widows—outnumber the men. I know of no more painful sight than to see females, young and old, debasing themselves in this way.

"You will ask: Why do the people adhere to such a degrading custom? Have they such a deep conviction of sin that they are prepared to suffer any humiliation in the hopes of getting it removed? Alas, no! Such a motive does not seem to exist. Were it so, how gladly would they listen to the story of Jesus Christ and His power to save unto the uttermost. But it is not so; all they want to get by this ceremony is healing from some sickness or some worldly advantage. The highest motive any amongst them have is to accumulate religious merit.

"The second picture represents a religious service conducted by one of our native preachers. It is our plan to pitch a tent in the country outside Tarokeshar. Then, taking our stand on the roadside under some shady trees, we sing a lively Christian hymn. This does no fail to attract an audience when a short enthusiastic address is delivered. Thus singing and preaching goes on for the space, perhaps, of three hours. In the picture the central figure is that of the preacher. In front of him stand a great crowd of men and women. There is something very inspiring in open-air preaching—such large crowds gather, and the attention is so deep. Indeed, the danger lies in our young preachers being carried away altogether with enthusiasm and incapacitating themselves for work by getting hoarse during the first day. This was the case with some of our students. By being careful not to speak too long at a time a preacher may continue working for a week or more, and that speaking several times a day. But however careful you may be, it is exceedingly trying work to keep on preaching in the climate day after day. The heat during this festival at Tarokeshar, is almost beyond your conception. It is only in the cool of the evening that a white man can take any part in the work."

THE BURNING OF ASPINWALL.

AMONG the calamities, of which this year has been so prolific, must be reckoned the recent destructive fire at Aspinwall, on Colon, in the United States of Colombia. The area devastated covered the business part of the city, and consequently caused a greater loss than would have been occasioned by a conflagration of like extent in any other section of the city. The accompanying illustration is a picture of the burned section as it appeared before the fire.

The city of Colon has attained its present prominence through the Panama Railroad, of which it is the Atlantic terminus. This line is forty-eight miles long and is much used by travellers who do not wish to take the long journey by sea around Cape Horn. The Panama Canal also brought a large increase of prosperity to Colon and the suspension of work on that disastrous enterprise produced a corresponding depression. It stands on a marshy, unhealthy island close to the mainland. The native population, exclusive of United States and European merchants, and their employees, is not over ten thousand. Like other seaports, however, there are large numbers of foreigners temporarily residing there, either for the purpose of business or pleasure. As seven lines of steamers make Colon a point of departure or place of call, the port affords large opportunities for business negotiations, which Europeans have seized with more avidity than have our own people. It was ceded in perpetuity by the old Republic of New Granada to the Panama Railroad Company, who named it Aspinwall in honor of Col. Aspinwall, one of the promoters of the railroad. The natives, however, still call it Colon, from the family name of Columbus, whose statue, representing the discoverer, sheltering an aboriginal Indian under his protecting arm, adorns the market-place.

The United States of Colombia, to which Colon belonged, were organized under one government in 1819. It then included Venezuela and Ecuador, but those States seceded, and became independent in 1829. From that time until 1861, there was but little peace. Several States seceded and subsequently returned into the Union. Civil wars were frequent and there were many assassinations and revolutions. In 1861 the present constitution was promulgated, under which there has been comparative peace and order. The population is about three millions, of which 100,000 are Indians. Less than one-quarter of the whole country is as yet under cultivation.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY,

Author of "Nestleton Magna," "Simon Holmes, the Carpenter," "Will it Lift?" etc., etc.

NORA settled down wonderfully well to her new conditions. It is not to be imagined that she did not chafe full often under the irritating influence of her uncle's mode of speech, nor that it did not reach her deeper feelings, and loose, at times, the flood-gates of her speech. But all this was carefully hidden from all observers, and the tears were only permitted as a safety-valve in the quiet of her own room.

The quiet of her own chamber, too, was the atmosphere in which her tears were dried and her spirits took heart of grace again, for it was there that she was accustomed to talk to her mother's God; to make Him her confidant and counsellor, and to gain from Him strength to bear her burden bravely, and to "do the next thing," as the old Saxon proverb has it, "with an honest conscience and in the fear of God."

As full compensation, too, she had a home, a relative, and despite the old man's porcupine propensities, she felt that she was welcome where she was. The good will and eventually the affection of honest Tabitha, made things still better for her, and last, not least, she was able to cultivate her taste for painting.

On more than one occasion even Old Crusty himself had given his opinion of her handiwork, and had declared, after he had looked upon one of her sketches, holding his square chin the while between his fingers and thumb, as if to prevent the exit of too much approbation, that "it might ha' been worse;" and on another occasion he ventured even further than that, and declared that he "did not think she had so much in her!" For which, as a matter of course, Nora felt grateful and flattered.

In Tabitha Crowle, Nora had a capital instructor in all matters that pertained to household management. That capable body inducted her into all the mysteries of the dairy, and such other employment amongst cows, hens, ducks, pigs, goslings, and such other fearful wild fowl as Abram Hardale's menagerie contained.

There was but little shyness or reserve about the maiden who seemed to have dropped down upon the plane of George Appleton's horizon from a higher place. That honest craftsman was often favored with a "call" as she passed, and a little pleasant chat besides. Whatever effect, if any, this might have upon the dainty damsel herself, it is quite clear it awakened many possibilities for impressionable George. He found himself, after such visits, to be doing his work mechanically, and was suddenly brought out of dreamland to discover that he was blundering, and putting in peril the proud pre-eminence of Abram Hardale's establishment for the perfection of carpentry, and its high excellence in the wheelwright's difficult craft; putting in peril also something else of even more importance. But the dream always ended in a vision which, according to his thinking, was extravagant, and that was a sight of Nora Mansford as the presiding genius of the place.

One day, some little time after Nora's arrival on the scene, George was busily engaged at his bench, planing a broad pine-board for use and service as the paneling of a door. In the hands of the skilful George the long plane went skimming along over the smooth and resinous surface, and the long shavings fell in ever accumulating curls at his feet. The sharp, whistling sound that accompanied the motions of the plane told of a tool in good order, timber without knots, and a thoroughly good workman in charge of both. Into the shop came Nora Mansford.

"Good morning, George," said the young lady, "I want to beg a few of those nice shavings you are making to put into the parlor grate. May I have some?"

George's big, honest heart was all of a flutter as he heard her musical voice, and met the fascination of those bright, dark eyes. "Have 'em? Yes, all of 'em, for the matter of that; but if you will wait awhile, I'll pick you out some of the longest and curliest. They are the sort you want, aren't they, Miss Nora?"

"There!" said Nora, smiling, "Tabitha told me that I had better not come until you had gone to dinner. She said you would not like to be bothered—a case of no admittance except on business, you know; and as I'm coming a-begging, there isn't much business in that, is there?"

"Why, no," laughed George, "we shouldn't like to have too many visitors whose only business is to beg; but you see, you're very different, Miss Nora, and my opinion is that you would be sure of welcome anywhere."

"There now, you're beginning with your compliments, Mr. Appleton. They're not welcome in this quarter. Deep down in your heart, I daresay, you are saying this very minute, 'What does the girl mean by coming bothering me?'"

"No, indeed," began George, in a needlessly emphatic tone, to the arch suggestions of Nora, "I am sure you are not bothering me." What else he might have said I can't tell. He was saved from the utterance of anything foolish; foolish things are often said "on the spur of the moment," and especially of such a moment.

The form of a young gentleman darkened the shop door. He was sprucely attired, not to say gaily, and wore quite a distinguished air. No sooner did the new-comer observe Nora than he fixed his eye-glass, and stared at her in silent admiration.

"Good morning, miss," he said, "I was not at all aware that fairies haunted Abram Hardale's bowers—"

What more the young gallant would have said may not be known, for Nora caught a glimpse of the young carpenter's face. The cloud on his brow and the sparkle in his eye was a warning to the maiden that she could not well mistake; so she cut short the compliments of the young exquisite:

"Fairies?" said she. "Oh, yes. He's as good a fairy as he's big, George is," and straightway vanished from the scene, leaving George Appleton with a tingling in his ears, and Mr. Gerald Towneley looking after her with his glass to his eye.

Mr. Gerald Towneley, or Gerald Towneley, Esquire, for this he was careful to insist was his proper style and title, was a personage of very high importance, very high indeed, in the estimation of at least one of the lieges of the land, and that one was himself. He was a younger scion of one of the leading county families. His father had been lord-lieutenant of the shire, and was likely enough to be so again, for such honors are very apt to go by favor; and favor in its turn is very apt to go by gold, and the Towneley family, especially the owner of Towneley Chase, had gold galore.

Mr. Gerald was not the eldest, nor the wisest, nor the best of old Squire Towneley's numerous family; but he was the handsomest without doubt, if you are willing totally to ignore the old proverb, "Handsome is that handsome does." His head of bright, black curled, not curly, hair was quite a source of pride to him, and was a source of wonderment, envy, or amusement according to the taste of each observer. His incipient mustache, too, had quite "a silken

"beauty fair to see," and gave him constant opportunity of displaying by turns his small patrician hands. These were encased, according to the remarkable fashion of the times in lavender kid gloves, and twirling the former and wearing out untold pairs of the latter occupied no small proportion of his valuable time. It would probably have been better for him, and for many others, if the rest of his time had been spent in the same manner; for if half the reports current concerning him were true, the intervals were employed in adventures and episodes that made havoc of his reputation, and obtained for him with sufficient justice the local name of "Tricky Towneley."

Having given this brief, but sufficient description of this young gentleman, the reader will not wonder that the young carpenter was anything but glad to see him, or that there was a cloud on his brow that would have warned Nora, had she at all needed it, that he was a man to avoid.

"I say, Appleton," said the young exquisite, with an adjective neither useful nor ornamental, "that's a superior article, and no mistake. You don't mean to say that she belongs to old Abram Hardale's stock, do you? She doesn't look as though she came of that lineage. Why, she might be a princess in disguise." George was not too ready with his reply; not only because he distrusted the inquirer, but also because he was still listening to the voice of the maiden as she spoke of the "good fairy," and was still looking at the glance she gave him as she said it.

"Yes," said he, at length, "the young lady is a relation of Abram's." "She hasn't been here very long, has she?" queried Towneley.

"No," answered George.

"Is she going to stay here?" persisted Mr. Gerald Towneley.

"That's more than I can say, sir," was George's answer.

Here George sent his plane skimming along the pine-board with a vigor, which said as plain as plain could be, "What business, I should like to know, is that of yours?" The young gentleman made one or two other vain efforts to secure information, and then, having attended to the small matter of business, which brought him there, he bore his mustache and his lavender gloves away. Passing along the High Street the young gentleman happened to meet Abram Hardale, whose tall, ungainly form, was bending under the weight of certain iron requisites in the wheelwright's craft. Old Crusty, I must say that for him, was an eminently consistent man, crusty to gentle and simple both, and his sarcastic tongue had as little mercy on broadcloth as it had on corduroy. Probably both crustiness and sarcasm had a little sharper flavor than usual just now, for Abram had a rooted dislike to idlers. Mr. Gerald Towneley gave him quite a smile by way of greeting.

"Good morning, Abram," said he, "you are heavily weighted this morning."

Abram eyed the slim patrician, his cane, moustache, etc., as he replied—

"Mornin'. Yes sir, some folks have to be. Things of that sort aren't dealt out fairly."

"Yes," said the young man, patronizingly, "but you carry articles of a very useful kind."

"Why, yes," said Abram, sweetly, "so do you for that matter. Canes have a use."

"By the way, Hardale," said Mr. Gerald, not caring to pursue the subject, "who's that handsome little bird you've brought us to Settleworth?"

Abram Hardale, who had already passed him, turned back; lifting a rough and rusty iron "bush"—as the socket of the wheel is called—from his shoulder, he offered it to the young Adonis.

"Here," said he, "just hold that a bit. If I'm to stop and explain I must be eased of my load a trifle."

"Oh, no!—ah, never mind, Abram. You can tell me some other time. Good morning." So saying, the young gentleman, who had backed in horror from the rusty casting, which would have made sad work of his gloves, beat a hasty retreat.

"Ah, ah, ah," quoted Abram to himself with a low chuckle, as he hitched his burden more securely on his shoulder, "'Ware hawk,' I say, and I say, 'Hawk beware,' too."

Having delivered himself of this sentiment, he strode along beneath his metal burden with his square chin set a little more firmly even than usual.

Meanwhile, Miss Nora had dismissed the little episode of the young squire's visit from her mind. I am inclined to think that Mr. Gerald Towneley would have felt a good deal humiliated if he had known of how slight a nature was the first impression he had made on the maiden who had exercised so startling an effect on him. "There," said she to Tabitha, triumphantly, opening her apron, to show the curly treasures she had obtained. "I 'bothered George' so much that he picked them for me. Aren't they beautiful? I'm not sure he didn't make one or two special ones on purpose."

"Oh, that's it, is it? Mebbe he'll be mekking something else beside shavings if you go on 'bothering him,'" observed Tabitha, with gravity.

At this shocking suggestion which Nora had certainly never dreamt of, she turned away and quietly proceeded to arrange her booty in the parlor gate.

Nora's life under her uncle's roof was a good deal cheered and brightened by honest Tabitha's kindly feeling and homely wit; and, indeed, she was quietly making headway with her uncle himself, thanks mainly to her Christly self-restraint and winsome tact. Still she needed, greatly needed, what neither Tabitha nor her uncle of a surety could supply, she needed a mother;—she, alas, had gone from her. Her place in all its fullness couldn't be supplied. But the kindly Providence which watched over Nora did supply her with the next best thing, a friend with a motherly heart, and the heaven-taught wisdom to use such a motherhood aright.

Such a woman was Mrs. Appleton. After a while she got over her early flurry caused by the fair orphan's advent above the Settleworth horizon. As the days and weeks went by, her watchful eye or ear saw or heard nothing on the part of her beloved son to give her either discomfort or suspicion. Besides, her natural good sense had led her to settle in her own mind that her leal-hearted and sensible boy was sure to do what was right both to himself and her; beyond that, interference was out of her province, and she was wisely content it should be so.

Not long after Nora's arrival, she had called at the old carpenter's house. Her kindly face and winsome tones and hearty manners took the heart of the girl by storm. An invitation to the cottage, with an assurance of a hearty welcome whenever she liked to come, was frankly accepted and speedily tested. Since then scarcely a week passed in which Nora did not find her way to the widow's cosy cottage, led there by an unwitting instinct of her need, and finding there the solace and the cheer she lacked.

Makes many lives miserable, and often leads self destruction. Distress after eating, sick headache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depression, etc., are caused by this very common increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla tones stomach, creates an appetite, promotes healthy digestion, relieves sick headache, clears mind, and cures the most obstinate cases of dyspepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. In an hour after eating I would experience a faintness or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced. It relieved me of that faint, all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better since I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am happy to recommend it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass.

fectionery. The banquet lasted two or three days." That there should be this pretence of religion in union with the irreligious cannot but excite deep regret.

A CHIEF BURNS HIS IDOLS.
A DEACON in the church at Eimeo, a South Sea Island, is both a chief and judge, and in his official and private character is venerated by his people, and the missionaries bear testimony, that by his uniform Christian steadfastness he is an ornament to Christianity. He was the first in Eimeo publicly to confess his renunciation of idolatry, and acceptance of Christ, by burning his idols before the people. His compatriots stood looking at what they considered sacrilege, expecting that the evil spirits whom their idols represented would strike the apostate dead. But he remained unharmed, and it was not long before other chiefs followed his example, and then the people, seeing that their idols were powerless even to protect themselves, gave up their worship and accepted the religion of Christ. The temples erected in honor of the various idols were overthrown, and churches of the only true and living God erected in their place. This happy result was due to a large extent to the chief who took the initiative in destroying his idols.

The Dearest Spot on Earth is the spot that's washed out without Pearline. It costs in clothes, in the rubbing and scrubbing that wears them out quickly; it takes twice the time, and double the labor. It's expensive washing before you get through with it—and the cost comes home to you, no matter who does the work.

Pearline saves money by saving work, wear, and time. It hurts nothing; washes and cleans everything. It costs no more than common soap, but it does more. It's cheap to begin with—but it's cheapest in the end.

Beware of imitations of PEARLINE which are being peddled from door to door.

SUBMISSION.

Since thy Father's arm sustains thee, Peaceful be;
When a chastening hand restrains thee,
It is He.
Know His love in full completeness,
Feel the measure of thy weakness;
If he wound thy spirit sore,
Trust Him more.

Without murmur, uncomplaining,
In His hand
Leave whatever things thou canst not Understand.
Though the world thy folly spurneth,
From thy faith in pity turneth,
Peace thy inmost soul shall fill, Lying still.

Like an infant, if thou thinkest
Thou canst stand—
Child-like, proudly pushing back
The proffered hand—
Courage soon is changed to fear,
Strength doth feebleness appear;
In His love if thou abide,
He will guide.

Fearlest sometimes that thy Father Hath forgot?
Though the clouds around thee gather,
Doubt Him not.
Always hath the daylight broken,
Always hath He comfort spoken, Better hath He been for years
Than thy fears.

Therefore, whatso'er betideth,
Night or day,
Know His love for thee provideth
Good alway.
Crown of sorrows gladly take,
Grateful wear it for His sake, Sweetly bending to His will,
Saying still,—

To His own the Saviour giveth
Folly strength;
To each troubled soul that boweth,
Peace at length.
Weakest lambs have largest share
Of the tender Shepherd's care—
Ask Him not then, "When?" or "How?"
Only bow.

"He toucheth the hills and they smoke." Ps. 104 : 32.

DAVID, the poet, here pictures a volcano and what Church's Cotopaxi does on painter's canvas, this author does in words.

You see a hill, calm and still, and for ages immovable, but the Lord out of the heavens puts His finger on the top of it and from it rise thick vapors, intershot with fire. He toucheth the hills and they smoke."

CRATER OF VESUVIUS.

God is the only being who can manage a volcano and again and again has he employed volcanic action. The pictures on the walls of Pompeii, the exhumed Italian city, as we saw them last November, demonstrate that the city was not fit to live. In the first century, that city, engirdled with palaces, emparadised with gardens, pillared into architectural exquisiteness, was at the foot of a mountain up the sides of which it ran with vineyards and villas of merchant princes, and all that marble, and bronze, and imperial baths, and arboriculture, and rainbowed fountains, and a coliseum at the dedication of which nine thousand beasts had been slain, and a supernal landscape in which the shore gave roses to the sea and the sea gave crystals to the shore; yea, all that beauty, and pomp, and wealth could give was there to be seen or heard. But the bad morals of the city had shocked the world. In the year 79, on the 4th of August, a black column rose above the adjoining mountain and spread out, Pliny says, as he saw it, like a great pine tree, wider and wider, until it began to rain upon the city, first thin ashes and then pumice stone, and sulphurous fumes scooped, and streams of mud poured through the streets till few people escaped and the city was buried, and some of the inhabitants eighteen hundred years after were found embalmed in the scorix of that awful doom. The Lord called upon volcanic forces to obliterate that profligate city. He touched the hills and they smoked.

An Aqueous Mausoleum.

Nothing but volcanic action can explain what I shall show you at the Dead Sea upon which I looked last December, and of whose waters I took a bitter and stinging taste. Concerning all that region there has been a controversy enough to fill libraries, science saying one thing, revelation saying another thing. But admit volcanic action divinely employed and both testimonies are one and the same. Geology, chemistry, geography, astronomy, ichthyology, ornithology and zoology are coming one by one to confirm the Scriptures. Two leaves of one book are Revelation and Creation and the penmanship is by the same divine hand. Our horseback ride will not be so steep to-day and you can stay on without clinging to the pommel of the saddle, but the scenes amid which we ride shall, if possible, be more thrilling and by the time the horses snuff the sulphurous atmosphere of Lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea, we will be ready to dismount and read from our Bibles about what was done that day by the Lord when He touched the hills and they smoked.

Take a detour and pass along by the rocky fortress of Masada where occurred something more wonderful in the way of desperation than you have ever heard of, unless you have heard of that. Herod built a palace amid these heaps of black and awful rocks which look like a tumbled midnight. A great band of robbers, about one thousand including their families, afterward held the fortress. When the Roman army stormed that steep and the bandits could no longer hold the place, their chieftain, Eleazar, made a powerful speech which persuaded them

To Die Before They were Captured.

First the men kissed their families a loving and tearful good-bye and then put a dagger into their hearts and the women and the children were slain. Then ten men were chosen by lot to slay all the other men, and each man lay down by the dead wife and children and waited for these executioners to do their work. This done, one man of the ten killed the other, nine. Then the survivor committed suicide. Two women and five children had hid themselves and after all was over, came forth to tell of the nine hundred and sixty slaughtered. Great and rugged natural scenery makes the most tremendous natures for good or evil. Great statesmen and great robbers, great orators and great butchers, were nearly all born or reared among mountain precipices. Strong natures are hardly ever born upon the plain. When men have anything greatly good or greatly evil to do, they come down off the rocks.

Pass on from under the shadow of Masada, the scene of concentrated diabolism, and come along where the salt crystals crackle under the horses' hoofs. You are near the most God-forsaken region of all the earth. You to whom the word lake has heretofore suggested those bewitchments of beauty, Luzerne or Cayuga, some great pearl set by a loving God in the bosom of the luxuriant valley, change all your ideas about a lake, and see this sheet of water which the Bible calls the Salt Sea, or Sea of the Plain, and Josephus calls Lake Asphaltites. The muleteers will take care of the horses while we get down to the brink and dip up the liquid mixture in the palm of the hand. The waters are a commingling of brimstone and pitch, and have a six times larger percentage of salt than those of the Atlantic Ocean, the ocean having four per cent of salt, and this lake twenty-six and a quarter per cent. Lake Sir-i-kol of India is the highest lake in the world. This lake, on the banks of which we kneel is the lowest lake. It empties into no sea, among other things, for the simple reason that water cannot run up-hill. It swallows up the river Jordan, and makes no response of thanks, and never reports what it does with the twenty million cubic feet of water annually received from that sacred river. It takes the tree branches and logs floated into it by the Jordan and pitches them on the banks of bitumen to decay there.

The hot springs near its banks by the name of Callirhoe, where King Herod came to bathe off his illnesses, no sooner pour into this sea than they are poisoned. Not a fish-scale swims it. Not an insect walks it. It hates life, and if you attempt to swim there it lifts you by an unnatural buoyancy to the surface, as much as to say, "We want no life here, but death is our preference, death." Those who attempt to wade into this lake, and submerge themselves, come almost maddened, as with the sting of a hundred wasps and hornets, and with lips and eyelids swollen with the strange ablution. The sparkle of its waters is not like the sparkle of beauty on other lakes, but a metallic lustre unto the flash of a sword that would thrust you. The gazelles and the ibexes that live on the hill beside it, and the cranes and wild ducks that fly across—for, contrary to the old belief, they do safely wing their way over it—and the Arab horses you have been riding, though thrice enough, will not drink out of this dreadful mixture. A mist hovers over parts of it almost continually, which though natural evaporation, seems like a wing of doom spread over liquid desolation. It is the rinsings of abomination. It is an aqueous monster coiled among the hills, or creeping with ripples, and stenchful with nauseating malodors.

In these regions once stood

Four Great Cities

of Syria: Sodom, Gomorrah, Adma and Zebon. The Bible says they were destroyed by tempest of fire and brimstone after they had filled up their cup of wickedness. "No, that's absurd," cries some one; "It is evident that this was a region of salt and brimstone, pitch, long before that." And so it was. The Bible says it was a region of sulphur long before the great catastrophe. "Well, now," says some one, wanting to raise a quarrel between science and revelation, "you have no right to say the Cities of the Plain were destroyed by a tempest of fire and sulphur and brimstone, because the region had these characteristics long before these cities were destroyed." Volcanic action, my reply. These cities had been built out very combustible materials. The mortar was bitumen easily ignited, and the walls dripped with pitch, inflammable. They stood on a ridge of hill up and conspicuous, radiant their sins, ostentatious in their debauchery, four hells on earth. One there was a rumbling in the earth and quaking. "What's that?" cry the affrighted inhabitants. "What's that?" The foundations of the earth were giving way. A volcano, who fires had been burning for ages, at God's command burst forth, easily setting everything a-flame, and first lifting these cities high in air, and then dashing them down in chaos fathomless. The fires of that eruption interlarded the dense smoke, and rolled unto the heavens only to descend again. And all the configuration of that country was changed, and where there was a hill there came a valley, and where there had been the pomp of uncleanness came widespread desolation. The red hot spade of volcanic action had shovelled under the cities of the Plain. Before the catastrophe, the Cities stood on the top of the salt and sulphur. At the catastrophe they were under the salt and sulphur. Science right. Revelation right. "He toucheth the hills and they smoke."

No science ever frightened believers in Revelation so much as geology. They feared that the strata of the earth would contradict the Scriptures, and then Moses must go under, as in the Dead Sea instance, so in all cases God's writing on the earth, and God's writing in the Bible are harmonious. The shelves of rock correspond with the shelves of the American Bible Society. Science digs into the earth and finds deep down the remains of plants, so the Bible announces plants first. Science digs down and says, "Marine animals never," and the Bible says, "Marine animals never."

ice digs down and says, "Land animals" and the Bible responds, "Land animals." "Then comes man!" says science. "Then comes man!" responds the Bible. Science into the regions about the Dead Sea, and result of fire, and masses of brimstone, announces a wonderful geological formation. "Oh, yes," says the Bible: "Moses wrote of years ago 'The Lord rained upon Gomerah brimstone and fire the Lord out of heaven,' and David wrote, 'toucheth the hills and they shall be as Sodom and Gomorrah.'" So I will hold our Bibles longer. A man in the room of the House, at Washington, having an appointment with Mr. John at five o'clock in the evening, got up fifteen minutes early, and the servant, who is talking next room, says to the President, sir! "Is anybody with him?" "No, sir; he is reading the Bible. He spends his morning from four to five o'clock, reading the Scriptures."

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S BIBLE STUDY
"Is anybody with him?" "No, sir; he is reading the Bible. He spends his morning from four to five o'clock, reading the Scriptures." The text implies that God controls volcanoes with the full force of His hand, but with the tip of His finger. Etna, Stromboli and Vesuvius fawn at His feet like hounds before their master. These eruptions of the hills do not go to Pluto's realm as the ancients thought, but to the divine dominions. Humboldt counted over a hundred of them, but since then the archipelago has been found to have nine hundred of these great mouthpieces. They are everywhere in every continent and in all latitudes. That earthquake which shook all America about six or seven summers ago, was only the raving and roaring of volcanoes rushing against the sides of their rocky caverns trying to break out. They must come to the surface, but it will be at the Divine call. They seem reserved for the punishment of one kind of sin. The seven cities which they have obliterated were celebrated for their kind of transgression.

Profligacy was the characteristic of the seven cities of ancient times over which they put their smothering wing: Pompeii, Herculaneum, Stabiae, Adma, Zeboim, Sodom and Gomorrah. If our American cities do not show their profligacy, if in high life and low life wickedness does not cease to be a joke and become a crime, if wealthy libertinism continues to find so many doors of domestic life open to the faintest touch, if Russian, and French, and American literature, steeped in prurency, are not get banished from the news-stands and ladies' parlors, God will let loose some of the suppressed monsters of the earth. And these American cities that it will be more terrible for Sodom and Gomorrah in the Day of Judgment, whether that Day of Judgment be in the present century or in the closing century of the earth's continuance. The volcanic fires are already in existence, but in the mercy of God they are chained in the kennels of subterranean fire. Yet let profligacy, whether it enter into a lazaretto or sit on a commercial steamer, whether it laugh in a faded shawl under street gas-light or be wrapped in the finest of silks that foreign loom ever wrought or lapidary ever empearled, know right well that there is a volcano waiting for it, whether in domestic life, or social life, or political life, or in the devastations of the earth from which sprang the cities of the plain. "He toucheth the hills and they shall be as Sodom and Gomorrah."

the dragoman was rejoiced when we had enough of this volcanic region of Palestine, and he gladly tightens the girths for another march, around the horses which are prancing and neighing for departure. We are off for the Jordan, only two hours away. We pass Bedouins whose stern features melt into a smile as we give them the salutation Salaam Aleikoum, "Peace be with you," their smile sometimes leaving us in doubt as to whether it is caused by their gladness to see us or by our poor pronunciation of the Arabic. Oh, they are a strange race those Bedouins: Such a commingling of ruffianism, and honor, of cowardice and courage, of cruelty and kindness! When a band of them came down upon a party in which Miss Whately was travelling and were about to take pocket-books and perhaps life, this lady sitting upon her horse took out her note book and pencil, and began to sketch these brigands, and seeing this composure, the bandits thought it something supernatural and fled. Christian womanliness or manliness is all-conquering. When Martin Luther was told that Duke George would kill him if he went to Leipsic, Luther replied, "I would go to Leipsic if it rained Duke George's nine days."

MISS WHATELY AND BRIGANDS.

Now we come through regions where there are hills cut into the shape of cathedrals, with altar, and column, and arch, and chancel, and pulpit and dome, and architecture of the rocks that I think can hardly just happen so. Perhaps it is because God loves the Church so well, He builds in the solitudes of Yellowstone Park, and Yosemite, and Switzerland, and Palestine, these ecclesiastical piles. And who knows, but that unseen spirits may sometimes worship there? "Dragoman, when shall we see the Jordan?" I ask. All the time we were on the alert, and looking through tamarisk and willows for the greatest river of all the earth. The Mississippi is wider, the Ohio is deeper, the Amazon is longer, the Hudson rolls amid regions more picturesque, the Thames has more splendor on its banks, the Tiber suggests more imperial procession, the Ilyssus has more classic memories, and the Nile feeds greater populations by its irrigation; but the Jordan is the queen of rivers and runs through all the Bible, a silver thread strung like beads with heroisms, and before night we shall meet on its banks Elijah, and Elisha, and David, and Jacob, and Joshua, and John, and Jesus.

At last between two trees I got a glimpse of a river, and said, "What is that?" "The Jordan," was the quick reply. And all along the line which had been lengthened by other pilgrims, some from America, and some from Europe, and some from Asia, the cry was sounded "The Jordan! The Jordan!"

thousands of pilgrims have chanted on its banks and bathed in its waters. Many of them dip a wet gown in the wave and wring it out and carry it home for their own shroud. It is an impetuous stream and rushes on as though it were hastening to tell its story to the ages. Many an explorer has it whelmed, and many a boat has it wrecked. Lieutenant Moineux had copper-bottomed crafts split upon its shelvings. Only one boat, that of Lieutenant Lynch ever lived to sail the whole length of it. At the season when the snows on Lebanon melt, the rage of this stream is like the Conemaugh when Johnstown perished, and the wild beasts that may be near run for the hills, explaining what Jeremiah says: "Behold he shall go up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan." No river so often changes its mind, for it turns and twists, travelling two hundred miles to do that which in a straight line might be done in sixty miles. Among banks now low, now high, now of rocks, now of mud, and now of sand, laving the feet of the terebinths and oleanders, and acacias, and reeds, and pistachios, and silver poplars. This river marries the Dead Sea to Lake Galilee, and did ever so rough a groom take the hand of so fair a bride?

This is the river which parted to let an army of two million Israelites across. Here the skilled Major-General of the Syrian host at the seventh plunge, dropped his leprosy, not only by miraculous cure, but suggesting to all ages that water and plenty of it, has much to do with the sanitary improvement of the world. Here is where some theological students of Elisha's time were cutting trees with which to build a theological seminary, and an axe-head not sufficiently wedged to the handle, flew off into the river and sank, and the young man deplored not so much the loss of the axe-head, as the fact that it was not his own and cried, "Alas! it was borrowed," and the prophet threw a stick into the river and, in defiance of the law of gravitation, the iron axe-head came to the surface and floated like a cork upon the water, and kept floating until the young man caught it. A miracle performed to give one an opportunity to return that which was borrowed, and a rebuke in all ages for those who borrow and never return, their bad habit in this respect so established that it would be a miracle if they did return it. Yea; from the bank of this river

Elijah Took Team of Fire, showing that the element is servant of the good, and that there is no need that a child of God fear anything; for, if the most destructive of all elements, was that day fashioned into a vehicle for a departing saint, nothing can ever hurt you who love and trust the Lord. I am so glad that that chariot of Elijah was not made out of wood, or crystal, or anything ordinarily pleasant, but out of fire, and yet he went up without having so much as to fan himself. When, stepping from amid the foliage of these oleanders and tamarisks on the banks of the Jordan, he put his foot on the red step of the red equipage, and took the red reins of vapor in his hands, and spurred the galloping steeds toward the wide-open gate of heaven, it was a scene forever memorable. So the hottest afflictions of your life may roll you heavenward. So the most burning persecutions, the most fiery troubles, may become uplifting. Only be sure that when you pull on the bits of fire, you drive up toward God, and not down towards the Dead Sea. When Latimer and Ridley died at the stake, they went up in a chariot of fire.

ELIJAH'S RAPTURE.

When my friend P. P. Bliss, the Gospel singer, was consumed with the rail-train that broke through Ashtabula bridge, and then took flame, I said: "Another Elijah gone up in a chariot of fire?"

But this river is a river of baptisms. Christ was here baptized, and John baptized many thousands. Whether on these occasions the candidate for baptism and the officer of religion went into this river, and then, while both were standing the water was dipped in the hand of one and sprinkled upon the forehead of the other, or whether the entire form of the one baptized disappeared for a moment beneath the surface of the flood, I do not now declare. While I cannot think without deep emotion of the fact that my parents held me in infancy, to the baptismal font in the old meeting-house at Somerville, and assumed vows on my behalf, I must tell you now of another mode of baptism observed in the river Jordan, on that afternoon in last December, the particulars of which I now for the first time relate.

It was a scene of unimaginable solemnity. A comrade in our Holy Land journey rode up by my side that day, and told me that a young man, who is now studying for the Gospel ministry, would like to be baptized by me in the river Jordan. I got all the facts I could concerning his earnestness and faith, and through personal examination, made myself confident he was a worthy candidate. There were among our Arab attendants, two robes not unlike those used for American baptistries, and these we obtained. As we were to have a large group of different nationalities present, I dictated to my daughter a few verses, and had copies enough made to allow all to sing. Our dragoman had a man familiar with the river, wade through and across to show the depth, and the swiftness of the stream, and the most appropriate place for the ceremony. Then I read from the Bible the accounts of baptisms in that sacred stream, and implored the presence of the Christ on whose head the dove descended at the Jordan. Then, as the candidate and myself stepped into the waters, (See illustration on first page), the people on the banks sang in full and resounding voice:

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand
And cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.
Oh, the transporting, rapturous scene
That rises to my sight:
Sweet fields arrayed in living green,
And rivers of delight."

By this time we had reached the middle of the river. As the candidate sank under the floods and rose again under a baptism in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, there rushed through our souls a tide of holy emotion such as we shall not probably feel again until we step into the Jordan that divides earth from heaven. Will those waters be deep? Will those tides be strong? No matter, if Jesus steps in with us. Friends on this shore to help us off. Friends on the other shore to see us land. See! They are coming down the hills on the other side to greet us. How well we know their step! How easily we distinguish their voices! From bank to bank we hail them with tears and they hail us with palm branches. They say to us "Is that you, father?" "Is that you, mother?" and we answer by asking, "Is that you, my darling?" How near they seem, and how narrow the stream that divides us!

"Could we but stand where Moses stood
And view the landscape o'er,
Not Jordan's stream nor Death's cold flood — Could fright us from the shore."

THE TENTH FINGER NAIL.

IN a letter to the Missionary Link, Miss H. Caddy relates the following incident: A little girl who used to attend one of my Calcutta schools, was married when she was seven years old, to a man about thirty years of age. A few months after the wedding, she had to go and live at her husband's house, and take up the duties of a wife, even cooking, although such a little girl. I was greatly distressed at losing the child and arranged for her lessons in her husband's house. But after a few visits, her husband put a stop to her studies. We were very much pleased to see how neat and clean the little one kept her one room, and a little place to cook in. She used to be a very irregular attendant at the school, but she was a dear child, always ready to comfort any little one in trouble. About a year ago, her mother brought her home quite ill, and when I saw her I did not recognize her. As soon as she saw me, she burst into tears and called out, "Oh, mother, the Mem has come." She told me that she asked repeatedly for me and would watch as I went past her window, and would say, "Mother, shall I call?" but before she could do so I had passed. I noticed her nails had been allowed to grow, until they were more than half an inch in length. I asked, "What is this for?" and they replied,

"We are going to give them to the idol when she gets well." "God alone can make you well," I said, "and He does not ask you to do this. Cut these off, and trust in Him alone to cure the child." They promised to cut them off, but on the next visit, I found that one had been preserved, and only nine had been cut. Ah! I thought, this is just how it is with many. They believe in Jesus to a certain point, some even to the extent of those nine nails cut away—but that tenth nail! How hard it is to cut that off! To give up their old faith completely! God sees that struggle. He knows just how difficult it is, and He does not despise the faith as small as a grain of mustard seed. And shall we who struggle with self, judge and blame? Rather shall we not work on in patience, and sympathizing love?

AN INDIAN'S GREETING TO MR. MOODY.

TWO years ago, at the missionary meeting at Northfield, Mass., Mr. Moody succeeded in raising $3,000 to establish mission stations among the Indians in Dakota. This year, the Rev. C. W. Shelton, who had the matter in charge, was again at Northfield to give an account of what had been done. In the course of his speech, as reported in the American Missionary, he said: "The first station we established with the money is one hundred and fifty miles northwest of Bismarck, and we have called it the Moody Station. Having found two classes of people thirty miles apart, both of whom seemed to be equally in need, we had been in doubt as to where to plant the station; but finally a man was found whose parentage included both nations, and who was willing and able to preach to both in their own language. We have, therefore, started two stations, calling them both by the same name, and with this man managing them. People have told me that I couldn't do anything in the interior of the country occupied by the Indians, but I found the Indians at that remote place, willing to receive the Gospel. One of the chiefs finally said to me: 'When you go back I want you to take that man by the hand that sent that school and thank him, and tell him that we will try to live like the white man.'" The speaker accordingly took Mr. Moody's hand and thanked him in those words, raising a perfect storm of applause by so doing.

After this speech, Mr. Moody asked for funds to carry on the work, and to establish more stations, and $3,315 was raised in twenty minutes.

A ROMANCE OF THE DESERT.

IN a letter to the Church at Home and Abroad, Dr. H. H. Jessup, the famous missionary in Syria, tells the strange history of a Jewish boy who, he hopes, will become a missionary among the Arabs. He says that twenty-three years ago, a Jew of Baghdad left that city to live in Damascus. He left his family behind him, but after settling in business in Damascus, he sent for them. His wife set out with a caravan taking her children with her, the youngest being an infant whom they had named Ezekiel. In crossing the Djoul Wilderness, they stopped one night near the encampment of the Beni Sukhr, a tribe of Arabs. During the night there was a terrible cyclone. Tents were torn up and the baggage and belongings, of the travellers were scattered in all directions. The Jewish mother found to her dismay that her little infant had been carried away by the cyclone. She searched for him without avail. The people of the caravan also made an organized search, but not finding him, went on their way, and the poor, bereaved mother, had no alternative but to accompany them. It was a sad journey for her, and she never expected to see her child again.

Last July a tall, powerful Arab came to Damascus with a strange story. He said that until recently he supposed himself to be the son of the Emir Mohammed Kasim of the Arab tribe of Beni Sukhr in whose family he had lived from his earliest recollection. He was an accomplished spearman and had been a leader in the Arab raids, having a hundred spearmen under him. It had been discovered, however, that he was a Jew, and when he learned the fact, he began to make inquiries as to how he came to be in the Emir's family. Then he learned that an Arab woman had found him when an infant, half buried in the sand outside the camp, and had taken him to the Emir, who had brought him up as his own son. On learning his nationality, he had sent to the Rabbis of Damascus and at Beyrout, asking if they knew of any Jewish family who had lost a child about twenty years before. At Beyrout the papers were found and the mother easily identified him by a mark on his forearm. His resemblance to his father was also sufficiently striking to convince them.

The parents at once induced him to give up Mohammedanism and worship the God of his fathers; but they were astonished to find that he knew more than they supposed. He repeated the Lord's Prayer perfectly in Arabic. Finally the young man hunted up Dr. Jessup and asked for instruction in the Christian religion. In one of his raids, he had fallen in with some Oriental Christians, who had told him of Christ and taught him the Lord's Prayer. Dr. Jessup has taken him into the American College and believes that he will become a true Christian and eventually a missionary to the Arabs, among whom he spent his childhood and youth.

THE McALL MISSION BOAT.

A REPORT of the success of the new enterprise which the Rev. R. W. McAll has added to the other Gospel agencies, has in operation, in and about the French capital, comes to us in the American McAll Record. On August 6th, a picture appeared in this journal of a boat which Mr. McAll had anchored in the Seine, with the object of attracting sailors and men who get their living on the river. Services have been held on board every day, and it appears that they have been attended not only by the class for which they were designed, but by fashionable people who saw the boat from the bridge, and during the promenades. Mr. McAll says:

"The cabin, which seats two hundred people, was soon filled twice a day, and it became necessary to hold three meetings in the afternoon and one each evening. The people would often sit through all the afternoon meeting for three hours—without leaving their seats. People of both sexes, rooted to the spot. The hungry and thirsty souls are mostly men—of all classes. The other night, between eight and half-past eight, I counted seventy men, thirteen women. One quite young man, with bright face, sat in his place from half-past eight to six, and again he sat from eight to midnight, as it were, by what he was hearing. Anything like steadiness of attention did, of course come all at once. At the first there was a great deal of coming and going, sometimes of staring and laughing; some were amused at the faint, sickly swing of the boat, other vessels passed it. Some found the staid companion ladder ridiculous—"It is only fit for English people," they said. Then some tried to join in the hymns, and sang out of tune, amusing the others. Some come only from curiosity, which being satisfied, they return never to return. In short, the meetings on the boat began exactly as our earlier meetings in 1872 began. If any one wants to sit again, in imagination, at the cradle of the mission, let him come there. The same curiosity, the same criticism, the same bewildered question, the same falling off of wayside hearers, the same wondrous process of selection by which others stay, and return, and listen, and wonder, often receive life for their souls; and how soon of them sing now—with all their hearts!

"The French papers have already given lengthy advertisements for nothing. Advertisements are expensive in France. With very little gold could we have bought a column in half of the Figaro? The truth is that all the French papers have been talking about the Bon Messager."

Delusion About an Heirship—An Anxious Night on a Mountain—A Thrilling Rescue from a Burning Ship—A Bride's Unknown Husband—A Novel Engagement-Ring.

The Claimant of a Peerage and Large Estates France, died in Brooklyn, N. Y., on October 1. He was seventy-three years old, and had spent fifty years in this country. Starting in business as a working carpenter, he became a water-builder, and amassed a considerable fortune. Though a man of remarkable intelligence and business sagacity, he became the dupe of a lawyer who led him to believe that he was the heir of a deceased French noble. The builder advanced money to the lawyer, from time to time, to substantiate his claim, and even paid the expenses of the lawyer to Paris to collect evidence. His family saw that he was being deceived, but could not induce him to abandon his claim. Indeed, the more he was opposed, the more determined he became. He put the prefix of "Baron" to his name on his business cards, and to the last, stoutly insisted on the dignity of his title. It was proved conclusively, in inquiries made by the United States Minister in France, that he was not the heir, but the man died in the firm conviction that he had been defrauded of his rights. All his acquaintances laughed his delusion to scorn, and with good reason; but the world is not always right as to such claims. It often despises humble Christians who will yet prove to be "heirs of God, joint heirs with Christ." (James 2 : 5.)

Ten Months in a Life-Boat have been Passed by its inventor, who desired to furnish convincing proof of the excellence of his invention. Nine years ago Captain Jorgensen conceived the idea that the best kind of life-boat would be one ballasted with water. Ship owners, in America and England, scoffed at the plan, but Captain Jorgensen had faith in it and set to work to build it. He built a boat with his own hands, called it the Storm King, and to prove its utility sent it out in it on a voyage from England to Australia. When ballasted, with Captain Jorgensen and his only companion—a mate—ard, the tiny craft drew but two feet. Anything more perilous than rounding the Cape of Good Hope in such a boat cannot be imagined. And yet, after a journey of three hundred days—a journey of the direst tedium—the Storm King hored safely in the harbor of Adelaide. Three months the Captain and his companion in their frail craft crept slowly down the African coast until they encountered the trade winds. Then came the tempests adjoining the Cape of Good Hope, and finally the gales that roar eastward to the Australian coast. Through all of these the Storm King floated in safety, proving beyond a doubt that the boat could live in the roughest weather. A double proof was furnished by the voyage. Not only did it prove the correctness of the Captain's theory, but the sincerity of his faith in it. That is the kind of proof required of the Christian. He must trust himself to the storm and be ready to face the storms of life and death in His keeping. (James 2 : 18.)

The River of Lost Souls was the Name Originally given to a stream in New Mexico which is now known as the Picketwire. A reporter of a daily journal who is fond of philological studies, has been tracing the origin of the Picketwire's name. He states that it is the form assumed by the French name on English lips. Picketwire is the way the English speaking settlers pronounced La Purgatoire. But that was not the original name. It was simply a free translation of the French of the name given to the river by the early Spanish explorers, which meant the river of lost souls. That appellation arose from a tragedy dating three centuries back. About that time there was a merry party camped on a place where now stands the city of Trinidad. A party of explorers were spending the winter there and with them were a number of people who had come out to the camp from Santa Fe. In the spring the camp was broken up, the explorers going forward on their way to St. Augustin and the Santa Fe people going home. The latter group stood on a knoll and watched the explorers wending their way along the banks of the river until a clump of trees hid them from view. They were never seen afterwards. Whether they were drowned in the river, or were lost in the snow, or were killed by the Indians was never known. No trace of them was ever found after they disappeared behind the trees on the bank of the river, and their friends, associating the river with their fate, named it "the River of Lost Souls." To us the river of death would have deserved the same name if we had received no revelation from God. We lose sight of our friends on its banks, but none of those who have trusted in Christ are lost. We shall go to them, though they will not return to us. (II. Sam. 12 : 23.)

An Anxious Night on a Mountain was Passed by three ladies in Alaska recently. A large party of tourists had made the ascent of Mount Hood, starting at nine in the morning and reaching the summit about three o'clock in the afternoon. After a pleasant hour spent in enjoying the scenery the descent was commenced. The party was not counted until the foot of the mountain was reached. It was then found that three ladies were missing. By that time it was quite dark, but an exploring party was quickly organized, and about thirty men familiar with the ground, carrying lanterns and guns, set out to look for the missing ladies. The search was continued until nearly dawn, when the firing of guns announced that they had been found. They were on the top of a barren rock ten thousand feet above the sea. The ladies said that they had become separated from the party, and wandered about for hours in the hope of finding the road to the base. While doing so they frequently heard the screams of panthers and the howls of wolves. Fearing attack, they sought a place on the top of the rock where they were found. They had no weapon but the iron shod alpenstocks, and the wolves and panthers had been so near them that they expected every moment to be attacked. Happily no attack was made and they were conducted down in safety. Had they closely followed the leader of the party they would have been spared much anxiety and terror, as well as some danger. The same may be said of some Christians who have gone through painful experience. Their suffering has come through failing to keep close to the Master. (John 10 : 27.)

A Novel Engagement Ring is Worn by a young lady in New York. The society man of a daily journal says that his attention was attracted, in a recent fashionable gathering, by a peculiar bracelet on the arm of one of the ladies present. It was of silver, very massive, and beautifully chased. The strangest characteristic of it, however, which mystified him was, that there seemed to be no clasp or joint in it. The problem of how it could be taken off piqued his curiosity, as trivial questions sometimes do, and finally he asked permission to look at it. He expected that the lady would take it off and hand it to him, but, instead of doing so, she extended her arm. A close examination failed to show any joint in the bracelet, so he asked if he might have it in his hand. The lady laughed and shook her head. Then the secret was told. The gentleman, to whom she is engaged to be married, formerly resided in Martinique where he made the acquaintance of an eccentric blacksmith. The man had saved some money and not knowing how to invest it profitably, had been concerned only for its safety. He had bought the massive silver band with it, placed it around his wife's wrist and had welded the two ends firmly together, protecting the woman's arm from the heat necessary to the operation by a piece of leather. The young man offered a high price for the band and the blacksmith sold it to him. The leather was again used, the band heated until it was pliable and it was then cut and opened. When the purchaser became engaged subsequently, the silver band was used, by the aid of a silversmith, as an engagement ring. "I shall never wish to take it off" said the wearer confidently. The remark implied confidence in her lover's fidelity as well as in her own, and we may hope it will be justified by events. The Christian united to his Lord, has a like, and a much surer, ground of confidence because Christ can never change and He keeps those faithful who trust in Him. (Hosea 2 : 19.)

The Story of a Courtship by Proxy is Told by a clergyman who recently passed through New York. He has been chaplain at a dreary station belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company in the bleak northern wilderness. While there, he became intimate with the physician of the station, who is a man of scholarly attainments, and of a social disposition. He found life very dreary before the chaplain went there, as there was no one at the station of similar tastes and congenial disposition. The two spent much of their time together, and a mutual liking grew between them. The chaplain, however, was called to England on family business, and the physician was left to his former isolation. He went on board the steamer to see the last of his friend and bemoaned his loss in pathetic language. "Can I do anything for you in England?" the clergyman asked. "No; there is only one thing I need, and I cannot get that," the physician answered; "If I could go with you and win your daughter's love, I should be happy." The chaplain smiled, but made no answer. Letters passed between the friends after the clergyman reached his destination, and now the doctor is making ready a home for the reception of a wife. So well had the clergyman pleaded his friend's cause, and so much confidence had his daughter in her father's judgment that she is on her way to marry a man, whom she has never seen. Doubtless the clergyman has been the medium through which still more important unions have been effected. Every soul, whom he has been the means of leading to Christ may, like his daughter, say, "Whom having not seen we love." (I. Peter 1 : 8.)

Thirteen Men with their Clothes on Fire were taken off a burning barge, on Lake Huron, on October 20. The barge was laden with a highly inflammable cargo, part of which consisted of barrels of oil. When smoke was seen issuing from one of the hatchways, everyone knew that there was awful danger. The captain called the men to fire quarters, and soon tons of water were pouring down into the hold. While the crew were fighting the fire a storm arose, and some of them had to be called off to keep the vessel's course. The wind and the waves threatened them on the one side, and the fire on the other. Though the decks were frequently swept by heavy seas, which poured down the open hatchways, the fire seemed to burn more fiercely than ever. Nine of the crew lowered a boat and tried to escape, but the waves capsized the boat and the men were drowned. The heat became so overpowering that the remaining thirteen men could work no longer and they climbed into the forepeak out of reach of the flames. Presently they heard an explosion, and then they knew that the fire had reached the oil. A great tongue of flame shot up close to them scorching them fearfully. At that moment, when they had given all up for lost, a voice hailed them out of the smoke that obscured their view. Almost instantly they saw a vessel near by and they sprang into the sea, and were picked up by the crew of the rescuing vessel. So near were they to death that their clothes had caught fire before they jumped. Of course, they would not have waited for such a crisis before making their escape, if a vessel had been near sooner. That was their first opportunity of escape, and they seized it. They did not act as men do who, while aware that they are in danger of eternal death, and knowing that a way of escape is open to them, neglect it in their health and strength intending to take advantage of it when death is near. (Heb. 2 : 3.)

The Opinion of Past Interpreters—What Jonathan Edwards Believed—The Prognostications of Secular Politicians—“The Edinburgh Review”—Society on a Volcano—The Rapidity of Change—The Duty of Christians.

BY REV. J. G. LORIMER.*

INTERPRETERS of prophecy may have imagined from the zeal and liberality of modern times in diffusing the Word of the Lord in all languages, and sending missionaries of the Gospel to all people, that the glory of the latter days was to be ushered in peacefully, and that all opposition was gradually and quietly to expire; but older interpreters held a different opinion, and the aspect of the times indicates a different progress, while the result will be the same; these teach that the Church's glory is to be won through a sea of trouble. This is God's usual procedure with His Church.

Without appealing to other Scripture interpreters, I may refer to one who will not be supposed to be an idle alarmist, taking pleasure in other men's fears; I allude to Jonathan Edwards, one of the most remarkable combinations of intellect and learning and piety of which the Christian Church can boast—at once the philosopher and divine. In his admirable work, The History of Redemption, published in 1773, he has these notices of the

of Christ. “We have all reason to conclude from the Scriptures, that just before this work of God begins [the final overthrow of the visible kingdom of Satan], it will be a very dark time, with respect to the interests of religion in the world. It has been so before those glorious revivals of religion which have been hitherto. It was so when Christ came. It was an exceeding degenerate time among the Jews, and so it was a very dark time before the Reformation. And not only so, but it seems to be foretold in Scripture, that it shall be but a time of little religion when Christ shall come to set up His kingdom in the world.” (Luke 18 : 8.)

After stating how it is that God will bring about this great work, by a wonderful revival and propagation of religion; for before Babylon falls, the Gospel shall be powerfully preached and propagated in the world (Rev. 14 : 6-8), he adds, that this pouring out of the Spirit of God will not effect the overthrow of Satan's visible kingdom till there has been a violent and mighty opposition made, and then he goes on to say: “In this the Scripture is plain, that when Christ is thus gloriously coming forth, and the destruction of Antichrist is ready at hand, and Satan's kingdom begins to totter and appear to be imminently threatened, the powers of the kingdom of darkness will rise up and mightily exert themselves to prevent their kingdom being overthrown; thus after pouring out the sixth vial, which was to dry up the River Euphrates, to prepare the way for the destruction of spiritual Babylon, it is represented in Rev. 16. as though the powers of hell will be mightily alarmed, and should stir up themselves to oppose the kingdom of Christ before the seventh and last vial should be poured out, which shall give them a final and complete overthrow.”

He adds—“We know not particularly in what manner this opposition shall be made. It is represented as a Battle.

It is called the battle of the great day of God Almighty. There will be some way or other a mighty struggle between Satan's kingdom and the Church; and probably in all ways of opposition that can be, and doubtless by external forces, wherein the princes of the world who are on the devil's side shall join hand in hand; for it is said, ‘the kings of the earth are gathered together to battle.’” (Rev. 19 : 19.)

* From his article in this month's Prophetic News a magazine edited by Rev. M. Baxter, which contains other articles on unfilled prophecy. For sale at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents.

Let me add, that no one who remembers what Daniel represents to be the termination of the ten toes of the Image—in other words, the ten kingdoms of Europe—if he follows the Word of God, can have any doubt of the terrible days which await Christendom. The wonder is that so few are realizing them.

Even secular politicians, who cannot be supposed to have had an eye to the prophetic Scriptures, from the contemplation of Europe, the prophetic earth, surveyed merely with the eye of human sagacity, have drawn inferences in perfect harmony with the prospects of prophecy. Thus speaks the Edinburgh Review: “It is impossible to look to the state of the old world, without seeing, or rather feeling, that there is a greater and more than ever before agitated society. In Spain, in France, in Italy, the principles of reform and liberty are visibly arraying themselves for a final struggle with the principles of established abuse, legitimacy, or tyranny, or whatever else it is called by its friends or enemies. Even in England, the more modified elements of the same principles are stirring and heaving around, above and beneath, with unprecedented agitation and terror; and everything betokens an approaching crisis in the great European commonwealth, by the result of which the future character of its government, and the structure and condition of its society will, in all probability, be determined.”

And what is our encouragement, or is there anything to cheer in the prospect? The politicians of the world may be at a loss as to the issue. But Christians, above all students of prophecy, cannot have any doubt of the glorious result, and can scarcely be said to be without light, as to the duration of the previous trials. Whatever may be thought of the duration, whether brief or protracted, the issue is certain and unspeakably glorious; an ample compensation for all preceding tribulation and delay.

It used to be an argument against the inferences of some prophetic interpreters, that their schemes afforded too little time for the great changes, political and religious, which the Word of God evidently contemplated, and that it was not possible that such could revive at this stage of the world's history, as seems to be intimated. But in the absence of better arguments, this should not now greatly perplex us. We have within the last few years beheld changes in the State and in the Church, which no man would have been bold enough to have predicted: and changes too, which are evidently only paving the way to still more extensive change. Who can tell what great events may be crowded into the next twenty-four years—the space of time which is all that many intelligent interpreters of prophecy believe is destined to run—before the sun of the Millennium shall shine forth in its glory?

Let the persecution of the poor Jews in Russia and Turkey, in a form which reminds one of the days of Nebuchadnezzar; the massacre of the Nestorian Christians—the Waldenses of the East, by the Mohammedans: the revival of persecution against Evangelical religion over Europe generally, sometimes by private parties, and sometimes by government; and the keen spirit of hostility which has been awakened in the breasts of so many of the educated and powerful, against men whose only crime is attachment to Divine truth in the forms dear to them and to their fathers,—let these things, and many others, teach serious and thinking men how volcanic is the ground on which Christendom rests. The whole has the air of the winding-up of a dispensation; the speed of the chariot is quickened as it approaches the goal.

Let all Christians then make it their care to study the prophetic Scriptures more and more; and by the study let them be solemnized, and quickened, and comforted, and animated; let them become more prayerful, and more spiritual, and superior to the world.

Let ministers, too, direct the attention of their people more and more to the future prospects of the Church, and prepare them for days of darkness and trial, mingled with encouragement; and as the young and rising generation is probably destined to bear an active part in the great religious revolutions which precede the Millennium, let parents and teachers educate it for this high place and calling.

JESUS BEFORE PILATE.

S. S. LESSON FOR NOV. 9, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 23 : 1-12; GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 23 : 4.

The Appeal to the Civil Power—A New Accusation Made—False Testimony Presented—Christ's Patience Under Unjust Charges—Pilate's Avowal—Jesus Sent to Herod—The Curiosity of the King—Jesus Refuses to Grant—Makes no Defence—Combined to Oppose Christ.

FINDING themselves baffled in all their attempts to bring legitimate accusations against Jesus, the whole multitude of chief priests, and scribes, and elders, “led Him unto Pilate.” The ecclesiastical tribunal had been unequal to the task they had taken in hand. Although they had attempted to satisfy themselves that Jesus had spoken blasphemy, saying “Hereafter shall the Son of Man sit the right hand of the power of God,” yet they should they convince the civil power? On what ground could they prove Him worthy of death? They must find some other and different charge.

“They began to accuse Him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying, that Himself is Christ, a King.” If they could succeed in proving that He was dangerous to the government, then the law would have claim against Him. In order to do this, very men who were the champions of the law of God, the centre of all whose doctrine and teaching was the law given on Sinai, themselves and bore false witness against their neighbor, and that neighbor “the Christ!” Oh, how many sore and heavy hearts there are, how many sleepless nights are passed, how much bitterness of wrong arises from the malicious statements of those whose intention it is to injure Jesus had said, “Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's” (Luke 20 : 25), and this was to uphold and not to subvert the government, yet the notice of these unpriestly priests, undignified elders, untruthful scribes, led them to construe His words to mean what they really had intended to make Him say—that no tribute must be rendered to Cæsar, and they go so far as to make Him say that Cæsar's tribute was due to Him, for was “Christ a King.” It was such, an unpardonable perversion of His words, such intentional misunderstanding that it would have been unspeakably galling to our beloved Lord, if there had been in Him the susceptibility which is touched by this kind of thing.

Jesus was “in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.” He “suffered being tempted” from the strife of tongues, from unjust, untrue, and unkind accusations, that He might be “able to succor them that are tempted.” Many sensitive natures, nothing is so unbearable as to be wrongfully accused, they feel the strain so keenly that it seems as though reason itself would give way under the strain, and only often the most bitter spirit of retaliation, self-justification takes possession of them. If Jesus had not been thus tempted, how could we have recognized in Him the Old Testament portrait “As a lamb before her shearers is dumb, so openeth not His mouth?” But it needs a very real acquaintance with God, an actual, and not a mere doctrinal acquaintance with Him, to be able to “Endure Grief and Suffering Wrongfully.”

The object of the Jewish elders, spiritual and political, was to make out that Jesus was a seditious offender, and so they accused Him of setting Himself as “Christ,” or “an anointed King.” Pilate took up this charge, and asked Him, saying, “Art thou the King of the Jews?”

the lineal descendant from David, there was no other man who could claim to sit on David's throne. Jesus answered, "Thou sayest it." I doubt, His enemies would imagine that this mission on the part of Jesus would be commendatory. But, to their great surprise, Pilate said to them, and to the people,

"I Find no Fault in This Man."

The great men who had led Him to Pilate were their wits' end; if Pilate was to take His part, how would they ever get rid of the Man against whom they had conceived such an intense hatred, because He saw their hollowness, and they felt He knew them through and through? Exasperated, and almost desperate, "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place."

They did not say it, but they left it to be inferred, that the subject matter of the teaching Jesus was His own kingship, and that He was stirring up a dangerous revolution. How different from the life of Him who "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil." (Acts. 10: 28.) How different from His teaching, the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God!

But Pilate, who was favorably impressed with the prisoner, and did not want to condemn Him, sought at any straw to escape the responsibility of deciding on the case of Jesus. When he heard of Galilee, "he asked whether the man were a Galilean." Finding He was, and that "He belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he sent Him to Herod," who happened to be in Jerusalem at that time. And Pilate thought he had done with Jesus. But

No Man Shall Escape thus Lightly.

Every human being who has heard of Him must come to a definite decision about Jesus. Jesus is the deepest personal interest in every man, and every man has an interest for eternity in Jesus. Pilate could not transfer to Herod his responsibility about Jesus. No Roman Catholic ritualist can transfer to his priest the responsibility which the fact of Jesus dying for sin and bearing his sins lays upon him. There is no law of God by which a priest shall represent so many souls of his parishioners at the great day of account. "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that he hath done, whether good or bad." (II. Cor. 5: 10.)

"When Herod saw Jesus, he was exceedingly glad: for he was desirous to see Him of a long season." Why did he not seek Him out in Galilee? Jesus was not to be found among the great ones of the earth, and it would have been infra dig. for Herod to be found among the fisher folk of Galilee. Herod's desire to see Jesus was only a vulgar curiosity: "he had heard many things of Him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him." But the mighty works of Jesus were not done at the command of kings, but by the will of God. Herod, looking at things from a worldly standpoint, might naturally think that Jesus would be only too ready to manifest His miraculous power before such an august personage as he; it would be such a good opportunity for gaining the king's side; surely He would not lose it! The supernatural has always such attraction for human nature. There are many in our own day who expect, when they come to a meeting where God's children believe in the Great Physician as being "the same yesterday, and to-day and forever," that some miracle will be wrought to convince them. But God's works are wrought, not to secure the patronage of man, even though he be a king, but to bring men to a knowledge of Him, as it was with Naaman, who learned that there was "no God in all the earth but in Israel." Herod was disappointed, Jesus was not such as he imagined; he could not understand a man of power failing to recommend himself to the king—it was an order of things and a type of character altogether outside his experience.

But he had yet more to wonder at when "he questioned Him with many words," and Jesus spoke nothing in self-defence. "As a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth." (Isa. 53: 7.) "The chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused Him." Would nothing stir the anger of this meek yet powerful Man? Could He be the same who had commanded the winds and the waves and proved Himself Master of the storm? Could this be the Man who had again and again been perfect Master of a multitude of people, organizing them, seating them, and feeding them by a miracle? Could He be the same who had proved to be death's Master, but so short a time since, and had commanded the very dead to leave his grave, and had been obeyed? What could account for His silence now? The same will of His Father which He did in His works of power was obeyed now in His answering "not a word." "I do always those things which please Him."

Herod, impatient at making so little impression on his unusual Prisoner, joined with his men of war to "set Him at naught," and mock Him, and, in mockery, they clothed Him in a gorgeous robe, as though to laugh to scorn His pretension to be the King of the Jews. But "the Lamb of God" was too true a lamb to retaliate. Jesus came, not to hurt, but to bless.

Herod, having failed, as much as the chief priests had failed, to bring a legitimate charge against Jesus, "sent Him again to Pilate." The two governors had been at enmity, but, in this awful work of condemning the Son of God, they "became friends." Rationalists, ritualists, and worldlings, are always ready to combine in opposing any work which is truly the work of the Spirit of God. All other differences sink into insignificance, but Jesus they will not have—the Son of God must be cast out. A Saviour, who must have the will, the affection, the heart, who interferes with and overturns all which exalts man, this none will suffer but those who are conquered by the Lord and who know the power of His blood.

TWO DAYS IN FLORENCE.

An Illustration of the Sunday School Lesson for Nov. 9.
"Christ Before Pilate and Herod."

THE first day. Far away in sunny Italy and far away in the centuries—nearly four hundred years—the city of Florence had assumed gala costume. Business was put aside, necessary duties were hastily performed, and the people were pouring out of their houses in their best attire; for Florence was celebrating Carnival—the Carnival of October, 1496. It was a different Carnival from any that had gone before it. For many generations, at that season, masqueraders went about the streets playing funny pranks; a huge bonfire blazed in the plaza; there were balls and parties; gaiety, thoughtlessness, frivolity, reigned supreme. A serious face was out of place; old and young joined in the general merriment.

But this year of 1496, Carnival was being kept in a different way. There was rejoicing, but it was the joy of godly men over the better time that had come. There was a bonfire in the great plaza, as in former years, but this time it was the strangest fuel that ever burned. Young men had brought vicious books, lascivious pictures and suggestive statues; elderly men had brought tapestries woven in illustration of lewd scenes from classic lore; women had brought their false hair and their rouge pots and dancing shoes; gamblers had brought cards and dice and even the street vendors had contributed their false weights. A pile of resinous woods formed the core of the heap and on them were flung these tools of vice and dishonesty and vanity. The pyramid was sixty feet high and two hundred and forty feet wide. A wicked old man had offered a high price for the costly heap. It was a pity to have the things given to the flames, he thought, for he shrewdly suspected that the people of Florence would soon return to their old ways and would want to buy these vanities again. But for the time, the Florentines were in earnest and were so indignant at the prediction of the old man that they not only rejected his offer, but made an image of him and set it on the summit of the mound. Then the silver trumpets sounded, the light was applied, and the flame went skyward, while the people shouted for joy and cried, "the kingdom of Jesus forever."

What was the cause of this strange scene? What was it that had moved the gay and frivolous people to abjure sin and pleasure, and make a burnt-offering of their treasures? Look into a church not far from the "Pyramid of Vanities," and the explanation is found. In the pulpit, with pale cheeks and flashing eyes, stands a man preaching to the people, who throng the great edifice till not another man can squeeze in. In thrilling words that go to every heart, he tells them that penances, and masses, and the prayers of dead saints avail nothing, and begs them to put away their sins and turn to Christ who alone can save them. They listen to him with reverence that is almost worship, and they rejoice with him that in future, Florence shall have no king but Christ. They treasure his words and bend before him in profound respect as he leaves the pulpit and passes through their midst to his retreat and then go away to do his bidding. That was a great day in Florence, and the name of Savonarola was on every tongue.

The second day. Florence is again in a state of excitement. It is in May, 1498. The wicked princes are again in power. Wicked and corrupt judges, whom the people, under the influence of Savonarola, had driven from the city, have returned and again occupy the bench. It is their day of triumph, for the man who denounced them, the man who had exposed them and aroused popular indignation against them, is to stand before them in the felon's dock to be tried for his life. Small chance will he have there! One of his followers, one who was himself a preacher, has betrayed him into their hands. It is the bad men of the city who are rejoicing now. Savonarola is powerless, his friends have deserted him, the Pope has ceased to protect him and now declares him a heretic, the people mock at him, bid him pass through the fire if he thinks his God will interfere to save him from the flames; the princes, who dreaded his power two short years before, taunt him with his downfall, and are eager to see the end of him.

Savonarola himself is in spiritual darkness. He cannot understand why God has deserted him, his heart is broken by the failure of all his hopes. He imagined on the day of the burning of "the vanities," that the day of the Lord's reign on earth had come; but the people have gone back to their sins, and he who hoped to have led them in the way of righteousness is, as he well knows, nearing the scaffold. As he stands in the dock there is no charge against him save of acts that he glories in, even the Pope's emissaries cannot prove him a heretic. But there is one fatal crime, the crime of John the Baptist, of condemning sin in high places. Sentence is quickly pronounced, and a throng of men larger even than that which on the day of Carnival, bent to beg his blessing, now gathers in the same city and gives a shout of execration as he is led out to execution. He is hanged by the neck, and his dead body is cast into the fire. The voice of the man who had pleaded for righteousness, godliness, and purity of life, is silenced, and the city turns to its wicked ways.

Men wonder to this day that such a man should have come to such an end. They wonder why the God whom he served did not interfere for his protection. But God's ways are not as our ways. A Being greater by infinitude than Savonarola, had trod that path long before him, had seen a brief triumph, had been betrayed, had stood before unjust judges, had been execrated by the people, and had gone alone to His death. Perhaps in Savonarola's last hour his great heart was supported by the thought that "it is enough for the servant that he be as his Lord."

A GOOD HOME.

UNHAPPY and undisciplined homes are the source of much iniquity. A good home is deathless in its influences. Parents may be gone. The old homestead may be sold and have passed out of the possession of the family. The house itself may be torn down. The meadow brook that ran in front of the house may have changed its course, or have dried up. The long line of old-fashioned sunflowers and the hedges of wild roses may have been graded, and in place thereof are now the beauties of modern gardening. The old poplar tree may have cast down the crown of verdure, and have fallen. You say you would like to go back a little while and see that home, and you go, and oh! how changed it is!

Yet that place will never lose its charm over your soul. That first earthly home will thrill through your everlasting career. The dewdrops that you dashed from the chickweed as you drove the cows afield, thirty years ago; the fireflies that flashed in your father's home on summer nights when the evenings were too short for a candle; the tinged pebbles that you gathered in your apron on the margin of the brook; the berries that you strung into a necklace, and the daisies that you plucked for your hair—all have gone into your sentiments and tastes, and you will never get over them. The trundle-bed where you slept, the chair where you sat, the blue-edged dish out of which you ate, your sister's jumping rope, your brother's ball, your kite, your hoop, your mother's smile, your father's frown—they are all part of the fibre of your immortal nature. The mother of missionary Schwartz threw light on the dusky brow of the savages, to whom he preached long after she was dead.

The mother of Lord Byron pursued him, as with a fiend's fury, into all lands, stretching gloom and death into "Childe Harold" and "Don Juan," and hovering in darkness over the lonely grave at Missolonghi. Rascally and vagabond people, for the most part, come forth from unhappy homes. Parents, harsh and cruel on the one hand, or on the other lenient to perfect looseness, are raising up a generation of vipers. A house in which scolding and fault-finding predominate is blood relation to the gallows and penitentiary. Petulance is a reptile that may crawl up into the family nest and crush it. There are parents who disgust their children even with religion. They scold their little ones for not loving God. They have an infernal manner of hearing the catechism. They go about even in their religious duties in an exasperating way, as though they were possessed of the devil. Their house is full of the warwhoop of contention, and from such scenes, husbands and children dash out into places of dissipation, to find their lost peace, or the peace they never had.

Oh, is there some mother like Hagar leading her Ishmael into the desert to be smitten of the thirst and parched in the sand? In the solemn birth-hour a voice fell straight from the skies into that dwelling, saying: "Take this child and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages." When angels of God at nightfall hover over that dwelling, do they hear the little ones lisp the name of Jesus? Oh, traveller for eternity, with your little ones gathered up under your robes, are you sure you are on the right road, or are you leading them on a dangerous and winding bridal-path, off which their inexperienced feet may slip, and up which comes the howling of the wolf and the sound of loosening ledge and tumbling avalanche?

Blessed the family altar where the children kneel. Blessed the cradle where the Christian mother rocks the Christian child. Blessed the song the little one sings at nightfall, when sleep is closing the eyes and loosening the hand from the toy on the pillow. Blessed the mother's heart whose every throb is a prayer to God for the salvation of her children.

VICTORY.

IN June, 1815, there was a very noble party gathered in a house in St. James's square, London. The Prince Regent was present, and the occasion was made fascinating by music, and banqueting, and by jewels. While a quadrille was being formed, suddenly all the people rushed to the windows. What is the matter? Henry Percy had arrived with the news that Waterloo had been fought, and that England had won the day. The dance was abandoned; the party dispersed; lords, ladies and musicians rushed into the street, and, in fifteen minutes from the first announcement of the good news, the house was emptied of all its guests. O ye who are seated at the banquet of this world, or whirling in its gayeties and frivolities, if you could hear the sweet strains of the Gospel trumpet announcing Christ's victory over sin, and death, and hell, you would rush forth, glad in the eternal deliverance. The Waterloo against sin has been fought, and our Commander-in-chief hath won the day. Oh, the joys of this salvation!

THOSE of us who are in mid-life may well thank God that we have seen so many wondrous things; but my reader may see the twentieth century. Things obscure to us will be plain to you yet. The twentieth century will be as far ahead of the nineteenth as the nineteenth is ahead of the eighteenth, and as you caricature the habits and customs and ignorance of the past, others will caricature this age. Some of you may live to see the shimmering veil between the material and the spiritual world lifted.

Magnetism, a word with which we cover our ignorance, will yet be an explored reality. Electricity, the fiery courses of the sky, the Benjamin Franklin and Bell and Edison have tried to control, will become completely manageable, and locomotion will be swiftened, and the world of practical knowledge thrown in upon the race. Whether we depart in this century or whether we see the open gates of a more wonderful century, we will see these things. It does not make much difference where we stand, but the higher the standpoint the larger the prospect.

BRIEF NOTES.

Pastors of churches are reminded that the week of prayer for young men, and especially for Young Men's Christian Associations, commences on Sunday, November 9. The observance of this annual week of prayer has in past years been followed by a striking outpouring of blessing.

Rev. G. H. Somerset Gardner is holding services at Paterson, N. J. The local journals say that Dr. Crain's church is filled to overflowing with an audience spell-bound by the English clergyman's simple, thrilling eloquence. Though thoroughly English in speech and method, he wins his way at once to the hearts of an American audience. The meetings continue through next week.

Bishop H. C. Riley has been lecturing in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on Mexico, to a large and deeply interested audience. The Late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher took a cordial interest in Bishop Riley's work which is still felt by his church. The Bishop has many friends among our readers who have materially helped him in his up-hill struggle, and who will be glad to hear that he is still pressing forward.

Methodism in New York has suffered a severe loss in the sudden death of Mr. Robert D. Johnson, business manager of the house of Edward Ridley and Sons. He was stricken with paralysis in the very prime of life. He was only thirty-eight years old. He was a remarkable example in his business life of the sagacious, enterprising, energetic business man, living in the love and fear of God—winning the respect of all with whom he came in contact by his consistency of life.

Rev. Charles H. Yatman expects to commence meetings in Brooklyn, N. Y., on November 3. They will probably be held in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association. This week, Mr. Yatman is in Philadelphia. The work he has just concluded at Paterson, N. J., has been greatly blessed. Over seven hundred persons have made profession of faith. Forty churches united in the services. On Sunday, October 19, Mr. Yatman held nine meetings. At one of these a meeting for men only—1300 were present. The sweet and powerful singing of Mrs. Kress, of New York who assists Mr. Yatman, has proved a very valuable aid in the Gospel work.

Rev. Jacob Freshman delivered the first of his lectures on the manners and customs of the Jewish people on Thursday evening of last week, in the Temple Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mr. Freshman wore the dress of a Rabbi, and exhibited specimens of the articles used in Jewish worship, such as the phylacteries, fringes, etc., which are mentioned in the Bible, but are vague terms to many Bible readers. The light shed on the Scriptures by these exhibits, and Mr. Freshman's explanations, was thoroughly appreciated by the large audience. These lectures are doubly valuable because the proceeds are applied to the support and extension of the Christian work Mr. Freshman is carrying on at the Hebrew Christian Church, 17 St. Mark Place, New York, among the Jews of the city.

Contributions to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $44.57. They were from: Paterson, N. J., $1; Eau Claire, Wis., $1; East Pepin, Wis., $1; Quincy, Ill., $1; Carson City, Nev., $1; Sterling, Kan., $1; Albany, N. Y., $1; Aren, Wis., $3; Kansas, $1; East Shelburne, Mass., $2; Walkeville, Mont., $1; Marple, Pa., $1; Troy, N. Y., $1; R. Bank, N. J., $2; A friend, $1; Philadelphia, Pa., $2; Lowell, Mass., $2; Champlain, N. Y., $2; Norwalk, Conn., $1; Lacota, Mich., 50 cents; Fairport, Kan., $2; Brooklyn, N. Y., $1; Bazine, Kan., $3; Kenosha, Wis., $5; Newark, N. J., $1; New Bedford, Mass., $1; Hackensack, N. J., $2; Lyme, Conn., $3. Many colored ministers have written us, asking to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through this fund. It will be a pleasure to add their names to our mailing list as far as our friends send money for the purpose. It is one of the best means of helping the colored race. A dollar given to this fund supplies a colored minister with just the reading he needs for a whole year, and thus is a benefit not only to him, but to the people who listen to his teaching.

e Fatal Disasters Occurred on as many of railroad in different States on Wedy, October 22nd. A southern-bound on the Cincinnati Southern collided with a ajuring eight persons. On the Union Pa-two trains crashed into each other near urdale, Mo., demolishing a sleeper and ing eight persons. Two were killed out-and twenty-six injured by a smash-up bea freight and a passenger train on the as City, Memphis and Burlington Railroad Birmingham, Ala. Collisions also took near New Haven, Conn., on the New Hand Derby Railroad, and on the Illinois al at Carbondale, Ill. Altogether the day black-letter one in railroad history.

erful Storms and Gales have Raged on the and the Atlantic during the week. On Huron, the steam barge Annie Young shore in a small boat, were drowned. When rescuing party arrived, the boat was a mass ne, her cargo of oil having exploded. The in and crew who were afire, were saved eported all along the eastern coast, from been delayed much longer than usual.

Tariff Agitation in Europe is on the In-
e. In France, a Bill has been introduced Chamber of Deputies, providing a maxi-tariff on goods imported from all countries ceding commercial advantages to France, minimum tariff for those that make con-ons. Germany is making an official into ascertain whether goods hitherto im-d from this country cannot be obtained here. In the Austrian Diet, a Bill has been luced placing a prohibitory duty upon cermerican goods. The Havana Chamber of Commerce has made a strong appeal for reciprocity with the United States, and has requested of the Spanish Government, permission to trade on better terms than are now allowed with this country, which they declare to be the regulator of the economic markets of the globe.

With every commercial nation, the tariff is today a burning question. Professor Goldwin Smith, in a letter from Toronto, expresses the opinion that the United States will reverse its recent action on the tariff.

A Race War has Broken Out in New Orleans, as the unfortunate sequel to the killing of Chief of Police Hennessey, by a party of Italians concerned in the pending trial of a suit between the Provenzano and Metrango factions of the Mafia. Nearly fifty Italians have been arrested on suspicion, and, although the police believe they have the murderers, such is the intense feeling against these foreigners among Louisianians that violence is feared. On several occasions during the week a riot seemed imminent in the streets. The police have discovered that the Mafia designed "removing" a number of other police officials who, with the late Chief, were instrumental in ferreting out the criminals in the organization.

The Centennial of Methodism in New England was celebrated in Boston by a series of exercises on the 20th and 21st, in which a great many prominent Methodists took part, the presiding officer being ex-Governor William Claf-lin. Among the leading orators of the occasion were: Revs. J. W. Hamilton, J. H. Twombly, Charles E. Kimball, C. A. Plummer, B. P. Raymond, and George Lansing Taylor. On Wednesday the session was opened by singing the hymn: "Come, humble sinner, in whose Breast," which was sung by Jesse Lee on Boston Common a hundred years ago. The celebration was very largely attended throughout.

A Picturesque and Prominent Figure in Europe, at the present moment, is the Baron de Hirsch, the millionaire banker of Paris, whose splendid philanthropies have made his name known in two continent. Morris de Hirsch de Geruth, whose portrait we give, was born in Bavaria about fifty years ago, his father being a wealthy man of title. The son, at first a cattle merchant, became a banker and was associated with the Goldsmidts and Bischoffscheims, marrying a daughter of the head of the latter branch.
He has been the controlling spirit in many vast railroad enterprises, and probably has done more to develop Austrian resources than any other man in the Empire. To Madame Hirsch rumor attributes the conception of many of the Baron's philanthropic enterprises, which have been carried so successfully forward. He has established industrial schools in Egypt, and European and Asiatic Turkey, and donated $2, 000,000 for instruction in Galicia alone. He offered to Russia $10,000,000 for a like purpose, on condition that the Government should make no race or creed distinction in the schools, but Russia declined, preferring to let millions of its subjects remain in ignorance. The Baron has also provided a fund for the relief of the Russian Jews coming to this country, and to help educate the emigrants. He cherishes the hope of visiting America next year.

A Stirring Rebuke to the Extravagance of the World's Fair Commission has been administered by Secretary Windom of the Treasury Department. He has written to the Commission telling it plainly that the $55,000 in salaries and $150,000 in expenses for the current year, till next June, is so excessive that he withholds his approval. "The amount named by your Commission for salaries is greater than that contemplated by Congress," he writes, and he seriously thinks of returning the Commission's statement for amendment, in the line of reduction. At the rate proposed, there would be a deficit at the end of the year.

Gladstone's Greatest Speech this Season was that delivered on the 21st, at the Edinburgh Corn Exchange. He declared that the Irish policy of the English Tories had won the whole country over to Home Rule. The methods of the government were calculated to provoke the people. Referring to the Tipperary trial of O'Brien and Dillon, he said it was grossly illegal in many ways. Absenteeism he characterized as among the lowest signs of degradation, and one which has now become a constant habit. British taxpayers pay eight million dollars yearly to the Irish police, to simply assist in collecting rents for the absentee landlords. Justice, to Ireland would rid the Empire of "an intolerable nuisance and deep disgrace."

A Brilliant Array of Warriors, Veterans of the army of the Potomac, entertained the Count de Paris at a banquet, in New York City on the 20th, Generals Sherman, Schofield, Averill, Baird, Barlow, Butterfield, Cochrane, Collis, Doubleday, Eckert, MacMahon and Fitz-John Porter being among the hosts. The U. S. Navy too, was prominently represented. The Count, during a speech, recalled many of the leading events of the Civil War, and announced his conviction that the most brilliant and important achievement of that long struggle was the forced march of Sherman through Georgia, far from any base of supplies, and through a country where it was extremely difficult to provide for the needs of a great army. Speeches were made by Gen. Sherman, Admiral Braine, and others.

A Mayor was sent to Jail by a Justice of the Supreme Court, in Long Island City, N. Y., on the 21st inst. Patrick J. Gleason, the official in question, is a giant in stature. Some time ago he found fault with a newspaper writer for cen-suring him in the press, and he took the first opportunity to resent the offence by brutally assaulting the latter. To the mayor's great surprise, he was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $250 and go five days to jail.

THREE ROUNDS OF A LADDER.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Children of God Turning to Him in Trouble—Helped by Meditation—I. Experience—Of Divine Help—Not Indebted to Human Patronage—Nor to Himself—The Believer's Experience—The Help Timely—Continuous—Convincing—II. Expectation—Based on Experience—An Accumulating Argument—A Talk with a Nonagenarian—III. Assurance—Contentment—Joy—An Indian's Incredulity.

"Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice." Psalm 63: 7.

IN their time of trouble the children of God turn to their Father. It is according to their new-born nature to seek Him from whom it came. The believer's heart is like the needle in the compass: you may turn it round with your finger east and west, but when you withdraw the pressure, it will, beyond all doubt, tremble backward towards its pole. With God the regenerate heart is in its proper position. A mystic something draws the new life towards the source from whence it came. We may, alas! by the force of temptation, or by the demands of business, or by an overpowering lethargy, become indifferent to our highest love; but this cannot long continue: we can never rest except in God. The winds of trouble blow the dove of our soul back to the ark. Our heart repents of its wanderings when they bring it into a dry and thirsty land, where no water is. Then we long after divine refreshments, and cannot be quiet until we have them. Then we cry, "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee!"

Thoughts of God are as when a man climbs a hill, looks upon a landscape, and cries out exultingly, "How beautiful is this scenery!" But if you would have

A Figure of Meditation, you must see that man standing on the hill-top a long space of time, and marking the features of the landscape. See, yonder is the spire of a village church! Mark the cottages nestling around it! Such a view is instructive, and abides in the memory. He understands the country best who has seen most of it; and we know the Lord, by His Spirit, far better by quiet meditation than by any other means.

Among our subjects for meditation should be God's gracious dealings with us. David meditated upon his whole life in the light of its connection with God. He remembered the help he had received from Omnipotence. He knew God best by special times of gracious aid. After all, it is not what we read in the Book; but what we feel in the heart which actually gives us our best acquaintance with God. A hundred biographies of other men will not make so much impression upon us as the knowing of God in our own personal experience. If we can say of Him, "Thou hast been my help," we shall meditate upon Him to good purpose.

With this as a preface, I now invite you to the text itself, which is a stanza of David's song unto the Lord. "Because thou hast been my help"—This is experience. "Therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice"—this is expectation, or, viewing it in a still brighter light, "I will rejoice"—this is assurance. Here are three subjects to dwell upon. God help us to climb these three rounds of the ladder of light: experience, expectation, full assurance! If we stop at the top when we get there, it may not be amiss; but if we have to begin again, let us rehearse matters in the same order—more experience, clearer expectation, and fuller assurance.

I. First, the

Experience:

David had experienced divine help. He says, "Thou hast been my help." David did not ascribe his success in life to a powerful patron, for he had none. I have heard men sigh for the bondage of patronage. One has cried, "If I were taken up by some great man, I should succeed in life." David had no patronage; but on the contrary, encountered strong opposition. His brothers pushed him into the rear, and even his father kept him minding the sheep. In after life, Jonathan was his friend, but he was not his patron; for that generous prince always felt that David was his superior. If you have God for your friend, you need not cringe before great men; for you shall joyfully say unto the Lord, "Thou hast been my help."

David's Dependence.

Neither does David ascribe his success in life to himself. There is no doubt that he was a man of genius, cast in a poetic mould; and it is also clear that he was a valiant man, born for deeds of daring and high enterprise. He was also a man of judgment and counsel, and as apt for government in peace as in war. With all his faults, there is no more royal character upon the page of Scripture than David, King of Israel. But he does not sacrifice to his own sword, or magnify his own bow. We read no word of his about his being a self-made man; nay, rather, he sings, "It is God that subdueth the people under me." Brethren, have there not been instances in your lives, in which the Lord has evidently interposed to help you? I can see His hand clearly in places wherein no other help would have been sufficient. If anyone had to sketch my life, he could not do it fully, unless I were, from my own secret thoughts, to supply certain gaps. Without God the believer's life is inexplicable.

I cannot go through all the life of David, but I hope you are familiar with it. In doing his duty as patriot and king, God was his help, and enabled him to walk uprightly in his government. In his sufferings the Lord was his help, and enabled him to be calm and brave. In the time of danger God was his help, and kept him from the hand of the enemy. And now, in this psalm, though David is in the wilderness of Judah, and probably hunted by his own son, yet he sings unto the Lord, "Thou hast been my help." Beloved friends, I do not want you to stop with David any longer. I beg you now, to come nearer home, and Review Your Own Lives.

I cannot, of course, give a sketch of the histories of all here assembled, but many of them will run on this wise:—as a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, your life was a hard fight in the beginning, and many a time you were ready to perish. Perhaps you began very low down in the scale, and when you were about to rise, misfortune dragged you down. Many things were against you, but the Lord was your help. In your own person you have suffered sickness; but when you have tossed upon the bed, in great anguish, God has been your help. You have experienced trial in your family. There are graves in the cemetery which you will never forget; half your heart lies buried beneath the sod. Yet the Lord has been your help. When you hoped by industry to succeed, the times suddenly turned and swept away your gains. It seemed as if you could not prosper. You can say to-day, "I was brought low, and the Lord helped me." You will find that promise true, "Thy bread shall be given thee, and thy waters shall be sure." You joyfully say this day, "O Lord, thou hast been my help."

These helps rendered to David had been very choice ones. He had often been Helped in Special Ways.

God had ever taken great care of him. He was the favorite of Providence, and the darling of heaven. Has it not been so with you? Have you not enjoyed choice morsels of experience? Are there not incidents in your life which you could scarcely tell, lest the hearer should smile at your credulity, and you should be found casting pearls before swine? To some of us most special mercies have been vouchsafed, and we have treasured them as choice things.

Observe also that the Lord has granted us educative mercy. David says, "Because thou hast been my help." He says not, that He has wrought everything for us, but He has set us working also. You see, if you do a thing for a man, it is well; but if you help him to do it, it may be better for him, for thus he learns the way. In the same manner, after we have come to spiritual life, then God helps us. David says, "God hath not left me to myself. He came to my succor, He hath been my help; then, God hath not left out myself; He has been my help, but He hath left something me to do with Him, and by His help." We because He makes us work, and helps us. We bring forth fruit as branches of the vine, but He supplies the sap; so that He says, "From me is thy fruit found." Lord, thou hast been my help: I began with stammering sentences for thee; but thou hast opened my mouth to show forth thy praise. Did you begin with a faint confession of Christ? Now you dare to stand in front of the baptismal font.

I close this first head when I have noticed personal experience of the text: "Because thou hast been my help." Oh, I like that word. An infidel once sneered at a poor woman who said, "How do you know the Bible is true?" She answered, "I have

of it." He replied, "Your experience! That is nothing to me." "No," she said, "that is likely; but it is everything to me." And so it is. My experience may not convince another, but my experience has rooted, grounded, and settled myself. "But," says one, "Surely we are open to conviction?" Yes, I am always open to conviction; but there are some things which no man, nor angel, nor devil, will alter my conviction already formed. Then a few things which we know: I mean those which we have experienced. If we have experienced the truth of them, then we are prepared to argue to the contrary; we are sure and certain, fixed and rooted.

It seems to me that there are two books which a Christian man ought to study: the one is this big Book, the inspired Word of God; the other is the little book of his own life. If the believer lives long enough he will write that little book all that there is in the big Book, only he will change the tense. When the great Book saith, "I will do this and I will do that," we shall find in the little book, "I have done so and so." In my own case the promise has been fulfilled. The little book will be the echo of the inspired volume, the record of the fact that the Lord has done according to His word of promise. Thus experience comes a stay and a strength to the child of God in times of darkness or controversy. I grant that you may go on writing up your personal memoir, and thus confirming the witness of the Spirit! Are not our lives the proof of God's faithfulness? Is not this the substance of them, "Thou hast been my help?"

II. And now, secondly,

Expectation.

David naturally expected that as God had been his help, so He would be his help. I like the word "because" in it followed up by "therefore." The text becomes a syllogistic argument, a sure statement: because such a thing is fact, therefore such a thing must be fact. God, who has helped me, will help us. Experience becomes argument, and the argument carries conviction with it.

What we have experienced of God's goodness is a revelation of Himself: God's action upon Himself in motion. If, then, we have experienced God's power, He is powerful; and we know that anything is possible to Him. We have experienced His acts of faithfulness, and we conclude that He is always faithful, and that He will keep His promise and His covenant, and be true to all those who trust in Him. I suppose I have watched his ways for forty years, and have found Him to be the same yesterday and to-day, then I conclude that He is immutable—the same in my age as in my youth, the same in my adversity as in my prosperity. I infer from the fact that God has been good to me, that He will be the same to me all my life.

This reasoning is good, since you have dealt with an unchanging God. You could reason in that way in reference to man. You say, "I cannot go to my friend Brown for help, for I have been to him already." You argue that you may freely go again because you have already. Far from it. You say, "I have received as much from him as I could reasonably expect; and I must not become a burden to him." Or else it happens that your mind grows weary of you, and answers you, "No, and you feel that you can go no more to him." Earthly friends can be drawn upon so far that their generosity is exhausted, and you feel that you are unreasonable in your requests. If, therefore, you have changeable friends to deal with, there will be no logic in your reasoning; but when you think of Jehovah who gets not tired, then you may infer great things, the severest logic will support you. He is my help, He is my help, and therefore He will be my help, even to the end. It is clear that this is An Accumulating Argument.

A believing young man who has known the twelve months, and experienced a great change, is sure that the Lord is to be believed. But when he has passed twenty, thirty, or forty years of the same experience, assurance will be doubly sure. To a convert in Christ every day teems with promises and mercies. This tree beareth its fruit every month, and the fruit feeds faithfully. Every year is crowned with the goodness of the Lord; and so, in old age the faithfulness of God is a fact which is more argued, but enjoyed. When the bereaved dies, he has nothing to do but to die. He is assured by an argument which has grown from forty years' observation. He knows that the Lord will help him, for He has helped him. He stands by the side of a dear old friend and fellow-helper yesterday. He is in his fifty-second year, and has taken to his bed through weakness. Instead of seeking sympathy or speaking to me in doleful style, pleasantly observed, "You see I am higher in the world than when you came last time, for I left the parlor and came upstairs. Very well, I shall not be higher in the world, but higher than the world." He said this with that twinkling of the eye which I have noticed in the days of his strength when he was full of grace and wit. There was no death to daunt or damp his spirit.

Lastly, and somewhat briefly,

Assurance.

comes the richest cluster which grows from our subject. The Psalmist says, "There is the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice." This is, first, contented assurance. David does say, "I am in trouble, and I must get out somehow; and therefore I must needs sin rather than fall under the hand of the enemy." He is quiet and patient. He does not make demands and demand immediate deliverance; he quietly waits the Lord's time, and rests in the all-covering wings. You hear loud outcries from him, as of one struggling at fate. The children of God, like sheep, dumb before their shearers. David, gratefully past help, holds himself still, and happily waits the purpose of the Lord. He manifests no fear, no fret, no hurry, no worry. Neither does he cast his eyes towards man. You have been my help," saith he; and he waits that way. "My soul, wait thou only upon the Lord, for my expectation is from Him." The best of all is, this is rejoicing assurance. The text does not say, "Because thou hast been helped, therefore in the shadow of thy wings I will trust," but, "in the shadow of thy wings I will rejoice." That is going further than silent submission, or humble trust. David is in the land; but, like the nightingale, he sings in it; he is the child of God, rejoicing in the Lord in the dark. There is no honor to you in rejoicing when everything goes well with you; but your faith credits it if it leads you to rejoice in God. Everything runs counter to your comfort. If I am speaking to some dear brother, who, in business, finds things going very cross, the current of his affairs sets strongly in the wrong direction. Now is the time to show the difference between the joy of the spiritual life and that which merely comes of the natural life. Rejoice in God, and prove that your joy flows from the upper springs, "Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice."

An Indian Tragedy.

In conclusion, let me remark, it is little wonder that so many do not understand trusting in God, for they have never tried it; and answers to prayer, and fulfilment of Divine promises, seem to them as idle tales. If we were to tell them what God has done for us, they would not believe us. Years ago, a red Indian went down to Washington, and when he returned to his tribe he began telling them the wonders he had seen among the pale-faces. At last he told them that he saw a canoe fastened to a great ball rise up into the sky. One of his brother Indians shot him dead with his rifle, and leaping into the middle of the ring declared that such a liar was not fit to live another minute, and, therefore, he had killed him. That statement was quite true, but as it was outside of Indian knowledge the man was shot. So the experience of a Christian is so far removed from the worldling's line of things, that he ridicules it. It is true for all that. Thousands of us can bear testimony to the truth of the Gospel, and we wish, that you would

Try it Yourself.

When you hear that those who trust in the Lord are delivered, I wonder some of you do not want to know our Saviour. Yesterday a poor person called on a brother minister, and asked for a ticket to go to the gentleman who was curing rheumatism. My friend knew nothing about the gentleman. "Oh," she said, "he is at Croydon, and He has been curing people who have been ill for years." Just so; from every quarter people will come where there is hope of being healed. How strange that men will seek help for their bodies, and not for their souls. There is one who can help in every case of soul-sickness, why not go to Him? We have been healed. Why do you doubt? He will be a faithful helper to all those who put their trust in Him. Why do you not seek Him? We are honest people who bear witness of His helping us: why do you not believe us, so far as to try the Lord Jesus for yourselves? If you will not believe us, believe in God's own Book, and say, "I will look to Jesus for help." Oh, that you would trust the precious Jesus and His precious promises, and His precious blood, by that precious faith whose very trials are more precious than gold! Then shall you find every help you need between this spot and glory's gate. The Lord bring you to Jesus at once for His name's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.*

Napoleon's Idea of War.

NAPOLEON was impatiently awaiting the battle which should throw open to him the road to Moscow. September 6, 1812, the sun shone on thousands of helmets, bayonets, and cannon, on the heights of Borodino, and the Emperor, who had bivouacked the previous night on the banks of the Kolockza, had the satisfaction of seeing the Russians in position and determined to fight. . . . He did not sleep; the sudden change of the weather affected him; he was feverish and troubled with a dry cough. Worn out in body and mind, he in vain tried to quench his consuming thirst. One of his aides heard him speaking about the emptiness of war. "What is war?" asked the winner of so many battles. "A barbarous business; its whole art is nothing but being stronger at a given point." Then he added: "A great day is approaching. It will be a terrible battle." And terrible it was to be. Napoleon was to be victorious, but without capturing any cannon, any flags; victorious, but with forty-seven of his generals and thirty-seven of his colonels killed or wounded . . . and the enormous number of 90,000 men—what would be the population of a large city—were to be stretched on the earth, wounded or dead.

Portents of Coming Evil.

At the Kremlin, Napoleon occupied a vast but neatly furnished apartment; he had there his little camp-bed, which he always carried with him to the castles in which he slept in his campaigns. His windows looked out on the Moskowa. Being struck by the vast number of crows and ravens that were cawing about, he said, impatiently: "Heavens! are these birds of evil going to follow me everywhere?" Held fast in the Kremlin by an irresistible force, he became more undecided . . . languid, sitting long over his meals, which formerly were simple and brief, lying down for hours at a time, and, novel in hand, waiting for the conclusion of his own terrible career. "Having reached the height of his own glory, he doubtless foresaw that this first step backward would be the signal of its decay; hence he remained motionless, lingering yet a few moments upon this summit." He would not own it to himself that, like an aeronaut, who had risen to too great a height, he had to descend or die. What was his employment during the last hours of his stay in the City of the Czars? He discussed the merit of the new verses he had received from Paris, and spent three evenings in drawing up the regulations of the Comedie Francaise.

A Faithful Grenadier.

One morning (during the retreat from Moscow) when the dim dawn faintly lit the snowy field, covered with the corpses of men and horses, Napoleon lowered the window of his carriage in which he had spent the night, and called his aide-de-camp, General Narbonne. "What a night, my dear general!" he said. "It was not worse for our sentinels, than it was for me, who spent it in thinking, without closing my eyes. See that they are relieved, and take this to revive you." With these words, the Emperor poured out from a jug heated by an alcohol lamp, into a gold cup, a mixture of boiling coffee and chocolate. The general took the cup, but as he was raising it to his lips, he saw a grenadier of the Guards on sentry duty, whose stern, worn face betrayed his sufferings only overcome by courage. "My man," said he, "drink this, I command you." The Grenadier saluted, took the cup and drained it with one draught; then, as if overcome with remorse, he exclaimed, "General, how cold and hunger affect a man! Ought I to have accepted that from you, when you had it at your own lips? I beg your pardon and, on my word, I am thoroughly ashamed of myself, now that my stomach is warm." And he respectfully handed the gold cup to the Count of Narbonne. "No, no," answered the general, "keep it." Then the grenadier, saluting again, said: "God forbid! I have never taken anything but my rations and my pay, when there have been any." When the general insisted, the grenadier who had set the cup down on the snow, took it up, and broke off a bit as large as a twenty-franc piece. "Since you order me," he said, "I will keep this Napoleon from the gold cup; it shall be my medal; it shall remind me that I had the honor to be on guard behind the Emperor's carriage at this festivity and to be relieved by you."

A Peasant Prefect Dines with Royalty.

The Prefect of Mayence . . . was a former member of the Committee of Public Safety, Jean Bon Saint Andre by name. He was a tireless worker, an admirable administrator and with the bearing and tastes of a peasant of the Danube. After speaking to the courtiers, Jean Bon dined with Napoleon and Marie Louise. The Emperor's brow was dark and he seemed buried in thought. He ate but little . . . Before the dinner, the Emperor had wished to take a little sail on the Rhine to try a boat which the Prince of Nassau had given him. He got into the boat with the Prince of Nassau, M. Jean Bon Saint Andre . . . and his Mameluke, Roustan. Through a field-glass he examined a fine vineyard on the right bank of the Rhine, in the middle of which rose the castle of Biberich. While the Emperor stood at one side of the boat, near the edge, lost in contemplation, Jean Bon Saint Andre said to Count Beugnot: "What a singular thing! The fate of the world hangs on a single kick, more or less." "In heaven's name, hush!" exclaimed Count Beugnot in terror. "Don't distress yourself," the old member of the Convention went on, "resolute men are rare." When the sail was over, the dialogue continued "Do you know that you gave me a real scare?" "Of course I know it. I am surprised that you recovered the use of your legs enough to walk. But you can be sure that we shall lament with tears of blood that this trip to-day was not his last." "You are a madman." "And saving the respect that I owe your Excellency, you are a fool."

His Parting from Marie Louise.

The officers of the National Guard formed in the Hall of Marshals. A few moments later, the Empress entered with Madame de Montesquieu, who held the King of Rome in her arms. Napoleon made his way to the group of officers . . . with a warmth and emotion which deeply moved his hearers, he uttered these solemn words: "Officers of the National Guard, I am starting to take my place at the head of my army. I confide to your protection my wife and my son, on whom so many hopes rest. I owe you this proof of my confidence. I leave in your care what, next to France, is the dearest thing I have in the world. . . . I entrust her to you, gentlemen; I entrust her to the affection of my faithful City of Paris."

His wife was in tears, and feared she would never see him again. She was, in fact, never to see him again, although the enemy's bullets were fated not to kill him.

"THE MOTHER OF THE SALVATION ARMY."

BRIEF mention has already been made in these columns of the death of Mrs. Booth, wife of "General" Booth, the founder and leader of the Salvation Army. The accompanying illustration depicts the scene in the headquarters of the Army in London when her many friends came to look for the last time upon the face they loved so well. It was a most impressive scene. For four days—Oct. 7-10—

The Late Mrs. Booth.

the body lay in the large hall, and each day came a constant stream of visitors, many of whom were moved to tears as they gazed on the placid face. The fact is very significant; for this was a humble woman, the wife of a Methodist preacher, unknown twenty years ago outside a very narrow sphere. What had she done to induce popularity so unprecedented? She had simply helped her husband in an organized effort to preach the Gospel to the poor. There is no other explanation. They who sneer at the impotency of religion must wonder at that scene. Evidently to these people religion is no trivial matter. Their reverence and love for Mrs. Booth was not the result of gifts, for philanthropy was only incidental to her work; all their emotions—

they were deep and sincere—sprang from thought that this woman had taken part in work to which they owed, under God's blessing, the salvation of their souls.

How much Mrs. Booth did to help her husband in planning and executing the movement which has grown to such enormous proportions was not generally known until after her death. That she was always at his side shaping directing operations is now declared, and more than one person familiar with the history of the movement has said that but for her, the Salvation Army could not have become what it is to-day. A prominent journalist remarks: "To extreme shrinking from publicity was added physical weakness. It seems almost incredible to read what she accomplished with such a constitution. To rear eight children is in itself work of a lifetime, but she combined with an infinite amount of labor and private counseling, of which few have an idea. Frequently at a great public meeting she would spend hours laboring with penitents, and then come home to writhe in agony from spasms of heart. Always active, but never giving up, faint but pursuing, she was a brilliant example of faith that laughs at impossibilities, and it shall be done. There was an intense humility about Mrs. Booth. She could smite and sin, but when once he showed signs of turning from his evil ways, no one could be more compassionate or tenderly kind."

The funeral, which took place on Oct. 14, was a scene never before witnessed in London. The entire route from the Thames Embankment, where the Army mustered, to Abney Park Cemetery, where the interment took place, was lined with spectators. Only officers above a certain grade were allowed to join the procession. Many of these came from foreign countries. Every one wore a white band on the sleeve which harmonized well with the words in the announcement of Mrs. Booth's death made by her husband: "She has been promised to glory." The coffin was borne upon a gun-carriage, on which were also placed the deceased's bonnet and Bible. There were fifty bands in line. When the procession had entered the cemetery the gun-carriage was drawn beside the open grave, and the coffin was ved by officers of the army and tenderly ered into the earth. General Booth stood the head of the grave and read the burial rice. Officers of the army from various ts of England, the British colonies, America, ope, and Asia delivered orations.

THE BODHI PAGODA.

Ancient Buddhist Temple of Old Pagan, Burmah.

AMONG the most striking features that arrest traveller's attention, as he passes up the Irrawaddy, in Burmah, are the remarkable is of the ancient Royal City of Pagan. These ist entirely of pagodas, or temples, of all pes and sizes, and in various stages of decay.
y cover an area of twenty square miles.
Burmese say that one cannot walk a yard out treading on a sacred brick. Burmese ndary history puts down the number of pa-as as 3,376,444; but another account gives 9. Whatever be the actual number, the tness of the ruins surprises the visitor.

Pagan was founded, in the ninth century, by g Pyan Bya, who was succeeded by twenthree kings, in regular order, till the teenth century. During the reign of se kings the whole of Burmah was subjued by them. The religion of Buddhism was ly established at Pagan in the th century, and then the buildof the various pagodas began. In thirteenth century Pagan was at the ght of its glory, but the most famous odas—of which Bodhi, depicted the illustration, is one—were built out the middle of the eleventh cen-
y. They are still in excellent repair, are still used for worship; they indeed, considered by Buddhists as y sacred shrines.

Traces of an old wall and moat which rounded the ancient city still exist;
one or two ruined gateways—there still a good many monasteries tling among the shady groves. But city of Pagan is now represented a little village on the river bank, with out two hundred inhabitants, mostly goda slaves. At this village lacquer re is manufactured, with which arly the whole of Burmah is sup-ed. To us in America the name of mah will ever be a hallowed one, ociated as it is with the life and ors of the apostolic missionary, Dr. Adonm Judson.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

MRS. APPLETON had a warm heart of her own. The story of Nora's griefs and troubles, of the sorrows that had darkened her young life, impressed her greatly.

"Come in, dearie," was Widow Appleton's invitation to her youthful visitor one evening, as she led her into the little room, half kitchen and half sitting-room, where she and her son usually spent their evening hours; "Come in, dearie. I was just wishing that you would step round a bit. George has gone to the Institute."
"Institute," quoth Nora. "He seems to go there pretty often now. I'm sure he works hard rough in the day time. He ought to rest when his work's done."

"Why, you see," said the widow, with honest pride in her tone, it's rare and fine, I think, to feel that you are doing something good."

"Yes, no doubt it is," said Nora, emphatically; then she added with a little sigh, "I wish I could do good somewhere to somebody; but it seems to me that I haven't got a mission, except it be to think and think about the past until my heart aches."

"Why, bless you, dear lassie, that's just the trouble. That's the way folks make their own miseries; and that's what makes them leave other folk's miseries unmended and unremov-ed," said the widow. "What do you mean?"

inquired Nora, lifting her dark eyes.

"Why, grieving about the past and dreaming about the future. Past is gone and can't be mended. The future is in God's hands and can't be meddled with. But the present is our own for us to make or mar, just as we've a mind to. Are there not twelve hours of the day in which a man ought to work? And if it's five

"Of all good sense, the best I trow, Is to put to good use 'the golden now.'"

"Then that's where I am wrong," said Nora, with frank thoughtfulness. "I do believe in the past, and it's a land of shadows, except when I try to creep into the future, and that's a land of dark night."

"And the present, sweet Nora, is the land of day, with a plough in the furrow, and a lark's song up in the blue to help the toiler. Put your hand to the plough, lassie, and don't look back nor forward, neither, except just enough to keep the share straight. Thank God, you can look upward all the time."

"But what am I to do, dear Mrs. Appleton?"
inquired Nora, very earnestly.

"Do the next thing, as the old proverb says.
Duty always unrolls itself before our eyes. I think you've had encouragement enough in your conquest of Tabitha Crowle; and if your Uncle Abram is a harder field to plow, try all the harder, and remember, dear, who it is that sends softening showers." When Nora Mansford turned her steps homeward that night she cherished a purpose, and she prayed for the rain.

About a quarter of a mile from Settleworth on the road leading to Towneley Chase, was a small but thickly-wooded plantation. In the centre of the hedge that bounded it by the roadside, was a gate; the purpose of which was not evident at first sight. If the passer-by, led by curiosity, peered through it's close-set, moss-grown lap-overs, he would see that it gave entrance to a shaded lane, hedged with mingled holly and hawthorn, of such curved and sinuous shape as to baffle the eye in its efforts to descrie its termination. What he could see of the pathway was covered with overgrown weeds and tangled grass, this with the unkempt boughs and rusty lock and chain, intimated plainly that it had long lain untrodden and unused.

Should his curiosity lead him to commit trespass he would find that the path led to a singularly picturesque and unsuspected dwelling, locally known as "The Hermitage," a name well-merited, both by reason of its history and position. A long untended garden, rife with bushes, shrubs, and overgrown rose-trees, surrounded it on three sides, as did also a verandah, green with over-prosperous climbers, and redolent at times with the almost overwhelming perfume of the jasmine bloom.

As the signs indicated, "The Hermitage" had for some considerable time been without a tenant. It was a beautiful spot. The old-fashioned, low-roofed house itself was built much in the fashion of a bungalow, and had been fitted up by its original owner in a style in full keeping with its surroundings. It had become thickly covered with ivy, with which its very roof was largely invaded; and for all seeming the quaint chimneys surmounting the equally quaint gables might well have been mere masses of vegetation, so thoroughly were they hidden by the climbers with which the whole building was enveloped. The neat and spacious verandah was the support of, and in its turn was lovingly clasped by, an untold wealth of jasmine, honey-suckle, guelder roses, and the Virginia creeper.

The small but sufficient grounds and garden, by which the Hermitage was surrounded, aided in the completion of as cosy and pleasant a nook as could well be found.

Like many another old-fashioned and solitary homestead, it had the reputation of being haunted. There was a musty tradition to the effect that sad deeds of darkness had been committed there, and that a tell-tale record, in the shape of certain dull, dark stains, was upon the floor, witness of some tragic crime. Strange sights, too, had been seen, and strange noises had been heard by belated passers-by, and by the most daring youngers of Settleworth, who had on rare occasions stolen a fearful peep within its high enclosure.

Shortly after my story commenced, much to the astonishment of the good folk of Settle-worth, a new tenant came to the Hermitage. As was very natural under the circumstances, he became a subject of much more than the usual nine days' wonder. This was doubtless augmented by the fact that the stranger kept himself to himself, neither seeking nor giving confidence. All that was known of him was that he was a tall, fine-looking man, verging towards the fifties; that he was the possessor of a bushy head of iron-grey hair and a flowing beard of the same hue; that from beneath a pair of bushy eyebrows there gleamed a pair of kindly grey eyes; and that his sole companion was a man-servant whose brogue and build proclaimed him every inch an Irishman.

In spite of his undoubtedly favorable appearance, Madame Rumor, as is the wont of the malicious dame, took a turn to his disparagement. He soon became a pirate, a foreign criminal, a plotter, and other disingenuous characters in turn. The most tender and pitiful set him down as one who had become demented by reason of the stress of an uncertain "something on his conscience," which something was no doubt a very dreadful thing indeed. Still it was noted that whenever he did break silence, or in any way come in contact with the townsfolk, he was kind and courteous: and, indeed, in more cases than one or two, certain seasonable gifts of charity, which had mysteriously come to the poor and needy, it was whispered must have come from "The Hermitage," for "who on earth was there in Settleworth who would do such things?" which was not a very high certificate in favor of local benevolence. It is evident that any information that we might get in Settleworth concerning the stranger would be most untrustworthy. We must, therefore, go elsewhere.

In order to do this we must turn aside awhile from England, and make our way across the sea to the Greater Britain at the antipodes.

In the oldest and most prosperous of the Australian colonies, and on one of its largest and most successful farms dwelt Richard Mansford. Long years had intervened since those hard and sorrowful days when, defrauded of his promised wife, he had fled, sad-hearted and self-banished, from his father's hearthstone and from his native land. Time and change, together with a manly independence, great native energy of character, and faith in the over-ruling Providence of God, had healed the wound that had hurt so keenly—all the more keenly that it was dealt by a brother's hand.

He had, what is much too rare, a strong sense of the sacredness of the marriage bond. He felt that only mutual affection ought to warrant anybody's taking such solemn vows. His love was dead, so he argued, dead to him for ever, and so he would not act a lie with any living woman in the world.

It seemed a pity. He prospered in all that he set his hand unto. His flocks of sheep whitened the surrounding hills, his cattle almost equalled in number those of the patriarchal herdsman in the land of Uz; and among the scattered colonists who were his neighbors in every sense but that of contiguity, he had gained both name and fame as an unusually capable farmer and a well-to-do man. His homestead situated at the head of a secluded valley, was an exceedingly pleasant spot, surrounded by tall pines, tree ferns, gum-trees, and other evergreens, whose foliage on plain and hillside gave grateful shelter from the heat of the sun. It was an inviting home, the very place for a home, a wife, a family of happy children, but in his case, as we have seen, this was not to be.

At the time of which I write, that far-off region, in which Richard Mansford resided, was a convict settlement, and the actual location of the convict establishment was much too near to be pleasant. Our English colonist, however, was himself a brave man, with all his wits about him. He had surrounded himself with shepherds, herdsmen, tillers of the soil, of strong build and good character—this latter desideratum not too easy to come by either then or now; and he had the character of being well able to take care of himself and of all that he had a right to call his own.

At times the miserable men, who had "left their country for their country's good," would escape from such ineffective durance as they were consigned to; and being thus outlaws in a double sense, were reckless, fierce, and desperate, a terror to the colonists, a well-founded cause of complaint against the mother-country that it should tranship its refuse to the other side of the world and pour it on their shores. Richard Mansford's chief stockman was a shrewd Scotchman, who having been a kind of bailiff on a large cattle-rearing farm on the broad uplands and mountain moors of Sutherland, was thoroughly experienced, and, Scotchman-like, thoroughly clever in his peculiar walk of life.

Donald McLean was Richard Mansford's strong right hand. He was a tall, sinewy man, with muscles that gave him strong advantage over an obstreperous ram or bull, if once he got what he called "a gude grup 'o the lug." Had the said ram or bullock escaped from his hold, the "lug" must have remained with Donald as the only possible compromise.

Donald's hair had been a violent red, but time and events had paled the "roseate blush" by giving it a frosted look. It was cut exceedingly short, his chief reasons being that it was "sooner combed," and that if ever he and an adversary came to "close groups," grapping there would not do him much damage, nor give his opponent much advantage, "He'd get a neive-fu' o' naething," Donald would say, "like Sandy Skeldum when he fetch'd his fairin'!"

Donald's most constant, indeed, ever constant companions were a couple of remarkable collie dogs and his "mull." The former, he declared, were possessed of "mair than ordinary common-sense," and the latter was "just the ither thing that mak's ony ither gude thing pairfectly satisfactory."

The only additional fact about Donald McLean that calls for present mention, is that he had, in his employer's interest, a profound hatred for the convict establishment near by, and a suspicious and watchful eye on all loafers, bushrangers and prowling aborigines, and never either stayed at home or went abroad without weapons of defence. "They're an ill-faured crew," said Donald on this subject, "and the 'deevil' and the 'dingo' are by comparison weel-bred gentlefolk;" and yet the two sheep-harrying pests referred to were his peculiar abhorrence.

"I say, Maister Mansford," said he one morning to his employer, just as he was about to set out to a stockade on an outlying portion of the farm, "D'ye ken aught o' this clishmaclaver about the gold?"

"Why, what have you heard, Donald?" inquired his master, who had reasons of his own for treating the subject cautiously, for the present, at least.

"Why, Rab Muirfoot, o' Dingo Glen, tells o' gold bein' discovered thereaway, and he says that a chiel out beyond the river, by Kangaroo Fords, has happened on it amang the sand. If its a'true, this neebourhood 'll sune be more lively than pleasant, I'm thinking."

"Well, I have heard something about it, McLean, and I believe it's true. Indeed, I'm not sure that the precious metal is not nearer to ourselves than we imagine. When you come back from Gumtree Hill, I've something for your private ear." The stockman turned his grey eyes upon his employer with a searching glance, and with unusual seriousness, delivered himself of his opinion, an opinion characterized, as usual with him, by religious common-sense.

"Maister, baith you and me are ower weel seasoned, I think, to run flighting after ony will-o'-the-wisps and Jack-o'-lanterns. The 'precious metal,' as you ca' it, can be a precious humbug, and can be a verra lim' o' Satan if the glamour on it tak's possession of the mind. Gold or no gold, stock-farming and land-buying is the way in this country, baith to mak' gold and safe keep it; never forgettin' that when it is gotten it's a parlous sort o' property without something greatly better than gold to keep it company."

"Right, my friend," said Richard, warmly. "Gold and the blessing of God will do very well. The blessing of God without gold will do very well, too; but gold without God's blessing is a bad business, and if it be put in a bag full of holes, the bigger the holes the better for him that holds the purse."

Donald McLean's face lighted up with a gleam of honest satisfaction at these sentiments, and bidding his master "Good morning," he whistled up his collie dogs, regaled himself from his well-replenished mull, and rode off at speed in the direction of Gumtree Hill.

Estey Organs have been sold in the last fifty years.

An enormous number! No other Organ has been so popular. No other Organ has had such a sale.

We want to secure the best conception of 200,000 Organs. We ask some reader of this paper to give us an illustration of the number 200,000 which will show how great it is.

Here is one specimen illustration.

"If the average height of your organs is five feet, and the Eiffel Tower is 1,000 feet high, it would take 1,000 Eiffel Towers, placed on top of each other, to equal the combined height of your organs."

This is a good illustration. Perhaps you can do better. Will you not try?

What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, acting in the glands of the neck, produces slightly lumps or swellings; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; it develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, causing blindness or deafness; which is the cause of pimples, cancerous growths, or many manifestations usually ascribed to "humors." It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the possible features of both. Being the most ancient it is the most general of all diseases or affections for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished often when other medicines have failed, proven itself to be a potent and peculiar remedy for this disease. For all affections of the Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

JOHN 3 : 16.

CAN I tell the wondrous fullness
Of His love, so rich and free ;
Or reckon the priceless value
Of the blood He shed for me ?
Ah, no ! 'tis beyond my telling,
Though its theme I fain would know ;
And my heart it fails to measure
The breadth of the love I owe.

Can I share the bitter anguish,
He bore 'midst the garden's gloom ;
When His soul passed 'neath the shadow
Of the coming judgment's doom ?
Ah, no ! 'tis beyond my sharing,
The weight of my Saviour's woe ;
And my heart it fails to measure
The length of the love I owe.

Can I grasp the mystic meaning
Of the cross with His nail-pierced form :
Where His heart for the sinner's ransom
Was crushed in the judgment storm ?
Ah, no ! 'tis beyond my grasping,
'Tis deeper than thought can go ;
And my heart it fails to measure
The depth of the love I owe.

Can I see with earthly vision,
The walls of my blood-bought home ?
Can I catch the matchless glory
That gleams from its golden dome ?
Ah, no ! 'tis beyond my vision,
Though it shine with fadeless glow ;
And my heart still fails to measure,
The height of the love I owe.

Soon, soon in glorious beauty,
I shall see Him face to face,
And read in the nail and spear marks
The story of saving grace ;
Ah ! then I shall learn the meaning
Of His life-blood's crimson flow ;
I shall measure the wondrous fullness,
I shall know how much I owe.

"I made me great works, I builded me houses, I planted me vineyards, I made me gardens and orchards, and planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits; I made me pools of water to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees." Ecclesiastes 2 : 4-6.

A SPRING morning and before breakfast at Jerusalem: A king with robes snowy white in chariot decked with gold, drawn by eight horses, high-mettled, and housings as brilliant as if scoloped out of that very sunrise, and like the winds for speed, followed by a regiment of archers on horse-back with hand on gilded bow, and arrows with steel points flashing in the sun, clad from head to foot in Tyrian purple, and black hair sprinkled with gold-dust, all dashing down the road, the horses at full run, the reins loose on their necks, and the crack of whips, and the halloo of the reckless cavalcade putting the miles at defiance. Who is it, and what is it? King Solomon taking an outing before breakfast, from Jerusalem, to his gardens, and parks, and orchards, and reservoirs, six miles down the road toward Hebron. What a contrast between that and myself on that very road one morning, last December, going afoot, for our plain vehicle turned back for photographic apparatus forgotten, we on the way to find what is called Solomon's pools, the ancient water-works of Jerusalem, and the gardens of a king nearly three thousand years ago. We cross the aqueduct again and again, and here we are at the three great reservoirs, not ruins of reservoirs, but the reservoirs themselves, that Solomon built three millenniums ago for the purpose of catching the mountain streams, and passing them to Jerusalem to slake the thirst of the city, and also to irrigate the most glorious range of gardens that ever bloomed with all colors, or breathed with all redolence, for Solomon was the greatest horticulturist, the greatest botanist, the greatest ornithologist, the greatest capitalist, and the greatest scientist of his century.

Come over the piles of grey rock, and here we are at the first of the three reservoirs, which are on three great levels, the base of the top reservoir higher than the top of the second, the base of the second reservoir higher than the top of the third, so arranged that the waters gathered from several sources above shall descend from basin to basin, the sediment of the water deposited in each of the three, so that by the time it gets down to the aqueduct which is to take it to Jerusalem, it has had three filterings, and is pure as when the clouds rained it.

Wonderful Specimens of Masonry are the reservoirs. The white cement fastening the blocks of stone together is now just as when the trowels three thousand years ago smoothed the layers. The highest reservoir 380 feet by 229; the second, 423 feet by 160; and the lowest reservoir 589 feet by 169; and deep enough and wide enough, and mighty enough to float an ocean steamer.

On that December morning, we saw the waters rolling down from reservoir to reservoir, and can well understand how in this neighborhood the imperial gardens were one great blossom, and the orchard one great basket of fruit, and that Solomon in his palace, writing the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes, may have been drawing illustrations from what he had seen that very morning in the royal gardens when he alluded to melons, and mandrakes, and apricots, and grapes, and pomegranates, and figs, and spikenard, and cinnamon, and calamus, and camphire, and "apple trees among the trees of the wood," and the almond tree as flourishing, and to myrrh and frankincense, and represented Christ as "gone down into His gardens, and the beds of spices to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies," and to "eyes like fish-pools," and to the voice of the turtle dove as heard in the land. I think it was when Solomon was showing the Queen of Sheba through these gardens, that the Bible says of her: "There remained no more spirit in her." She gave it up.

But all this splendor did not make Solomon happy. One day, after getting back from his morning ride and before the horses had yet been cooled off, and rubbed down by the royal equerry, Solomon wrote the following my text, like a Dirge played after a Grand March, "Behold all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun." In other words, "It don't pay!" Would God that we might all learn the lesson that this world cannot produce happiness! At Marseilles there is a castellated house on high ground crowned with all that grove and garden can do, and the whole place looks out upon as enchanting a landscape as the world holds, water and hill, clasping hands in a perfect bewitchment of scenery, but the owner of that place is totally blind, and to him all this goes for nothing, illustrating the truth, that, whether one be physically or morally blind, brilliancy of surrounding cannot give satisfaction. But tradition says that when the "wise men of the East" were being guided by the star on the way to Bethlehem, they, for a little while, lost sight of that star, and in despair and exhaustion came to a well to drink, when looking down into the well they saw the star reflected in the water, and that cheered them, and they resumed their journey, and I have the notion that though grandeur and pomp of surroundings may not afford peace, at the well of God's consolation, close by, you may find happiness, and the plainest cup at the well of salvation may hold the brightest star that ever shone from the heavens.

Memorable Words,

The Rare Exotics.

Although these Solomonic gardens are in ruins, there are now growing there flowers that are to be found nowhere else in the Holy Land. How do I account for that? Solomon sent out his ships and robbed the gardens of the whole earth for flowers and planted these exotics here, and these particular flowers are direct descendants of the foreign plants he imported. Mr. Meshullam, a Christian Israelite, on the very site of these royal gardens, has in our day, by putting in his own spade, demonstrated that the ground is only waiting for the right call to yield just as much luxuriance and splendor eighteen hundred years after Christ, as it yielded Solomon one thousand years before Christ. So all Palestine is waiting to become the richest scene of horticulture, arboriculture, and agriculture.

Recent travellers in the Holy Land speak of the rocky and stony surface of nearly all Palestine, as an impassable barrier to the future cultivation of the soil. But if they had examined minutely the rocks and stones of the Holy Land, they would find that they are being skele-tonized, and are being melted into the soil being for the most part limestone, they are waiting for that land what the American and English farmer does when at great expense and labor he draws his wagon-load of lime and scatters it on the fields for their enrichment. The great winters, the great mid-summer heat of Palestine, by crumbling up and dissolving the rocks are gradually and Syria to yield a product like the luxuriant Westchester farms of New York, and Lancaster County farms of Pennsylvania, and Somerset County farms of New Jersey, and the magnificent farm fields of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and the opulent orchards of Maryland and California.

THE STAR IN THE EAST.

ism withdraw its idolatries, and pure Christianity build its altars, and the irrigation of which Solomon's pools was only a suggestion will make that land from Dan to Beersheba as fertile, aromatic and resplendent as on the morning when the king rode out to his pleasure grounds in chariot so swift, and followed by many riders so brilliant that it was for speed a hurricane followed by a cyclone.

As I look upon this great aqueduct of Palestine, a wondrous specimen of ancient masonry, about seven feet high, two feet wide, and times tunnelling the solid rock and then running its waters through stoneware pipes, doing its work ten miles before it reaches to those three reservoirs, and then gathering their wealth of refreshment and pouring it to the mighty city of Jerusalem and filling the brazen sea of her temple, and the bath-rooms of her palaces, and the great pools of Solomon and Hezekiah, and Bethesda, I find that the nineteenth century has no monopoly of the world's wonders, and that the conceited age in which we live, had better take in some of the sails of pride when it remembers that it is hard on later ages to get masonry that will last fifty years, to say nothing of the three thousand, at which modern machinery could lift blocks of like some of those standing high up in the towers of Baalbec, and that the art of printing, which for recent ages was practised by the Chinese, fourteen hundred years ago, and that our modern night lightning express railroads were foreseen by the prophet Nahum, when in the Bible he wrote, "The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall jostle one against another in the broadways, they shall seem like torches, shall run like lightnings," and our electric telegraph was foreseen by Job, when in the Bible he wrote, "Canst thou send lightnings that may go and and say unto thee, 'Here we are.' What is that talking by the lightnings, by the electric telegraph! I do not know but that the electric forces now being year by year more thoroughly harnessed may have been employed in ages extinct, and that the lightnings that are now running up and down the sky, have been running at times like lost hounds to find their former masters."

An Aqueduct

Discoveries Foreseen.

Embalment was a more thorough art three thousand years ago than to-day. Dentistry we suppose one of the important arts discovered in recent centuries, is proven four thousand years old by the filled teeth of the mummies in the museums at Cairo, and artificial teeth on gold plates found in the tombs of departed nations, have been taught that Harvey discovered you before sundown of this day, on which we have visited the pools of Solomon, and the gardens of the king.

We are on this December afternoon on the way to the cradle of Him, who called Himself greater than Solomon. We are coming upon the chief cradle of all the world, not lined with satin, but strewn with straw, not sheltered by a palace, but covered by a barn, not presided over by a princess, but hovered over by a peasant girl; yet
a cradle the canopy of which is an-

the lullaby of which is the first Christmas carol ever sung, and from which all the events of the past, and all the events of the future have and must take date as being B.C. or A.D.—before Christ or after Christ.
All eternity past occupied in getting ready for this cradle, and all eternity to come to be employed in celebrating its consequences.

THE MANGER CRADLE.

I said to the tourist companies planning our Oriental journey, "Put us in Bethlehem in December, the place and the month of our Lord's birth," and we had our wish. I am the only man who has ever attempted to tell how Bethlehem looked at the season Jesus was born. Tourists and writers are there in February or March, or April, when the valleys are an embroidered sheet of wild flowers, and anemones and ranunculus are flushed as though from attempting to climb the steep, and lark and bull-finch are flooding the air with bird-orchestra. But I was there in December, a winter month, the barren beach between the two oceans of redolence. I was told I must not go there at that season, told so before I started, told so in Egypt; the books told me so; all travellers that I consulted about it, told me so. But I was determined to see Bethlehem, the same month in which Jesus arrived, and nothing could dissuade me. Was I not right in wanting to know how the Holy Land looked when Jesus came to it? He did not land amid flowers and song.
When the angels chanted on

The Famous Birth-night

all the fields of Palestine were silent. The glowing skies were answered by gray rocks.
As Bethlehem stood against a bleak wintry sky, I climbed up to it, as through a bleak wintry sky, Jesus descended upon it. His way down was from warmth to chill, from bloom to barrenness, from everlasting June to a sterile December. If I were going to Palestine as a botanist, and to study the flora of the land, I would go in March, but I went as a minister of Christ to study Jesus, and so I went in December. I wanted to see how the world's front door looked when the heavenly Stranger entered it.

The town of Bethlehem to my surprise is in the shape of a horse-shoe, the houses extending clear on to the prongs of the horse-shoe. The whole scene more rough and rude than can be imagined. Verily, Christ did not choose a soft, genial place in which to be born. The gate through which our Lord entered this world was a gate of rock, a hard, cold gate, and the gate through which He departed was a swing-gate of sharpened spears. We enter a gloomy church built by Constantine over the place in which Jesus was born. Fifteen lamps burning day and night and from century to century, light our way to the spot which all authorities, Christian and Jew and Mohammedan, agree upon as being the place of our Saviour's birth, and covered by a marble slab, marked by a silver star sent from Vienna, and the words;

"Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary."

But standing there, I thought, though this is the place of the nativity, how different the surroundings of the wintry night in which Jesus came! At that time it was a Khan or a cattlepen. I visited one of these Khans now standing and looking just as in Christ's time. We rode in under the arched entrance and dismounted. We found the building of stone and around an open square without roof. The building is more than two thousand years old.
It is two stories high. In the centre are camels, horses and mules. Caravans halt here for the night or during a long storm. The open square is large enough to accommodate a whole herd of cattle, a flock of sheep, or caravan of camels.
The neighboring Bedouins here find market for their hay, straw and meats. Off from this centre there are twelve rooms for human habitation. The only light is from the door. I went into one of these rooms and found a woman cooking the evening meal. There were six cows in the same room. On a little elevation there was some straw where the people sat and slept when they wished to rest. It was in a room similar to that our Lord was born.

This was the cradle of a king and yet what cradle ever held so much? Civilization! Liberty! Redemption! Your pardon and mine!
Your peace and mine! Your heaven and mine!
Cradle of a universe!

Cradle of a God!

The gardens of Solomon we visited this morning were a type of what all the world will be when this illustrious Personage now born shall have completed His mission. The horses of finest limb, and gayest champ of bit, and sublimest arch of neck that ever brought Solomon down to these adjoining gardens, were but a poor type of the horse upon which this Conqueror, born in the barn shall ride, when, according to apocalyptic vision, all the "armies of Standing here at Bethlehem, do you not see that the most honored thing in all the earth is the cradle? To what else did loosened star ever point? to what else did heaven lower balconies of light filled with chanting immortals? The way the cradle rocks, the world rocks.

God bless the mothers all the world over! The cradles decide the destinies of nations. In ten thousand of them are, this moment, the hands that will yet give benediction of mercy or hurl bolts of doom, the feet that will mount the steeps toward God or descend the blasted way, the lips that will pray or blaspheme. Oh, the cradle! It is more tremendous than the grave.

No. In forums? No. In senatorial halls? No. In counting-houses! No. They are in the cradle. The most tremendous thing in the universe, and next to God is to be a mother. Lord Shaftesbury said, "give me a generation of Christian mothers, and I will change the whole phase of society in twelve months." Oh, the cradle! Forget not the one in which you were rocked. Though old and worn out, that cradle may be standing in attic or barn, forget not the foot that swayed it, the lips that sang over it, the tears that dropped upon it, the faith in God that made way for it.

The Glory of the Cradle.

Dishonor not the cradle, though it may, like the one my sermon celebrates, have been a cradle in a barn, for I think it was a Christian cradle. That was a great cradle in which Martin Luther lay, for from it came forth the reformation of the sixteenth century. That was a great cradle in which Daniel O'Connell lay, for from it came forth an eloquence that will be inspiring while men have eyes to read, or ears to hear. That was a great cradle in which Washington lay, for from it came forth the happy deliverance of a nation. That was a great cradle in which John Howard lay, for from it came forth a mercy that will not cease until the last dungeon gets the Bible, and light, and fresh air. Great cradles in which the John Wesleys, and the John Knoxes, and the John Masons lay, for from them came forth an all-conquering evangelization. But the greatest cradle in which child ever slept or woke, laughed or cried, was the cradle over which Mary bent, and to which the wise men brought frankincense, and upon which the heavens dropped song. Had there been no manger, there had been no cross. Had there been no Bethlehem, there had been no Golgotha. Had there been no Incarnation, there had been no Ascension. Had there been no start, there had been no close.

Standing in the chill khan of a Saviour's humiliation, and seeing what He did for us, I ask what have we done for Him. "There is nothing I can do," says one. As Christmas was approaching the village church, a good woman said to a group of girls in lowly and straitened circumstances: "Let all now do Something for Christ."

After the day was over, the good woman asked the group to tell her what they had done. One said: "I could not do much, for we are very poor, but I had a beautiful flower I had carefully trained in our home, and I thought much of it, and I put that flower on the church altar." And another said: "I could not do much for we are very poor, but I can sing a little, and so I went down to a poor, sick woman in the lane, and sang as well as I could, to cheer her up, a Christmas song." "Well, Helen, what did you do?" She replied: "I could not do much, but I wanted to do something for Christ, and I could think of nothing else to do, and so I went into the church after the people who had been adorning the altar had left, and I scrubbed down the back altar stairs." Beautiful! I warrant that the Christ of that Christmas day gave her as much credit for that earnest act as He may have given to the robed official who, on that day, read for the people, the prayers of a resounding service. Something for Christ!

A plain man passing a fortress saw a Russian soldier on guard in a terribly cold night, and took off his coat, and gave it to the soldier, saying, "I will soon be home and warm, and you will be out here all night." So the soldier wrapped himself in the borrowed coat. The plain man who loaned the coat to the soldier soon after was dying, and in his dream saw Christ, and said to Him: "You have got my coat on." "Yes," said Christ, "this is the one you lent me on that cold night by the fortress. I was naked, and ye clothed me." Something for Christ! By the memories of Bethlehem I adjure you!

In the light of that star
Lie the ages empearled.
That song from afar
Has swept over the world.

THE GOSPEL IN THE DESERT.

MISSIONARY VAN TASSEL'S WORK AMONG THE BEDOUINS OF NORTHERN ARABIA.

The Station at Homs—In a Bedouin Camp—Hospitable Moslems—Oriental Superstitions—The "Jinn" and the "Evil Eye"—Good Sheikh Hamood—The Town-dwelling Arabs—A Great and Promising Field for Christian Effort.

ONE of the most interesting of recent missionary experiences is that communicated to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. S. Van Tassel, who for several years past has been engaged in Christian work in North Arabia, in connection with the North Africa Mission. Mr. Van Tassel, who is now on a visit to this country, was born in New York City in 1857. He was converted at a Gospel service in 1883, and at once began preaching on the streets, in connection with the work of the Gospel Tabernacle of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is pastor. In 1884, he studied in the East London Training School for Home and Foreign Missions, and two years later was sent out to the North Africa Mission to establish a mission among the nomad tribes of Arabia. He remained for a short time in Beyrout and then went to a small village on the Lebanon Mountains, where he spent fifteen months in the study of the Arabic language.

During this time he made several journeys along the borders of the desert, east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, and through the land of Bashan, as far as Damascus, looking for suitable headquarters for the mission. He had ample opportunities for observing the peculiarities of the Arab population. In 1889, he went to the town of Homs, about one hundred and twenty miles north of Damascus, and there he settled. Homs has a population of forty-five thousand, of whom thirty thousand are Moslems and the rest Christians (Greeks, Maronites, and Catholics.) It is a leading trading place for the Arabs at the northern extremity of the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains.

The Ancient Emesa,

At that time there were no missionaries among the wandering Arabs, and Mr. Van Tassel's work was largely that of a pioneer. He had the courage of faith to undertake what many had regarded a hopeless task. The nearest stations were those of Mr. Lethaby and wife, at Kirak (the ancient Kir of Moab), east of the Dead Sea, where there was a school for the children of the town, and the Keith-Falconer Mission at Aden in the South, where the slave children, rescued from the Arab dealers, have been turned over to the Mission by the English Government. The work at first was extremely difficult. A variety of Arabic dialects had to be mastered on the ground, all the previous tuition in that language which Mr. Van Tassel had received in London proving of little value. But he found a hospitable welcome, and many true friends, and under God's blessing, progress soon became apparent.

It was not long before the missionary won the hearts of the Arabs, and made many fast and devoted friends among them.

He was the Peacemaker

in many bitter quarrels, and his gentle influence and kindly ways were known not only to the dwellers in Homs, but to the herdsmen and shepherds of the desert, whose wrangles sometimes led to fighting, and even bloodshed. The "Bedaween" or nomads he found were by far the most interesting class he had to deal with.

"The Bedouins," said Mr. Van Tassel to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "are about 9,000,000 in number. They are pure Arabs and do not intermarry with other nations. They have always been supposed to be Moslems, but are not so in reality. When near towns or cities, they recite the Moslem prayers, and fast; but as soon as they get away in the desert, they throw off this cloak, and neither fast nor pray. Yet they are not without a knowledge of God and their reverence and fear Him. They are very hospitable, and always welcome a stranger, rich or poor, and he can remain with them three days if he wishes. During this time, he is perfectly safe, and every Arab in camp would lay down his life for the guest, if necessary. They are glad to have one come to them who can teach them and teach them. Very few of the Arabs know how to read, although here there you will find a man who has been sufficiently educated to do the business of a sheikh. They are very intelligent, however, and have good memories. I have often heard them repeat the Gospel stories they had heard from my lips."

To succeed with these people, the missionary must travel with them, dwelling in tents and living as they do. They can only work the winter—from October to July,—the summer being very hot in the desert, while the winter is cold, and the spring delightful. In the summer season,

The Whole Desert is Covered With Grass or beautiful flowers, but after May 1st, no rain falls, and everything is parched and dried. The Arabs then camp along the rivers of the Euphrates and Orontes where verdure is abundant. The men are all shepherds and herdsmen and the women and girls do the work of the household. They live on the produce of their flocks and, as a rule, are long-lived, the women particularly so, very many of them living to centenarians. Their lives and habits are precisely the same as they were in the days of the patriarchs. A picture of domestic life and the Bedouins is shown in the illustration on page 716 from a photograph secured by Mr. Van Tassel. The simple ways of these wanderers in strong contrast with the more polished manners of the city Arabs, whose homes are characterized by comfort, and even luxury.

"These children of the desert have many peculiar superstitions," continued Mr. Van Tassel. "One is about the Evil Eye. If a person possessing this eye looks at any person or animal, some harm will surely come of it. They are careful, if they have a beautiful mare, the eye shall not light upon her, and to a mare this they keep the mare blanketed. A mother who thinks her infant is pretty, fears for safety, and she puts on its head a little decorated with wolf's teeth, coins and beads and she sticks a little tuft of feathers on back to divert the eye, and prevent it from looking straight into the child's face."

"Some of them people the desert with spirits, too, do they not?"

"Yes; all the Moslems believe in spirits. Bedouins

Believe in Genii or 'Jinn,' and declare that they have been seen in different forms, sometimes like a flock of sheep, goats, or pecking their heads right up through the camp fire. When they see the whirlwind they believe it is caused by a Jinn. The sheikhs on the tops of the hills west of Homs, which they claim were built by Solomon, believe to be peopled by these spirits.

"Last winter there was a great drought and ten months we had no rain. The cattle died thousands, of starvation. Yet the Bedouins never complained. When I spoke to them of their losses, they only replied: 'Allah is reem,' (the Lord is generous.) Most of them fear God. Speaking of the Gazu thieves, robbers who frequently plunder them, they said: 'If these robbers knew God, and that He would judge them for their sins, they wouldn't do it.' The Gazu are met with south of Damascus. They trouble not only caravans, but villages and the people are in terror of them. They strip and rob; but a Bedouin is very careful about taking life, owing to their system of blood feuds under which every life taken must be avenged."

Every year brings increased encouragement in the good work among these wandering tribes. Lately Mr. Van Tassel made a journey into the desert east of Homs, with part of a large and friendly tribe of Arabs. Hamood Sheikh, gave him many facilities for his Gospel work. It was a journey full of discomfort danger, for the intense cold and the heavy storms (lasting many hours) made it a horrible experience. Scores of dead sheep, camels and donkeys were passed by the sellers.

It is a curious and interesting sight to see "Arabs on the march," said Mr. Van Tassel. The flocks of sheep and goats start first—in the morning. These are followed by camels with their loads of tents, food, furniture, children, sick sheep, lambs, and the old people. The women, with the donkeys, all heavily laden, bring up the rear. The men are clustered about among the flocks and camels. As you can see, the desert is covered with moving flocks, hundreds of camels, mares, donkeys, and people, all moving in one direction, and scores of dogs race about among them.

In the evenings, during the desert march, the Arabs listened intently to the Bible readings and expositions and the story of Christ's life and sacrifice. Any attempt at interruption was promptly checked by Sheik Hamood. The journey was accomplished in safety.

Among the Bedouin women, especially, there

Crying Need of Gospel Influence.

Mr. Van Tassel has hopes that the needs of the long-neglected and semi-savage children of Abraham may attract more attention and elicit a keener sympathy in Christian lands heretofore. One missionary to 9,000,000 is a condition of affairs that leaves opportunity for the widest improvement. These millions are ripe for the Gospel. Mr. Van Tassel has lately been making known, at meetings in New York and elsewhere, the state of the mission field in Arabia and has met with much sin-encouragement. In the city of Homs, his immediate field of labor, there are two boys' schools, one for girls, and a small native Christian church. There are in all about forty Protestant families in the place. Aid is desired to extend the present limited operations and to do this very worthy and energetic mission in the Gospel work in which he is engaged.

INNOCENT SUFFERERS.

Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Nov. 16: "For the transgression of my people was He stricken." Isa. 53: 8.

SOME evangelistic meetings were being held in the neighborhood of a certain college. Among the students who attended the first thing were two intimate friends. One of them—Tom Willifer—did not go to a second meeting. His friend, Walter Burton, continued going, and was led to Christ. The first thing he did to go to his friend and say, "Tom, I want to come to those meetings, again. You'll get it."

"No," said Tom, "I don't care to go. The teacher talks just like our dominion at home. I can't believe in that kind of religion. I believe in doing the best one can and asking God's mercy for what's wrong. This idea of the innocent suffering for the guilty is all wrong. It is repugnant to one's sense of justice. God does not govern the world that way."

"Why look here, Tom," said Walter Burton, "I'm not sure of that. The innocent are always suffering for the guilty, one way or another. More often than not, it's involuntary; but they suffer. When a father does wrong and is sent to prison, his wife and children generally suffer more than he does, though they are innocent. The drunkard's family endure the privations that his sin causes. In a war the real sufferers are not the aggressors, but the peace-loving people whose property is destroyed and whose soldiers, who are often conscripts. Then the doctors say there are hereditary diseases. Many of abstemious men have gout because their fathers and grandfathers were fond of a living. Insanity and other afflictions can be traced to the sins of ancestors."

"Oh yes, you cannot escape cause and effect; that is a very different thing from a man being deliberately punished for sins he did not commit."

"Well, there are cases of that kind, too. It is not so long since the Czar of Russia died a cruel death, though he was the liberator of the serfs, and a kind and considerate ruler who did more than any other Czar for his people. He suffered for the existence of a system introduced by his tyrannical predecessors, which he was trying to moderate. Louis XVI., of France died on the guillotine, though he was known to be an inoffensive, harmless man. The French regarded him as the representative of tyranny, and they killed him and his wife, in spite of his concessions. The sins of their predecessors were visited on them. It's the regular thing and no one is surprised at it."

"Those cases are not quite analogous. Nobody benefited by their death. The preachers argue that Christ's death saves other people from punishment."

"I think we have heard of something of that kind also. You remember that story of the siege of Calais by the English King, Edward III. When the town capitulated, he agreed to spare the people, if six of the best citizens came to him barefoot, with ropes around their necks. Six men volunteered to die to save their fellow-townsmen, and they went into the English camp, and were promptly ordered off to execution. They were not executed, because the English Queen interceded for them, but they expected to be killed, and in those times, their death would have been regarded as a matter of course."

"That story is apocryphal."

"Perhaps so, though we are not sure of that. It was so thoroughly in line with the ways of the time that it has been generally believed. Then there is another case well authenticated. That of the French father in the Reign of Terror, who answered to his son's name when he was called for execution, and did die in his son's place. There is the case of that miner, which Thomas Carlyle personally verified. He and his fellow-workman at the bottom of a shaft knew a fatal explosion must occur in a minute, and when he saw that only one could escape, he sent his companion up, and voluntarily stayed to die, because he was sure of heaven, and the other man was not. Oh, no, the world is not unfamiliar with vicarious suffering."

"But it's a vicious notion. It does not promote a high type of character. If you tell a man he will not go to heaven if he is not good, he tries to be good. If you tell him he can get to heaven because Christ died, he does not trouble about being good."

"Facts are against you, Tom. I cannot explain it and perhaps no one can, but I never wanted to be good so much as since I realized that Christ died for me. Everybody feels the same, when they realize it. It puts heart in one. Before, it seemed hopeless to try; one failed so often. Now, I struggle harder, and with confidence. When you see what suffering your sin caused your Saviour, you hate it more than when you think it will entail suffering on you. You remember that story of Adam Bede? The blow that crushed the wrongdoer, and made him miserable was the one that fell on his victim. The most bitter drop in his cup was that another was suffering for his sin, while he was free; and any man of spirit would feel that way. The Christian doctrine is not so unphilosophical as you imagine. Try it and you will find it sound. It works; and the proofs are all around you. The best men, the kindest men, the men of pure life, who are doing the most good in the world, supporting widows, and clothing and teaching the fatherless, and aiding by gifts and personal labor in every beneficent work, are men who are trusting in Christ's sacrifice for salvation."

"Well, I'll come to your meeting. There is sense in what you say."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Bird's Appeal for Protection Surprised the crew of a ship on the East River New York, on October 29. Early that morning as a steamer was proceeding up the river on its way to the fishing banks, the crew became interested in watching the movements of a large hawk, which, for some months past has made its home on one of the towers of the Brooklyn Bridge. The hawk was chasing a beautiful pinkish white pigeon which was flying about fifty feet above the water. Suddenly the hawk made a swoop and tried to seize the pigeon. It did not quite succeed, but feathers flew out of the pigeon's left wing showing where the hawk had struck it. The pigeon dropped lower and the hawk followed. Then the pigeon made straight for the steamer, and alighted on the shoulder of a sailor. The man put up his hand and caught it. The bird was trembling and fluttering but seemed content to remain, and the man fed it and took it with him on the voyage. Ordinarily the timid bird would have regarded the man as its enemy and have avoided him; but to escape the hawk it was glad to take refuge with the man. It is so frequently in the spiritual life. Trouble and danger drive men to seek refuge in Christ, though in peace and prosperity they shunned Him. (Psa. 119: 67.)

The Hard Lot of an Aged Lady is Described in a press dispatch from a town in Connecticut. It states that the attention of the local authorities was recently called to a case of destitution in a suburb of the town. When they went to investigate the case, they were surprised to find the address given them was that of a nicely furnished villa residence. The sufferer was an aged lady, who was dying of starvation, and neglect. A year ago, she was the owner of the house and of an estate valued at $20,000. Her niece, who was then living with her, coaxed the old lady to give her all the property, and had promised to care for her as long as she lived. As soon as the deeds were signed, the niece's behavior changed, and she cruelly neglected her aunt. The old lady could get neither money nor food from her niece. She had begged from the neighbors as long as she could get around, but of late she had been too weak to leave her bed, and was almost dead from want. The gross ingratitude of the niece in so cruelly treating the woman, to whose bounty she owed everything, has, it appears, stirred the indignation of the neighbors. And no wonder! But have we not heard of still more disgraceful ingratitude? Men for whom Christ laid down His life, who expect to have an eternal mansion through Him often refuse to give money to extend His kingdom on earth. (Philemon 19.)

A Farmer Made a Startling Discovery in Canada on October 28. Some years ago the wife of a farmer living near St. Laurent became demented and was sent to the Longue Point Asylum for the Insane. That asylum was burned last May and some of the patients were burned to death while others escaped. It was believed that all the latter were recaptured. As his wife was not among them, the farmer concluded that she must have been one of the victims of the fire. On October 28 the farmer was taking a wagon load of produce to market when he saw a woman lying beside the road. He roused her and asked her what she was doing there. She said she was hunting for the road to St. Laurent and had travelled for many weeks, mentioning places she had visited in Lower Quebec two hundred and nine miles from Montreal. The farmer asked her to get into his wagon and he would drive her to a hotel further on. As she stepped into the wagon he recognized his wife whom he supposed to be dead. He took her home at once and called in a physician. It is believed now that when she recovers from her fatigue and exposure, her mind will be fully restored. Something like this is the history of some Christians. When, "coming to themselves," they fled from a doomed world, they vainly sought the way to their heavenly home, and were found in their wandering by Him to whom they are espoused. (Psa. 107: 2-7.)

THE COMING ANTICHRIST.

HIS IDENTITY, DESCRIPTION IN PROPHECY AND HIS COVENANT WITH THE JEWS.

The Apocalyptic Vision of the Beast—The Holy Roman Empire—Succession of Emperors from Cæsar to Napoleon—The Deadly Wound—To be Healed—The Jews to be Restored—The Demand of their Restorer.

BY REV. ISAAC S. HENRY.

WE are soon to arrive at that epoch in history when some startling disclosures and most vivid fulfilments of prophecy may be looked for.

As a "Leopard," the wild beast with seven heads and ten horns was seen by John "rising up out of the sea" (the sea of revolution; waters in prophecy always having reference to peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. See Rev. 17: 15). It had seven heads, representing the seven different forms of government through which it must pass before it could pass out of existence; and we find in Rev. 17: 11, that five of them had already fallen when St. John saw the vision. The sixth head, or Roman emperorship, took its rise B. C. 28, and continued in an unbroken line of succession, either in the eastern or western Roman Empire to A. D. 1805, when Napoleon Bonaparte at the confederation of the Rhine, leagued with the German princes, made war against Francis II., Emperor of Germany—who then held the reigns of government—and who, being overpowered, united with the other princes in signing over by a regular written compact their right and title to the Holy Roman Empire, in these words: "Considering the bonds which unite us, by the confederation of the Rhine, we renounce the imperial crown," etc. (See Sir A. Alison's History of Europe, chap. 42.) Thus ended the sixth governmental headship, of which the angel declares that "Five are fallen, and one is and the other is not yet come, and when He cometh, he must continue a short space."

The Empire is Dissolved

Napoleon was crowned at Milan with the iron crown of Charlemagne (the crown of the emperors), King of Italy and of Rome, on May 26, A. D. 1805; thereby taking to himself a new official title, and thus bringing him in as the seventh head, which according to the affirmation of the angel, (Rev. 17: 10,) must continue "a short space."

This seventh head was seen by John (chap. 13: 3) to have been "as it were, wounded to death." Napoleon Bonaparte did continue only a short space, and the great Empire, under him, did receive a deadly wound at the battle of Waterloo. The headless state of the Roman Empire since 1815, defines beyond a doubt the fact that Napoleon I. was the seventh head that received a deadly wound.

But this deadly wound must be healed, that thereby all the world may wonder after the beast. And by whom is it to be healed but by the man of sin? The prophets of the Old and New Testaments concur in showing that the closing scenes of this dispensation will be at a time of great trouble—a time of leagues and intrigues, which will culminate in the manifestation of the man of sin, "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders; and with all deceivableness and unrighteousness in them that perish." In reference to this man of sin, it is said (Daniel 8, 23-25.) "And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and holy people; and through his policy also he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many; he shall also stand up against the prince of princes, but he shall be broken without hand."

The Last Personal Antichrist,

The term "but not by his own power" is explained (Rev. 13: 3) by the fact that "the dragon gave him his power, his seat, and his great authority."

It is distinctly shown concerning the beast that was, and is not, that it is the one to heal the deadly wound, thus: "And there are seven kings; five are fallen, and one is and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space," etc. (Rev. 17: 10.) The seven heads, therefore, represent seven forms of government through which the Roman empire must pass from its first rise to the end of its career. The five which had fallen when St. John saw the vision are these: Kings, Consuls, Dictators, Decemvirs, and Military Tribunes. The affirmation that five are fallen, renders it unnecessary to discuss the subject of these fallen ones. But when the angel declared that "one is," it becomes necessary that we understand what that one was.

The Roman emperorship took its rise B. C. 28, Augustus Cæsar was the first emperor. This head continued in an unbroken line of representatives, either in eastern or western Rome, and sometimes admitting of two reigning at once in accordance with the Roman law, until Napoleon Bonaparte arose, as has already been shown. The prophecy continues (V. 11.) "And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition." "Seeing that it goeth into perdition there can be no other after him, for its going into perdition refers to its Last Head, Napoleon, who then represents it, being cast alive with the false prophet into a lake of fire at the descent of Christ (Rev. 19: 20.) Thus it does appear that another Imperial Napoleon must appear upon the stage of political action.

In addition to the passages of Scripture which have already been quoted, to show that deception will be the mainspring of action that is to elevate the man of sin to so lofty a position of earthly power and grandeur as no mortal has ever yet attained, attention is specially called to Daniel 9: 23: "And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully: for he shall become strong with a small people."

The Return of the Jews

to Judea is in close connection with the above event, and the prey, and "spoil, and riches spoken of, must result from the covenant that he is to enter into with the Jews, for he does not gain by conquest, but he enters peaceably upon the fattest places of the province.

It is very evident that the Jews are now beginning to return to the land of their fathers. A movement is on foot in Europe, having for its object the restoration of the Jews as a nation. It has the patronage of many influential men.

The Coming Napoleon will favor the schemes about the Jews, and show partiality to them, which will result (according to prophecy) in his confirming a covenant with many of them for one week (seven years). This covenant is termed (Dan. 11: 28-30), "the Holy Covenant;" from which it is evident that he will engage to protect them against their enemies, and uphold them in their religious worship, and for which in their turn they will make him large advances of money, by which he will again ingratiate himself into favor; scattering it among his subjects, he will enter peaceably upon the fattest places of the provinces (according to Daniel 11: 21-45).

But the Jews are doomed to disappointment. Having rejected the Messiah they are now to receive a mere man—"the man of sin." "If another shall come in his own name him ye will receive." And they are to receive a terrible scourging under him, for in the midst of the covenant week he breaks his covenant, puts down their renewed sacrifices, and sets up the abomination, which will be his own image (See Dan. 11: 28-39; Rev. 13: 14-15).

All the prophets say more or less concerning this time of great trouble: Zechariah gives a graphic account of it down to the time of the Lord setting His feet upon the Mount of Olives, for the destruction of the hosts of Antichrist. In Zech. 14: 4, 5, it is shown that the Lord shall set His feet on that day upon the Mount of Olives, that the Mount shall cleave asunder become a very great and mighty valley. And concludes those verses by saying, "And Lord my God shall come, and all the sa with thee." When the covenant is signed, the descent of Christ on this earth can be determined almost to a day, because it will be at end of the stipulated seven years of the Covenant Week.

JESUS CONDEMNED.

S. S. LESSON FOR NOV. 16, BY MRS. M. BAXTER. LUKE 23: 13-25; GOLDEN TEXT, ISAIAH 53: 1.

Pilate's Dilemma—A Stultifying Proposal—No Compromise Possible on the Claims of Jesus—The Trial Before Pilate—What Acquitting Jesus Would Cost—The Death of Jesus Necessary to the World's Redemption—Death not Development the Hope of Race—Pilate's Choice—His Ineffectual Washing.

WE might our beloved Lord ask, in prophecy, "Who is he that shall condemn me?" (Isaiah 50: 9.) Annas Caiaphas, who, as representatives of the spiritual power and authority, had sat in judgment on Him, had signally failed;—Jesus had passed under their judgment, and remained yet undemned. Herod the king had done his best but with no better success. From the second tribunal, as from the first, Jesus returned condemned. And Pilate, the representative of the supreme power, that of Rome, to which He had thought to rid himself of the dreadful responsibility of condemning a man whom he knew to be innocent, and whom the Jewish rulers had delivered up from no higher motive than their sinful personal jealousy. But a man's own wisdom cannot deliver him at a crisis hour like this. It is an awful thing for a man to trifle with his conscience, and sin against his own soul. Pilate called together the priests and the rulers of the people, and unto them, "Ye have brought unto me this man, as one that perverteth the people; and behold I having examined Him before you, found touching these things whereof ye accuse Him, no, nor yet Herod: for he sent Him back unto us, and behold, nothing worthy of death hath been done by him." (R. V.) He "did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth." (1. Peter 2: 22.) It was a hard task which fell to Pilate's lot when he undertook to substantiate a charge against the Son of God. He was dealing with the man in all the world "who knew no sin," (Cor. 5: 21,) who "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." (Heb. 4: 15.) No wonder he shrank from the task as utterly hopeless, and said, "I have found no fault in Him." But Pilate feared the people, and feared to condemn an innocent man. It was a awful crisis for him. He must choose between his popularity and his prestige among the Jewish priests and elders, and that despised and rejected man, whose wondrous life and miracles, and whose lamb-like spirit, answering a word, made an irrepressible appeal even to his heathen heart and conscience.

He would make a compromise; "I will therefore chastise Him, and release Him." Chastise a man in whom no fault could be found? Why? Only to appease the people! And then he would release Him to satisfy his own conscience! But the manner of solving the difficulties did not answer. The rulers were bent upon the death of Him who had ever given life and healing to others—nothing less would appease them. Whenever a question arises in any human life or life between Jesus and another, no half measures can be resorted to. It must be Jesus or the world, Jesus or our will, Jesus or our actions, Jesus or our plans, Jesus or our own life. The death sentence must go out on one or the other—the life of the one is death to the other. The life of Jesus,

"Eternal Life,"

(1. John 1: 1, 2,) excludes all other life, it can only live where the life of the world, the flesh, and self die before it. Jesus must be condemned everything but Jesus. If Pilate took part, he would be misunderstood by priests and rulers; Herod, whose friendship he had secured, would turn against him; he would value him upon the earth. The cost was too great for him, he shrank back. He brought up to the same point, counted it the while to suffer "the loss of all," and "count them but dung" that he might "win Christ," and though it meant fellowship with His sufferings, and conformity to death, the apostle of the Gentiles counted it the while. He had weighed all else against life—the world and all its advantages, ease and all its claims, all honors, ease, power, comfort, and had deliberately made his choice; "To me to live is Christ," and life had become his centre and no other meaning for him. He was but an instrument, to be used or ruled by God. But Jesus must be condemned. Of His own will, He took on Him the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8: 3); He became "the Man," including in Himself the nature of mankind. He must Himself execute His own teaching, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that shall lose his life in this world, shall keep it unto eternal life" (John 12: 24, 25). He was the Man who was ready to "make up the fence, and fill in the gap" before God for His people, for His land. (Ezek. 22: 30.) He took not the spirit of man, but "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1: 14), and in Him the sentence must be executed.

"All Flesh is Grass, and the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field." Even He could not remedy that; it must fade, it must die. Only through death could even Jesus Himself "destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil." (1 John 3: 8.) There was no other way. That is eternal life which flourishes on the earth of the flesh. We are called, not to be men of improved humanity, but in the deep senses, "children of the resurrection." (1 Cor. 15: 20: 36.) Oh, when we see, that through the man, even the sinless flesh of Jesus must be condemned and die. Oh how much more must the life of the flesh in us, fade and die, and be "always delivered unto death," for Jesus' sake that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh." (11 Cor. 4: 11.) Jesus was condemned by another tribunal, that of Caiaphas, of Herod, or of Pilate. The end of all flesh is come before Me" (Gen. 2: 17) was the judgment sentence of our God, before the flood, and it has never been re-not in the improvement of what we are, the development of our natural powers, talents or virtues, that God is glorified, but in the giving up of all fleshly power or advantage, as our failure that we can by His blood obtain eternal life. But yielded, emptied, dead to it, God can use natural power and advantages for the sake of subjection to Him. It was thus with Paul of Tarsus, when he died to his aristocratic Jewish parentage, to his influence with the high priest, to his theological education, to his position in society, and took his place as the servant of One who passed among men as a condemned criminal. Paul hated all that went to make up his life in this world, because he sought the glory and the grandeur of the eternal which is in God's Son.

Pilate chose the world. His conscience condemned him. God did not use this man as the instrument by whom Jesus should be condemned without awakening his conscience mightily. He might have been spared the reputation which he has in the confessions of Christians throughout the world, "He suffered under Pontius Pilate," if he had chosen as Paul chose him.

Out of necessity, must release one unto another at the feast. He would take the opportunity of working on the sympathies of the people if they demanded the release of Jesus, he could satisfy the chief priests by doing it under pressure from the multitude, and surely they who had received so many benefits from Him would demand that their beloved Teacher and Healer should be given back to them! But no; this time he had miscalculated; no device of his could rid him of the responsibility;

He Must Give Sentence.

To add to his anxiety, his wife sent to him that she had suffered much in a dream because of this remarkable prisoner, and urged him, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man." (Matt. 27: 19.) He put it to the people whether Jesus, or the robber and murderer, Barabbas, should be released unto them. To his surprise the popular cry arose, "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas," and when he murmured, they cried against Jesus, "Crucify Him, crucify Him!" In his perplexity, the governor asked, "What evil hath He done?" I have found no cause of death in Him; I will therefore chastise Him, and release Him. The mob became violent, Pilate saw that he was losing hold of them; they perceived his weakness and indecision, and made gain of it to overpower him. "The voices of them, and of the chief priests prevailed."

"The Son of Man goeth as it is written of Him; but woe unto that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! Good were it for that man if he had not been born." (Mark 14: 21.) And woe unto that man by whom He was condemned! Pilate's uneasy conscience invented another device: "he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it." (Matt. 27: 24.) But such an arrangement will never stand the test of the judgment seat. The washed hands wrote the death warrant, the lips which said, "I am innocent," gave sentence that it should be as they required. And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison; whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will. It was done, and all eternity could never undo it!

THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

THE accompanying illustration shows the style of the imposing edifice which is being raised in Chicago, as the headquarters of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The corner-stone was laid on Saturday last, and the building will be ready for occupation in 1892. The entire cost will be over a million dollars. A stock company has been organized to raise this sum, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union is holder. The ers to the company are friends of the work, and they have agreed to accept five per cent. on their capital, and to give the Union the privilege of paying off the whole at any period within twelve years. This is not an impossible undertaking as a large part of the building will be let off in offices, the rent of which will leave a considerable margin over the interest on capital, and necessary expenses.

The site of the Temple is on the corner of La Salle and Monroe Streets—an excellent business location, where offices will command good rentals. It is to be thirteen stories high, and as near fire-proof as builders can make it. It has a frontage on La Salle street of 190 feet by 96 on Monroe street. The building is formed somewhat in the shape of the letter H, and consists of two immense wings united by a middle portion or vinculum. It has a court seventy feet long and thirty feet deep, fronting on La Salle street, and a similar court of the same length, and eighteen feet deep, fronting to the west. In the front court, facing the grand entrance, and formed in a semicircle, are eight great elevators, which will transport persons from the first to the thirteenth story. From this court also rise two grand stair-cases of marble, which reach to the roof. There will be a central hall on each floor running north and south, and a transverse hall in each wing running east and west. The lower court and halls will be paved in marble mosaic, the upper one in plain marble. The wainscot in all the halls will be of marble. The material used in the building, for the first two stories, is gray granite with a dash of pink through it; above that pressed brick and terra cotta.

At the tenth story the building line retreats, and the immense roof, which contains three stories, commences, breaking as it ascends into Gothic turrets, from the centre of which springs a fleche of gold bronze seventy feet high, surmounted by the beautiful form of a woman with face upturned, and hands outstretched to heaven in prayer. On the southwest corner of the building, on the street, there is to be a beautiful drinking fountain finished with suitable sculpture and inscription. Around the front of the grand entrance will be carved on the granite the coat-of-arms of the different states of the Union. Engraved upon the corner-stone is the National legend of the W. C. T. U. "For God, and Home, and Native Land. 1890." On the reverse side, is the W. C. T. U. monogram; underneath, "Organized 1874."

The glory of the Union hitherto has been in its beneficent work, which reaches out to every State; but its members will have reason to be proud too of their magnificent home, and will enjoy the prestige it will give.

A CONVERSION ON A TRAIN.

THAT eminent Wesleyan minister, the Rev. Charles Garrett, is said to have surprised a number of friends by the statement that he was unable to say precisely when and where he was converted. The Wesleyans, the reader is reminded, as a denomination not only insist upon "reading their title clear," but generally speaking attach perhaps, more importance than some other bodies of Christians, to the when and the where of the great change from darkness to light and from the power of sin and Satan unto God. Naturally, therefore, Mr. Garrett's hearers were somewhat puzzled by the minister's statement, more particularly so as he is one of their most earnest, positive and aggressive preachers, sympathetic and emotional in a high degree. The matter was cleared up to everybody's satisfaction, however, when he went on to tell that at the time when the Spirit of God spoke peace to his soul, he was on duty as conductor (guard, the English say) on an express train travelling at a high rate of speed. While, therefore, he might give approximately the time of his conversion, of the exact place he must remain in absolute ignorance. That matter, however, does not worry him and a similar ignorance need not worry others. The man who is trusting in Christ for salvation, who having "this hope in him purifieth himself as He is pure," who, like the apostle John, knows he has passed from death unto life because he "loves the brethren," (1. John 3: 14,) need not concern himself about the time and place of the great change,

SHALL THE SABBATH GO?

THE wisdom of cessation from hard labor one day out of the seven is almost universally acknowledged. The world has found out that it can do less work in seven days than in six, and that the fifty-two days of the year devoted to rest are an addition, rather than a subtraction. Experiments have been made in all departments. The great Castlereagh thought he could work his brain three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, but after awhile broke down and committed suicide; and Wilberforce said of him: "Poor Castlereagh! This is the result of the non-observance of the Sabbath." A celebrated merchant declared: "I should have been a maniac long ago but for the Sabbath." The nerves, the brain, the muscles, the bones, the entire physical, intellectual and moral nature, cry out for the Sabbatic rest. What is true of man is, for the most part, true of the brute. Travellers have found out that they come to their place of destination sooner when they let their horses rest by the way on the Sabbath.

What is the matter with those forlorn creatures harnessed to some of our city cars? Why do they stumble and stagger and fall? It is for the lack of the Sabbatic rest. In other days, when the herdsmen drove their sheep and cattle from the far West down to the seaboard, it was found out by experiment that those herdsmen and drovers who halted over the seventh day got down sooner to the seaboard than those who passed on, without the observance of the holy Sabbath. The fishermen off the coast of Newfoundland declared that those men during the year catch the most fish who stop during the Lord's-day. When I asked the Rocky Mountain locomotive engineer why he changed locomotives when it seemed to be a straight route, he said: "We have to let the locomotive stop and cool off, or the machinery would soon break down." Men who made large quantities of salt were told that if they allowed their kettles to cool over Sunday, they would submit themselves to a great deal of damage. The experiment was made, some observing the Sabbath, and some not observing the Sabbath. Those who allowed the fires to go down, and the kettles to cool once a week, were compelled to spend only a few pennies in the way of repairs; while in the cases where no Sabbath was observed, many dollars were demanded for repairs. In other words: intelligent man, and dumb beast, and dead machinery cry out for the Lord's day.

While the attempt to kill the Sabbath by the stroke of axe, and flail, and the yardstick has beautifully failed, it is proposed in our day to drown the Sabbath by flooding it with secular amusements. They would bury it very decently under the wreath of the target company, and to the music of brazen instruments. There are today, in the different cities, ten thousand hands and ten thousand pens busy in attempting to cut out the heart of our Christian Sabbath, and leave it a bleeding skeleton of what it once was. The effort is organized and tremendous; and unless the friends of Christ, and the lovers of good order, shall rouse up right speedily, their sermons and their protests will be uttered after the castle is taken.

There are cities in the land where the Sabbath has almost perished; and it is becoming a practical question whether we, who received a pure Sabbath from the hands of our fathers, shall have piety and pluck enough to give to our children the same blessed inheritance. The eternal God helping us, we will.

MUSCLE CONSECRATED.

THERE is just now an attempt at the glorification of muscle. The man who can row the swiftest, or strike a ball the farthest, or drop the strongest wrestler, is coming to be of more importance. Strong muscle is a grand thing to have, but everything depends on how you use it. If Sullivan should become a Christian he would make a capital professor in Polemic Theology. If the Yale or Cornell student shall come in from the boat race and apply his athletic strength to rowing the world out of the breakers, we say: "All hail" to him. The more physical force a man has the better; but if Samson finds nothing more useful to do than carrying off gate-posts, his strong muscle is only a nuisance.

By all means let us culture physical energy, let there be more gymnasiums in our colleges and theological seminaries. Let the student know how to wield oar and bat, and in good boyish wrestle see who is the strongest. The health of mental and spiritual work often depends on physical health. If we were not opposed to betting, we would lay a wager that we can tell, from the book column in any of the newspapers or magazines of the land, the condition of each critic's liver and spleen at the time of his writing. A very prominent literary man apologized to us for his merciless attack on one of our books, saying that he felt miserable that morning and must pitch into something, and our book being the first one on the table he pitched into that. Our health decides our style of work. If this world is to be taken for God, we want more sanctified muscle. The man who comes to his Christian work having had sound sleep the night before, and the result of roast beef in his organism, can do almost anything. Luther was not obliged to nurse his appetite with any strengthening tonic, but was ready for the coarsest diet, even the "Diet of Worms."

But while we advocate all sports, and exercises, and modes of life that improve the physical organism, we have no respect for bone, nerve, and muscle, in the abstract. Health is a fine harp, but we want to know what tune are going to play on it. We have not one day to put on the grave of a dead pugilist or a boat-racer, but all the garlands we can get for the tomb of the man who serves God, though he be as physically weak as Richard Baxter, whose ailments were almost as many as his books and they numbered forty.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Chinese Guild organized in New York, by Greer, Rector of the Church of St. Bartholomew, of which account appeared in a recent number of this journal, now has a membership of 465.

At the meeting of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, in Hamilton Hall, Columbia College, New York, on Nov. 4, Mr. Lemuel W. Serrell delivered a lecture on "The Harmony of Science and Christianity."

Three Christian Endeavor Societies have been organized in Brisbane, Queensland. Rev. W. Scott saw the benefits of the work in this country, introduced it into a church in England, and has now planted it in Brisbane.

Mrs. Ada B. Cole, wife of Rev. H. M. Cole, past the Congregational Church of Lamar, Mo., filled her husband's pulpit, and took entire charge of the work for a month while her husband was on a business trip East.

A Belgian shipping paper states that a steamer bound for the west coast of Africa had on board fourteen missionaries, 460 tons of gunpowder, eleven cases of and 1,000 casks of rum.

The King of Samoa has recently issued a proclamation prohibiting under severe penalties any native from drinking, bartering, or giving spirituous liquors for use by any native.

Evangelist H. W. Brown, of Chicago, is holding revival meetings in Dayton, Ohio. The Linden Avenue Baptist Church in which they are held, has been the scene of wonderful awakening, and large numbers of people have made a profession of faith.

We are asked to remind our readers that on Nov. 10 the annual Convention of Christian Workers of the United States and Canada, will be held at Hartford, Conn. Full particulars may be obtained of Rev. C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

Rev. Dr. Pond says, that in seventeen years the foreign Chinese Mission has enrolled fully eight hundred converts, that nearly one-third of the members of any Church are Chinamen, and that they are as Christians as can be found anywhere.

The non-partisan National Women's Christian Temperance Union has issued a call for a national convention, to be held at Allegheny City, Pa., Nov. 10. Full particulars may be obtained from Mrs. H. C. C. Bell, Sandusky Street, Allegheny City, Pa.

In a communication to the Leebury Commercial Florida, a correspondent gratefully acknowledges spiritual benefits received while on a voyage to that port on the Iroquois of the Clyde line of steamers, from commander, Captain Pennington, whose achievement in bringing his ship safely into port in spite of the fiercest head wind, was mentioned recently in these columns.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's meetings in Buffalo, N. Y., were densely crowded last week. The Music Hall in which the meetings were held could not contain nearly all who sought admission. Mr. Sankey, whose voice seems to have recovered its former power, was assisted in the musical part of the services by a member of a Buffalo choir.

Meetings held in Gloucester, Mass., by Dr. L. Munhall, during the past four weeks have been blessed. About five hundred persons have made a profession of faith. Many of these are young people of the Sunday Schools. From Gloucester, Dr. Munhall went to New Haven, Conn., where he preached in the First Baptist Church. He also gave an address to students of Yale College in Dwight Hall.

The New York State Societies of Christian Endeavor held their fifth annual convention at Buffalo, N. Y., last week. Over 1,300 delegates were present. The report stated that the districts of the State had been increased during the past year from 27 to 50: these contain 1,203 societies. Of these, 396 are affiliated Presbyterian churches, 286 with Baptist, and 120 Congregational. During the year 5,327 conversions were reported.

Bishop H. C. Riley will give four free lectures on Mexico and Central America, and show his stereopticon views on Nov. 3-6, in the Methodist Protestant Church on Fourth Street, corner of South Third Street, Brooklyn. Last week he delivered these lectures in the Congregational Church, Newark, N. J., to large and delighted audiences. The collections taken up at these meetings are in aid of the schools and Christian work which the Bishop is carrying on in Mexico.

ley's Ill fated Rear-Guard—Holland's King to Abdicate—A "Sugar Palace"—An Indian Messiah—Belfour's Ash Tour—A Memorial to the Arctic Heroes of 1881—An Ocean Horror off Barnegat.

Two Continents Have Been Stirred Up by the publication of a book by the brother of Major Barttelot, who commanded the ill-fated rear-guard in the Stanley expedition. The publication gave various extracts from Major Barttelot's diaries, and in the nature of a general attack on Mr. Stanley, an imputation of unworthy motives to the expedition, and an accusation of unfitness to the glory of the brave men who perished in the rear-guard. Mr. Stanley, who is now a very young man, gave immediate notice of the attack, but when it was followed up by statements from Lieutenant Troup, now in the country, and by others, the leader broke silence. Stanley says his orders to the rear-guard were disobeyed; the column was a disorganized mob. It was not immorality that led them to die as they did, but there were horrors yet to be revealed. He had seen men whose bodies were alive with maggots. They died in pairs, en route and in canoes. They allowed themselves to be deprived of rations, and medicines by Barttelot, who, being in command, was responsible for all that went wrong. Mr. Stanley stated that Barttelot's temper was the cause of his own death at the hands of a Manyema, named Sanga, who shot him when he heard Barttelot beating his (Sanga's) wife for making a noise with a drum. Lieutenant Baert, who was Tippoos Tib's secretary at the time, sets out Stanley's estimate of Barttelot's unmanageable temper, which resulted in estranging his own officers, and in exciting the anger of the blacks. At no time has Stanley ever impeached Barttelot's courage, although he blames the disaster to his command at Yambuya. Mr. Barttelot's portrait is given above.

An Indian Messiah is confidently expected the Sioux in the coming spring. Their "medicine men" have worked the tribe up to a high degree of excitement, and the Government agents are fearful of a serious outbreak as the result of the present craze. The story told to these credulous red men is, that the Great Spirit will shortly put an end to the domination of the whites over them; that all the Indians will return to earth, to swell the numbers of the living and assist in repelling the usurper; that they will bring back with them from the spirit-land great herds of buffalo and wild horses for the warriors; that powder and bullets will not prevail against the men in the coming warfare, and that that the whites will be snowed over for thirty days, all whites being frozen to death, except a few who will become fishes. Sitting Bull is the center in the new absurdity, which is believed to be simply a shrewd plan to stir up an Indian outbreak on a large scale in the spring.

Terrible Tragedy of the Sea Occurred on Friday, October 30, when the Spanish steamer Corvus Hargraves, a coaling-schooner, off Barnegat, was sunk by a collision with the Viscaya. Five hours before the disaster, the Viscaya sailed from New York City, with sixteen passengers, and a full crew under the command of Captain Cunill, one of the most experienced officers in the employ of the American branch of the Compania Transatlantica, bound to Havana and other West Indian ports. At seven o'clock, while the passengers were enjoying themselves in the cabin after supper, a frightful crash was heard. Owing to the spread of the steamer's foresail, the lookout had failed to see a big, black-hulled coaling-schooner coming at full speed and with all sails set, free before the wind and straight for the Viscaya. Suddenly, like a black ghost, her bow loomed up, and then came a crash, followed by another, and in an instant water poured into the steamer from a great gap opened on her starboard side by the bows of the collier, impelled by the battering force of 2,000 tons of coal. The Captain of the steamer, who was on the bridge at the time, was killed by the schooner's bowsprit, which nearly cut the Viscaya in halves. The collier's bows were torn open and her cargo of coal began to slide into the sea. The crew of the steamer were panic-stricken and her fear-smitten passengers swarmed the deck. There was no one to command. An attempt was made to launch the lifeboats, but before they could be loosened from the davits, the vessel began to settle. Seven minutes from the time of the collision, all save her top-rigging had disappeared. The collier had also sunk, but her rigging, too, was above water. To the masts of both vessels and to such spars as floated about clung scores of unfortunates, all through the terrible night. The women and children sank one by one, chilled and unable to hold on, although supported bravely by the men. By daybreak all but twelve men, who still clung to the rigging of the Viscaya, had disappeared. These were rescued by the steamer Humboldt which sighted them nearly twelve hours after the disaster, and brought them in safety to New York. The saved were, the first officer, engineer and several of the crew of the steamer. All the passengers perished, among them being two very wealthy Cuban merchants, one, Juan Pedro being a well-known millionaire. Another was Senor Calvo who, with his wife, daughter and maid, all went down together. Ten of the crew of the Hargraves and seven more of the crew of the Viscaya were picked up by the tug Hercules, and taken in safety to Lewes, Del. Seventy-four persons are believed to have perished. Barnegat, off which the collision occurred, is on the New Jersey coast, about half-way between Sandy Hook and Cape May, and only a half day's sail from New York.

The Sugar Palace at the Grand Island, Neb., Sugar Exposition (a picture of which is given below), is by no means the airy, delicate, and saccharine structure to imply. It is a massive pile of granite, the base being thirty-two feet long, twelve feet wide, and ten feet high, built of irregularly shaped pieces, and resembling as far as possible, the memorial of stone erected on the bank of the Lena by the rescuers who came all too late. The upper portion is of white marble. At the foot of the cross, which rises from the base, rests a bronze anchor. On each side of the monument are tablets bearing the names of the dead heroes. The men and officers of the United States Navy contributed the fund for the memorial.

in this country in the sugar industry, showing that our beet-root product possesses the largest average of saccharine matter of any similar product in the world. It has been shown that Nebraska beet-root is the best raised in any western State. State pride and enterprise have made the Sugar Palace Exposition one of the notable landmarks of progress in 1890.

Professor Koch, the distinguished German scientist, has made still further and more remarkable progress in his cure for consumption, and medical circles abroad are greatly excited over his recent experiments. He has discovered that the application of metallic salts in the preparation of the inoculating lymph, kills the consumption bacillus. The lymph is prepared by a long and extremely difficult process, and is not expected to be efficacious in advanced stages of the disease. Prof. Leyden and the Berlin Medical Society are actively interested in the experiments, which are conducted in the Charity Hospital in that city, and which go far to demonstrate that science has found means to combat the deadliest disease of the century.

Prof. Leyden and the Berlin Medical Society are actively interested in the experiments, which are conducted in the Charity Hospital in that city, and which go far to demonstrate that science has found means to combat the deadliest disease of the century.

An Example of Remarkable Courage, if not of patriotism, is afforded by Mr. Balfour, Chief Secretary for Ireland, who is now making a tour of the western counties of that country, for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the truth of the stories of famine and suffering. He had been so bitterly criticised for his official course that, when he decided to start on the tour, his friends were alarmed for his safety. The result has proved, however, that he had chosen wisely. He has been everywhere courteously treated and was deeply impressed with the forlorn and wretched condition of the peasants, and with the prospects of famine. In many districts, he found them housed in hovels and literally starving by inches. One result of Mr. Balfour's tour (his portrait is given above), will probably be to introduce important relief legislation in Parliament.

The Old World Budget for the Week is full of interest. Mr. Gladstone has punctured the bugaboo about the American Tariff, as far as its deadly effect on British industries is concerned, in a speech at Dundee. Whatever benefit, Britain lost in the American market it would more than gain in other markets. A very serious revolt of peasants in Southern Russia has occurred, as the natural result of the brutal enforcement of the conscription laws. A strong force of troops has been sent to suppress it. Hungarian brigands have robbed and murdered a whole family at a railway station, at Lachaza, near Pesth. A movement has been started to give a salary to English members of Parliament of $1,500 a year. The African town of Vitu has been burned by the crew of the British warship, Boadicea, and its inhabitants killed or dispersed, in retaliation for the massacre of a number of Germans by the natives some time ago.

The Poor, Old King of Holland, has Occupied his throne for several years past by the good-natured toleration of his subjects alone. At different times they have seriously thought of declaring him incapacitated, but consideration for his imperial consent, Queen Emma, who is very popular, restrained them. Now, however, they have decided that William III. is unfitted for the duties of government. The heir to the throne is a ten-year-old daughter by a second marriage. Queen Emma will meanwhile rule as regent. Temporarily affairs are being administered by the Council of State.

De Long and His Brave Fellows, who Perished in the Lena Delta, during the unfortunate Jeannette expedition of 1881, have been remembered by a monument erected in the Naval Academy of Annapolis, and which was unveiled on Thursday last, with appropriate ceremonies. It is a massive pile of granite, the base being thirty-two feet long, twelve feet wide, and ten feet high, built of irregularly shaped pieces, and resembling as far as possible, the memorial of stone erected on the bank of the Lena by the rescuers who came all too late. The upper portion is of white marble. At the foot of the cross, which rises from the base, rests a bronze anchor. On each side of the monument are tablets bearing the names of the dead heroes. The men and officers of the United States Navy contributed the fund for the memorial.

THE COST OF RANSOM.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Chapter of Comfort—Encouraging Promises—I. The Lord's Declaration of His Name—Jehovah the Self-Existent—The Holy One, the Saviour—Working Out Perfect Holiness in Believers—II. His Estimate of His People—The Literal Gift of Other Nations—The Gift of His Son—Of the Holy Spirit—III. The Outcome—God's People Secure—Made Honorable—Will Surely be Gathered—Ought to Help in His Work.

"I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee." Isaiah 43: 3.

IN this chapter, the Lord comforts His people. By His divine foresight He perceives that there are great and varied trials a little way ahead, and therefore He prepares them for the ordeal. They are to go through rushing waters and flaming fires; and He kindly bids them not to be afraid. How often in God's Word do we read those tender, gracious words, "Fear not!" To encourage His people to rise superior to their fears, the gracious God goes on to issue matchless promises: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." The Lord proceeds, after giving those promises, to set before them what He Himself is, and what He has done for them, and what they are to Him. He is speaking of course, to Israel; and He says of Israel, His chosen nation, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee." What cause for fear now remains? All believers are of

The True Israel.

Though after the flesh Abraham be ignorant of us, and Sarah acknowledge us not, yet are we the true seed of him who was the father of believers. The literal Israel was the type of those who by faith are born again according to promise. To these heirs according to promise the Lord saith, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee."

If you are a believer in Christ, you are of the true Israel. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God;" and being born of God, you are of the family of His love, you are heirs of God, joint heirs with Jesus Christ. If you are not believers in Him, what can I preach to you that can comfort you? The unbelieving, living and dying such, have no portion in the covenant of grace. If this day you become believers, you have, in that faith, the token and mark of the divine choice, and you assuredly belong to the Israel of God. Every heavenly blessing which God promises to Israel belongs to you who are in Christ Jesus, and so are in union with the promised seed.

I. First, I pray you, hearken to

of His own name. He says, "I am Jehovah thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour." He gives His name thus at large to distinguish Himself from the false gods. Other things there were, which men called gods, and these had names; though, indeed, they had no being, but were the creatures of man's imagination and fear. God, the living God, the Creator of the heavens, and the earth, sets forth His own name and title, that there may be no mistake as to who He is. There is something in every name of God which may breed faith in our souls. Whether we know Him as Jehovah, Elohim, Shaddai, or Lord, or by whatsoever other name He has been pleased to manifest Himself, that title becomes the ground of our confidence, and is the means of fostering faith in His people's minds, when they come to understand its meaning.

Let us devoutly think of each of these names separately. First, the Lord speaks of Himself as "Jehovah, thy God." I need not tell you that where you see Lord in capitals, it should be Jehovah. Jehovah: "the God of the whole earth shall He be called." His kingdom ruleth over all: there is universality. But He calls Himself "Thy God": there is speciality. The goodness of God, surrounds all the creatures

He has made; but there is love which is peculiar to His own. To all the nations of the earth He was the only Lord and God; but yet He said of Israel, "You only have I known, of all the families of the earth." Thus, the one ever glorious Jehovah, while He is God unto the ends of the earth, is Israel's God in a sense in which He is not the God of Assyria, or Persia, or Egypt, or Ethiopia: He has made Himself over to His own people, saying, "I will be their God."

Jehovah, the glorious I AM, signifies self-existence. He borrows nothing from others; indeed, in a sense, there are no others apart from Him, since all live by His permit and power, He is as complete without His creatures as with them. When there were no heavens, no earth, no twinkling star, nor flying seraph, He was as truly God, and as complete within Himself, as He is now that He has made creatures innumerable. Yet, though He be thus self-sufficient, and self-existent, still He deigns to link Himself with our nothingness, and call Himself "Jehovah, thy God."

All-sufficient,

Jehovah, again, is a name which means immutability. "I AM that I AM," was His name to Moses. God always is in the present. To Him there is no past or future.

*"He fills His own eternal now,
And sees our ages pass."*

This unchanging One here declares Himself to be the God of beings who are but of yesterday, and full of change. Yes, great Lord, thou wast my God when first my pulse began to beat; thou didst care for me when I lay upon my mother's lap. Thou hast watched over me when, in youthful days, I foolishly wandered; thou has called me back, and taught me to lay my finger in the print of my Saviour's wounds, and say, "My Lord, and my God." Yes, Jehovah has been our God—"The same yesterday, to-day, and forever." He never changes nor ceases as to His love to us. He cannot love us more; He will not love us less.

Now comes a second

Combination of Titles—

"The Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour." It may not have struck you before; but what a New Testament combination this is—"The Holy One, thy Saviour"! It reminds us of the words—"Just, and the justifier of him that believeth." Here we have one so holy as to be separate from sinners, and yet the Saviour of sinners. "Holy, Holy, Holy," is the ascription which is justly due to Him; and yet He passes by iniquity, transgression and sin. "The Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour," it is a commingling of attributes which only the cross can explain. Herein is a world of comfort. God's holiness appears to look dark and black upon a sinner; but when he believes in Jesus this attribute of holiness smiles upon him. Is God holy? Then He will never break His promise. If He declares men to be justified through faith in Christ then depend upon it, they are justified; He will not run back from the compact of His grace. Having exacted at the hand of our great Surety that which vindicates His justice, He makes that justice the guarantee that He will no more be wroth with His people.

Since "The Holy One of Israel" is our Saviour, we are confident that He Will Save us From all Sin.

He has already saved us from the penalty and the defilement of sin, He will also save us from the disease of sin, that is to say, our tendency to evil. "They shall call His name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins." The Lord will save believers from all inclination to evil. We shall be saved not only from sins committed, but from indwelling sin, from original sin, from the corrupt tendencies of our nature. "The Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour," will save us until we become holy as God is holy; or as our Lord Jesus worded it, "Perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." My brethren, aspire to this salvation! Let this blessed name of God, "the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour," encourage you to believe that you shall yet be without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.

Remember also that this Holy Lord is working upon you still, that you may reflect His glory. He says in the seventh verse, "I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him." He has begun our new creation, He is carrying it on, and He is completing it. There is a new character forming in believers by God's own hand: a character which will be the image of the Lord Jesus. If I am a believer, despite depravities of nature, temptations from the world, and assaults from Satan, I must be, I shall be, perfectly transformed into the image of the Lord Jesus.

II. Secondly, let us note

The Lord's Estimate of His People.

Whatever we may think of the Israel of God, the Lord thinks more of it than words can express. He says, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee." Let us turn that over in our minds. When the Lord chose a nation to be the depository of His sacred oracles, He might have selected Egypt, if He had willed to do so. Egypt was in the known world, the oldest nation, it was hoary with antiquity. Egypt contained the wisest and most civilized people of early times. Its very ruins are the wonder of the ages. Its records show an extraordinary progress in literature, architecture, and the arts and sciences. Egypt was also the most powerful of empires in the olden times. Before the banners of Assyria, and Babylon, and Medo-Persia came to the front, the dragon of Egypt was a mighty ensign. Yet the Lord chose the seed of Abraham, and the family of Jacob: He multiplied them, and instructed them, and made them to be His own peculiar people. In this sense He could say, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee."

Thus the Lord did of old on the behalf of His literal Israel; and what does this fact say to us? It means this—God's chosen are immeasurably precious in His sight. If I understand God's great project, it was on this wise: He had formed matter into a thousand marvellous shapes, and He had then created vegetable life in infinite variety and beauty. To this He had added animal life in all its differing degrees of intelligence; and then He made angels, who are pure spirit. These several creations He would link together,

Blending Matter and Mind,

the animal and the spiritual; therefore He resolved that He would make a being that should be nearer to Him than the angels, and yet should be akin to the rest of the universe, down even to the mere materialism of which its body should be composed. His Son was in His thought! Immanuel, God-with-man. He resolved that the eternal Son should be incarnate, should be the Adam of a chosen race, "the first-born among many brethren"; and that these brethren should be His Son's joy, and crown, and delight forever. The Word made flesh was to be the model and pattern for a generation of beloved ones, who should be "a kind of firstfruits of His creatures." These favored beings would be of earth, and yet of heaven, brothers to the worm, and yet partakers of the divine nature; lifted up into alliance with the Godhead through Jesus Christ, their representative, who is both God and man. This wonderful conception I can but dimly set before you.

This design would be costly, even to Jehovah himself. To carry out this purpose, men having fallen, must be Redeemed by Blood.

The Lord gave Ethiopia and Seba for his people, but this was little. Would He give His only begotten Son? The ever-blessed Son of the Father was more precious than Egypt multiplied beyond all count; and Ethiopia and Seba were as nothing to His value. Would the Lord give His own Son? Yes, to carry out His divine resolve of magnifying Himself in the salvation of guilty men, He spared not His own Son, but freely delivered Him up for us all. O miracle of miracles! Love beyond degree!

But even then men could not be saved unless

Holy Ghost, another blessed Person of the Three, should condescend to come and live in human flesh for thirty years; or the Holy Ghost to abide in our human form for thousands of years is an equal marvel. The indwelling of the Holy Ghost is true, the further miracle of love has been perfected in whom the Spirit abides. This is far more than giving Egypt for our ransom. God Himself to save unworthy man.

And now, beloved, shall He not with the Jesus also give us all things? Is anything too dear for God to make a sacrifice of it? Is there anything in heaven or earth, or even in the sphere of imagination, that God will not give for the accomplishment of purposes of grace to His people? Believers, do you now how great you are? Do you know, men and women saved by grace, what you are and where you are? If you did, I think you would begin to shout "Hallelujah!" and I never come to an end.

And now we shall close with a brief meditation. Let us consider

The Outcome

Is. If it be so, that the glorious God has made of a truth loved us, His people, and paid us at a mighty price, then see how secure we people are! I will not say anything upon the head, but the Lord Himself shall speak. It is not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine. When I pass through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the heat kindle upon thee. For I am the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: I have redeemed thee from Egypt, from Ethiopia and Seba. He has given so much for us that we will not now lose us. He values us too highly to let His enemy carry us away. Beloved, how secure they must be who are priceless in the esteem of God!

Next, the honor which God puts upon us. It follows upon the text, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. Thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honorable." God has put us poor sinners among His honorables. I know one who, in her inverted state, had fallen into sad sin, and remembrance thereof was painful; but the Lord removed the shame by laying home to her these gracious words, "Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honorable." Oh, yes! the woman who was a sinner, washed our Saviour's feet with tears, and dried them with her hair, was honorable to her Lord. The thief on the cross, gibbeted though he was, was honorable before Him who is the fountain of honor. He was a peer of the realm, and in with Jesus into the palace; for his Lord said, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Our ascending Lord entered paradise with this thief as His attendant. The Lord is the way of transforming Dishonorable Into Honorables.

Again, from the high estimate which the Lord puts upon His people we conclude the dignity of the Lord's gathering together all His people. This is set forth from the fifth to the twentieth verses, "I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather them from the west"; and again, "This encourages me to preach with my might; for the Lord has a people whom He must and will gather to Himself. He bids His angels act as His servants in this matter. I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, my daughters from the ends of the earth." They may be up to their necks in the bogs of sin. But they are to be brought home, for the Lord will not lose His sons and daughters. When I come to preach in this great house, I will say within my heart, "Lord, thou hast much love in this city. I will seek for them. This love thou has bought for thyself, at an exceeding great price, and I would find them for thee." A controversialist once said, "If I thought God had a chosen people, I should not preach." That is the very reason why I do preach. What would make him inactive is the mainspring of my earnestness. If the Lord had not a people to be saved, I should have little to cheer me in my ministry. Other sheep He has, whom He must bring in, and my hope is that He will bring some of them in by me. Beloved, God has a people everywhere, and we are sent to draw them to Him with

The Powerful Magnet

of the cross. This finds them out amid the ashes, even as Jesus said: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." We preach Christ crucified, and, "to Him shall the gathering of the people be."

Here is another little bit for meditation. If God has determined to glorify Himself by us and in us, let us be in one accord with Him. Oh, that we could live wholly to His glory! Not only let us speak sometimes to His praise, but let us always be making known the exceeding riches of His grace. If we knew how much God loved us, we should love Him much more in return, and we should give much more to His cause and to His poor than we do. We are stewards, and not owners; and the least hint should set us inquiring as to what is needed in our Master's house. We should not need exhorting, much less to be begged of: we should be always crying to the Lord, "Show me what thou wouldst have me to do." He is Jehovah our God, the Holy One of Israel, who hath redeemed us at and the least we can do is by loving, cheerful working, patient suffering, and spontaneous giving, to show what we think of our Lord. If we are the sons of Jehovah, our joy, our hope, our recreation, our object in life, will all be among high and eternal things. Our affections are set upon things above, not on things on the earth. Try to live up to your destiny, ye heirs of God. May God the Holy Ghost help you!

What love we ought to bear to God! Does God give up Egypt for us, and shall not we give up the riches of Egypt for Him? Shall we go down to Egypt for help when God has already given up Egypt that He might help us? If we could have all the wealth of Ethiopia and Seba, what would it be in comparison with our Lord? Wherefore, let us love Him supremely, and count all things but loss for the excellency of His knowledge. Beloved, we must love Him: we do love Him. How can it be otherwise? "The love of Christ constraineth us." Madame Guion wrote of "torrents." Divine love, if truly felt, is a torrent, sweeping all before it, like that ancient river Kishon. Oh, for those torrents now!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Royal Sentinel.*

IT is said that the young German Emperor, wishing to know the experience of a common soldier on guard, put himself on duty for twenty-four hours in an extemporized guard-room in the garden at Potsdam, and stood sentry during the four spells of two hours each. He wore the uniform of a private soldier, carried a rifle, and ate of the soldier's simple fare. If the story is true I honor him for it. What many of our young men of the present day sadly want is to "endure hardness." They are in danger of taking things too easily. They wish to shirk real, solid work. Why, what is this I see in the morning paper? A young man advertises for "a light situation." I am ashamed of him! Remember, sirs, you have to work; be it with brawn or brain, you must work; whether you handle a pick-axe or a quill pen, whether you drive a wheel-barrow or edit a journal, success will be contingent on downright honest work. It is this that gives you appetite for your meals,

*From A Good Start. A book for young men. By Rev. J. Thain Davidson, D.D. All who have read any of Dr. Davidson's works will know the character of this, though they will have to read it to know its superior excellence. It is full of good advice and sanctified common-sense. A more valuable gift to a young man about to enter the business of life it would be hard to find. Pp. 283. Price $1.25. Published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 714 Broadway, New York.

and enjoyment of your night's rest, and full appreciation of your occasional holiday. There are young men who are never willing to endure any kind of hardness; but the world is not proud of them; they are born to be mere nobodies. Find out what your appropriate task is, and then off with your coat, and buckle to it with all the vigor you possess.

The Test of Amusements.

There are few things that occasion more perplexity to a certain class of well-disposed persons of both sexes, than the question how far they may, without sin, enter into the pleasures of the world. Some time ago the representative of a society of young men wrote me requesting an answer to this question: "How far may a young man, who is trying to lead a godly life, join in athletic sports and recreations?" My reply was to the following effect:—Generally every recreation is to be avoided by Christian young men, which (1), naturally leads them into evil or doubtful company; or (2), tends to produce reaction, either in the form of mental depression, or physical lassitude; or (3), is in any way associated with betting or gambling; or (4), disinclines or unfits for religious duties. I believe you may apply this four-fold test as rigidly as you like, it still leaves a wide range of out-door and in-door recreations and amusements, sufficient to satisfy the most high-spirited youth, and brace him up for his daily toil.

Luther's Missile.

I have seen a great deal of good done by private correspondence. Your brother John is careless about religion; your cousin William is getting into bad company; the next time you write, say something very pointed and kind; it may make more impression than anything he hears from the pulpit. If any of you ever visited the castle of Wartburg, you have doubtless been shown a great blotch upon the wall, which they tell you was made in this way: When Martin Luther was in this retired spot, he was so haunted by the devil, that at last, in a fit of righteous indignation, he took up his ink-pot and hurled it at the imagined figure which he took to be his adversary. The pot broke upon the wall, leaving an ugly splash behind; but the devil vanished, and troubled him in that fashion no more. I will not guarantee this story to be literally true; but I am pretty sure of this, that a well-administered pot of ink has often put the devil to flight.

The Methodist's Encomium.

Dr. Levi was Professor of Commercial Law in King's College, and the highest existing authority upon Statistical Science and International Jurisprudence. During nearly forty years it was my privilege to enjoy his intimate acquaintanceship, to mark his steady progress from obscurity to fame, and to admire, not only his intellectual gifts, but the modesty and simplicity of his character, especially as it was moulded by genuine piety. Like Hiram, he belonged in his youth to another nation and another religion; and like him, he steadily rose by dint of quiet energy and perseverance, till he occupied a high step of the ladder, and was received by potentates and princes. The enemy of all sham and pretence, he built up a European reputation on a basis of solid work and worth, and he was not without his reward. That was a red letter day when to his plain lodging there came a summons from the late Prince Consort to attend at Windsor Castle, and receive a royal acknowledgment of his work on international law. His fellow-boarders, he tells us, were a tall, lean Methodist minister, an Episcopal curate, small and very infirm, and one or two commercial travellers. When the day arrived for his going to Windsor, every one of them waited to see him off, each offering whatever service he could render; the good landlady and her servants adding to the group. When all was ready and the cab was at the door, the tall, Methodist minister, waving his hat, shouted out as the vehicle drove off, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business; he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men." It may not be the destiny of any of you to be summoned before a monarch, but I trust that a yet nobler dignity is in store for you, even to stand before the King of kings in glory.

A MISQUOTED TEXT.

MANY preachers, in treating the text: "Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," fall into the error of reading the passage, as if it were, "Thou persuadest me to be almost a Christian," which is manifestly the wrong way of regarding it. Agrippa was as far from being a Christian when he said the words, as he had ever been. The difference was aptly illustrated by the plain farmer who on Sundays was wont to talk with his neighbors from the pulpits of neighboring churches. Said he: "When I am at the market and see a cow I should like to buy, I say to the man who has her for sale, what will you take for that cow? He says, thirty dollars. I say no; but I will give you twenty-five dollars for the cow. He says, I won't sell her for less than thirty, and I won't give him more than twenty-five. We both continue in the same mind, and I am as far from buying the cow and my neighbor from selling her, as though nothing had been said about the matter. I don't almost buy the cow, and she is never almost my cow. Mere talking about becoming a Christian is as far from becoming one, as heaven is remote from hell."

A MISSIONARY'S PERIL IN FIJI.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most remarkable triumphs of Christianity which this century has witnessed is that to be seen in the Fiji Islands. There was no darker or more barbarous spot on the earth at the beginning of the century than Fiji; now, there is no place in the sphere of foreign missions where there are so many real Christians in proportion to the population. The story of the change is beautifully told in a book recently published—the Life of Rev. James Calvert—a man who not only personally witnessed the transformation, but worked zealously and fearlessly to promote it. Among the incidents recorded, is one that forms the subject of the illustration on page 717. It describes a season of dire peril to the good missionary's life. Mr. Calvert says:

"As I proceeded up to my knees in water towards the shore, many persons made their appearance, some running fast towards me in two directions. As they neared me they looked very fierce, and made gestures indicative of evil intentions towards me. I could not get to the boat; I therefore went on towards the shore. One was swifter than the rest, and came near, with his gun uplifted, to strike me. I expostulated with him. Quickly several were up with me, some of whom had clubs uplifted to club me, some with hatchets, some with spears laid on in a position to throw. One came very near, with a musket pointed at me, with desperate looks. I trembled, but protested loudly and firmly that they ought not to kill me; that in me there was no cause of death for them; that their killing me would be greatly to their disgrace. I was surrounded by upwards of a hundred. The features of one I recognized, and hoped he was friendly. He took hold of me, recognizing me as the husband of the lady of the wooden house at Viwa, who had frequently purchased food of them, and treated them kindly, and he said I should live. I clung to him, and disputed for my life with those who clamored for my death. Another man's face, through a thick covering of soot, exhibited features familiar to me; but a fearful-looking battle-axe he held in his hand attracted my eye. However, I laid hold of him, and advised and urged him not to kill me. Thus I was between two who might be friendly. I told my name, my work, my labors in various ways, again and again, on their behalf. At length all consented to my living. But their thirst for killing had got up, and as they could not kill me, they wished me to return towards the boat, intending to accompany me, hoping to get one or more of my natives. I refused to go, and persisted in walking toward the shore. As we still went on in the sea they commenced their death song, always sung as they drag along the bodies of enemies slain. I feared that this might increase their rage, and desired them to stop it. It was most grating to my feelings, and I stood still, and entreated them to desist. After short time they did so, and we proceeded to the beach. Those who had run to destroy me departed to their own town.

"During the whole of the attack on me the Lord blessed me with great presence of mind and considerable firmness, to stand up, proceed to dispute with them, and protest against the taking of my life. My trust was in the Lord. He was my Help and my Deliverer."

REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

The Brilliant Preacher and Writer Stricken Down in the Midst of his Usefulness.

THE many friends in this country of Mr. J. Jackson Wray, will regret to learn that intelligence has been received of his very serious illness. He was stricken down suddenly at the close of a lecture he had been delivering, in aid of the fund for rebuilding his church. Prayers were offered for his recovery in the London churches, and it is earnestly hoped that his useful life may yet be spared. Mr. Wray, whose portrait is given on page 717, is fifty-eight years of age. For some years after the completion of his education he taught school in Yorkshire, England. Desiring more direct Christian work, he went to Africa where he presided over a school at Sierra Leone, for the training of native preachers. He toiled in that fatal climate until his health broke down, and he was compelled to seek renovation in his native air. As he recovered strength he began to preach and the Lord blessed his labors. The chapel in which the renowned George Whitefield once labored, was then without a pastor, and Mr. Wray was invited to fill its pulpit. He accepted, and within a year the historic edifice which was almost deserted, was filled with worshippers. After twelve years, labor there, the old church building showed signs of decay. It became altogether unsafe, and Mr. Wray and his church decided to pull it down and rebuild it. The work of collecting funds in the present depressed condition of business in England has been very arduous. But Mr. Wray labored with indefatigable zeal. With a se-otion worthy imitation he actually earned large part of the money needed, by writing and writing stories. Indeed, he intimated that his present illness had been caused by untiring exertions in this undertaking. Mr. Wray had been a valued contributor to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Several of his stories, pure, elevating, deeply interesting, have already appeared in these columns, and the one now running under the title Old Crusty's Niece is from his pen. We are sure Mr. Wray will receive the sincere, prayerful sympathy of many of our readers in his affliction.

Expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

AFTER parting with his chief stockman, Richard Mansford strolled off, thoughtfully, in an opposite direction to that taken by Donald McLean. As he passed along a certain hollow between two hills, where a fuzzy little brooklet ran chafing and rippling beneath the shadow of giant firs, his attention was arrested by a peculiar shining among the roots of a tree, from which the current had washed away the soil. Was that part of the soil of which he had just been speaking? He was about to turn aside to see, when his keen eye detected an unusual sound among the pine needles that clothed the slope above him. Lifting his eyes thitherward, he encountered the gaze of a stranger, wearing the well-known convict's dress. The gaze grew instantly intenser; he himself was sensible of a feeling of surprise, but at that moment the stranger disappeared, making a rustling among the brushwood, as he swiftly fled away. There was something in the convict's face that reminded Richard of a face he had not looked on in many years—the face of a brother who had robbed him of his bride. He had said that Richard Mansford was a brave man; I have intimated also that he was a man of peace, on the whole, was at peace with his conscience and his God; but he could not help a sensation of fear and dread, a sort of foreboding coming ill. He thought was borne in upon him that the tenor of his life on the Ooramarra was about to be rudely broken. He found himself wondering how Anice was getting on, and how his successful rival treated her. From all this it will be seen that, however fresh and green the memories of that sad event might be which had sent him half round the world, the grudge, the wrath, the sense of bitterness had largely died away. All that was best and kindest in Richard Mansford was mellowed and developed by time and the influence of Christ's religion. "Poor Rupe!" he said aloud, and gave much for a grip of your hand." The sound of his own voice startled him from reverie. Then he was aware of the presence of a companion. Close behind him, nay, at his elbow now, was a stranger. "Oh, no, Mr. Dick!" said the man, with a smile that yet had an unnamed misery in it—a grip of the hand is scarcely the thing you want now: is it? A grip on the throat would do you very much better, wouldn't it? And after all these years you won't refuse."

Fiji Savages Attacking a Missionary.

The man stretched forth his hand, a small, delicate, well-formed hand it was, almost like a woman's, and in the eyes of him some of his thing that bravado couldn't hide. "Why, who are you?" said Richard Mansford sternly, as a squatter might be expected to speak to a convict, but wonderingly and with a strange flutter at the heart. "Down there," said the man, pointing over his shoulder with his thumb towards the Ooramarra jail, "I was called No. 240. You knew me as Rupert Mansford of Hazelcroft—" "Oh heaven!" cried Richard Mansford, with an exceeding bitter cry, and in a moment the strong man reeled and sank to the ground. It was now the convict's turn to be alarmed. Kneeling by the side of the prostrate man, he loosed his neckerchief, and opened his shirt to let the cool air have access. He lifted him partially up, laid his head on his knee, and was at his wits' end to know what to do. To leave him to his fate never once entered the mind of the outcast, bad as he had become, and low as he had fallen. To go to Ooramarra farm, or to the creek, or to any more distant places for assistance was to ensure his own re-capture, and possibly enough, his death. For a long time he sat looking at the upturned face and at last saw the color coming to the cheek again. Placing his brother gently on the ground, Rupert Mansford went with all the speed he could to the brook, and filled his cap with water. Hastening back he found the object of his anxiety seated on a projecting boulder. He was going toward him when his quick ear caught a sound ominous to him, and dropping his hat he crawled into the bushes.

Richard, meanwhile, was in the dazed condition of a person coming out of a faint and unable to realize what had deprived him of consciousness. He looked around and seeing no one thought that he had been seized with a fit of some kind, and while under its distorting influence, had seen the horrible vision which, even now, had such a hold upon him that he covered his eyes with his hands to shut out the appalling sight.

When he came to the stream he bathed his hands and face in the clear waters, and then, refreshed and strengthened, proceeded on his way, resolved to say nothing to anyone of his strange experiences, but not without alarm as to the baneful effects of a possible repetition of such an attack upon his health.

At the door of his house he was met by a distant neighbor. Neighbors were distant in those days, for even squatters were few and far between. The arrival was a big, burly man, well booted and spurred, and in accordance with that eternal unfitness of things which seems to mark the nomenclature of places and people, was called Mr. Marcus Little.

He had just alighted from his horse, whose reeking flanks gave abundant evidence that its rider had travelled both fast and far.

"Hallo, Little!" said Richard, doing his best like the other Richard "to be himself again." "It's an unexpected pleasure to see you at Ooramarra."

In a hearty voice, which was quite as burly as his body, Mr. Marcus Little replied: "True, Mansford, very true; and I wish the neighbor had come on an errand of a more cheery sort. Have you seen or heard anything of the gentlemen of the bush, lately?"

"No," was the reply; "I was in hope that since the last gang was broken up, we shouldn't be troubled with that sort of vermin for some time to come."

"No such luck. Like other vermin they are a prolific breed; they are like wasps—if you kill one, twenty come to the funeral," replied Little.

"Are they out again?" asked Richard. "Worse than ever, I think," said Mr. Little. "This time they seem to have increased their numbers by an alliance with a squad of half-breeds. Fletcher's place at Wanaka has been broken into; so has Wilson's, at Manoora Bay, and not without blood-letting in both cases. This morning I received warning—and from a native, too, of all folks in the world—that they mean to 'stick up' my place to-morrow night; so I rode over to see if you would lend me a few of your fellows, that we may give 'em pepper when they come along."

"Certainly I will, and captain them myself," was Richard's reply. "But come in a little, and have some refreshment. Here Jack! look after the horse."

Nothing loth, the burly squatter followed his host into the spacious kitchen, saying, with a merry laugh, which showed that the impending attack on his homestead had not lowered his spirits. "Yes, I'll come in a little, big as I am; though I'm not likely to come out any less, however long I stay at your table. Ha, ha, ha!"

A-head of everything that can be used for washing and cleaning, is PEARLINE. If your work is heavy, it is a necessity; if your work is light, it is a luxury. It lessens the labor of washing, and helps everywhere in the housework. There's nothing so harmless—so effective—so popular and yet so new—it is rapidly succeeding soap. Try it for washing dishes—try it for washing anything—everything; only try it—for your own sake and ours. A house without Pearline is "behind the times."

We do a business of over $300,000 yearly, and our Cash sales of Dinner, Tea and Toilet Sets, Silver Ware, Lamps, etc., amounted to $41,000 in 1889, aside from our Tea and Coffee sales. HAVE YOU NOT A WORD FOR JESUS?

"O Lord, open Thou my lips: and my mouth shall show forth Thy praise."—Ps. 51: 15.

Have you not a word for Jesus? not a word to say for Him?

He is listening through the chorus of the burning seraphim:

He is listening; does He hear you speaking of the things of earth, Only of its passing pleasure, selfish sorrow, empty mirth?

He has spoken words of blessing, pardon, peace, and love to you,

Glorious hopes and gracious comfort, strong and tender, sweet and true;

Does He hear you telling others something of His love untold, Overflowings of thanksgiving for His mercies manifold?

Have you not a word for Jesus? Will the world His praise proclaim?

Who shall speak if ye are silent? Ye who know and love His name.

You, whom He hath called and chosen His own witnesses to be,

Will you tell your gracious Master, 'Lord, we cannot speak for Thee?'

'Cannot!' though He suffered for you, died because He loved you so!

'Cannot!' though He has forgiven, making scarlet white as snow!

'Cannot!' though His grace abounding is your freely promised aid!

'Cannot!' though He stands beside you, though He says, 'Be not afraid!'

Have you not a word for Jesus? Some, perchance, while ye are dumb,

Wait and weary for your message, hoping you will bid them 'Come';

Never telling hidden sorrows, lingering just outside the door,

Longing for your hand to lead them into rest for evermore.

Yours may be the joy and honor His redeemed ones to bring,

Jewels for the coronation of your coming Lord and King.

Will you cast away the gladness thus your Master's joy to share,

All because a word for Jesus seems too much for you to dare?

Yes, we have a word for Jesus! we will bravely speak for Thee,

And Thy bold and faithful soldiers, Saviour, we would henceforth be:

In Thy name set up our banners, while Thine own shall wave above,

With Thy crimson name of Mercy, and Thy golden Name of Love.

Help us lovingly to labour, looking for Thy present smile,

Looking for Thy promised blessing, through the brightening 'little while.'

Words for Thee in weakness spoken, Thou wilt here accept and own,

And confess them in Thy glory, when we see Thee on Thy throne.

—Frances Ridley Havergal.

"So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north," Ezekiel 8: 5.

At one o'clock on a December afternoon, through Damascus Gate we are passing out of Jerusalem for a journey northward. Ho! for Bethel with its stairs, the bottom step of which was a stone pillow, and Jacob's well with its immortal colloquy, and Nazareth with its Divine Boy in His father's carpenter shop, and the most glorious lake that ever rippled or flashed:

Blue Galilee, sweet Galilee

The lake where Jesus loved to be;

and Damascus with its crooked street called Straight, and a hundred places charged and surcharged with apostolic, evangelistic, prophetic, patriarchal, kingly and Christly reminiscences.

In travelling along the roads of Palestine, I am impressed as I could not otherwise have been, with the fact that Christ for the most part went afoot. We find Him occasionally on a boat, and once riding in a triumphal procession, as it is sometimes called, although it seems to me that the hosannas of the crowd could not have made a ride on a stubborn, unimpressive and funny creature like that which pattered with Him into Jerusalem, very much of a triumph. But we are made to understand that generally He walked. How much that means only those know who have gone over the distance traversed by Christ. We are accustomed to read that Bethany is two miles from Jerusalem. Well, any man in ordinary health can walk two miles without fatigue. But not more than one man out of a thousand can walk from Bethany to Jerusalem without exhaustion. It is and you will have to climb up among the rolling stones and descend where exertion is necessary to keep you from falling prostrate. I, who am accustomed to walk fifteen or twenty miles without lassitude, tried part of this road over the Mount of Olives and confess I would not want to try it often, such demand does it make upon one's physical energies. Yet Christ walked it twice a day—in the morning from Bethany to Jerusalem, and in the evening from Jerusalem to Bethany.

Likewise it seemed a small thing that Christ walked from Jerusalem to Nazareth. But it will take us four days of hard horseback riding, sometimes on a trot and sometimes on a gallop, to do it this week. The way is mountainous in the extreme. To those who went up to the Tip-Top House on Mount Washington, before the railroad was laid, I will say that this journey from Jerusalem to Nazareth is like seven such American journeys. So, all up and down and across and re-crossing Palestine, Jesus walked. Ahab rode. David rode. Solomon rode. Herod rode. Antony rode. But Jesus walked. With swollen ankles and sore muscles of the legs, and bruised heel and stiff joints and panting lungs and faint head, along the roads, and where there were no roads at all, Jesus walked.

We tried to get a new horse other than that on which we had ridden on the journey to the Dead Sea, for he had faults which our close acquaintanceship had developed. But after some experimenting with other quadrupeds of that species, and finding that all horses, like their riders, have faults, we concluded to choose a saddle on that beast whose faults we were most prepared to pity or resist. We rode down through the valley and then up on Mount Scopus and, as our dragoman tells us that this is the last opportunity we shall have of looking at Jerusalem, we turn our horse's head towards the city and take a long, sad and thrilling look at the religious capital of our planet. This is the most impressive view of the most tremendous city of all time. On and around this hill the armies of the crusaders at the first sight of the city threw themselves on their faces in worship. Here most of the besieged armies encamped the night before opening their volleys of death against Jerusalem. Our last look! Farewell, Mount Zion, Mount Moriah, Mount of Olives, Mount Calvary! Will we never see them again? Never. The world is so large and time is so short, and there are so many things we have never seen at all, that we cannot afford to duplicate visits or see anything more than once. Farewell yonder thrones of gray rock, and the three thousand years of architecture and battlefields. Farewell sacred, sanguinary, triumphant, humiliated Jerusalem! Across this valley of the Kedron with my right hand I throw thee a kiss of valedictory. Our last look, like our first look, an agitation of body, mind and soul, indescribable.

The Scene of a Tragedy.

And now, like Ezekiel in my text, I lift up mine eyes the way toward the north. Near here was one of the worst tragedies of the ages, mentioned in the Bible. A hospitable old man coming home at even-tide from his work in the fields, finds two strangers, a husband and wife, proposing to lodge in the street because no shelter is offered them, and invites them to come in and spend the night in his home. During the night, the ruffians of the neighborhood conspired together, and surrounded the house and left the woman dead on the doorstep and the husband, to rally in revenge the twelve tribes, cut the corpse of the woman into twelve parts and sent a twelfth of it to each tribe, and the fury of the nation was roused, and a peremptory demand was made for the surrender of the assassins, and the demand refused, in one day twenty thousand people were left dead on the field, and the next day eighteen thousand. Wherever our horse to-day plants his foot, in those ancient times a corpse lay, and the roads were crossed by red rivulets of carnage.

Now we pass on where seven youths were put to death and their bodies gibbeted or hung in chains, not for anything they had themselves done, but as a reparation for what their father and grandfather, Saul, had done. Burial was denied these youths from May until November. Rizpah, the mother of two of these dead boys, appoints herself as sentinel

To Guard the Seven Corpses from beak of raven and tooth of wolf and paw of lion. She pitches a black tent on the rock close by the gibbets. Rizpah by day sits on the ground in front of her tent, and a vulture begins to lower out of the noon sky seeking its prey among the gibbets, Rizpah rises, her long hair flying in the wind, swinging her arms wildly about, shoos away bird of prey until it retreats to its eyrie. At night she rests under the shadow of her tent and sometimes falls into a drowsiness or sleep. But the step of a jackal among the leaves or the panting of a hyena arouses her, with the fury of a maniac, she rushes out on the rock crying. "Away! Away!" and then, aming the gibbets to see that they still bear their burden, returns again to her tent till the swooping wing from the midnight sky or the growling monster on the rock again wakes

The Tireless Watcher.

A mother watching her dead children through May, June, July, August, September and October! What a vigil! Painters have tried to put upon canvas the scene and they succeeded in sketching the hawks in the sky and the thers crawling out from the jungle, but they fail to give the wanness, the earnestness, supernatural courage, the infinite self-sacrifice of Rizpah, the mother. A mother in the watching the casket of a dead child for one night exerts the artist to put upon canvas a mother for six months of midnights guarding her whole family dead and gibbeted upon the mountains? Go home, Rizpah! You are awfully tired. You are sacrificing your reason and your life for them whom you can never bring back to your bosom. As I say that, Rizpah turns upon me and cries, "How dare you tell me to go home? I am a mother. I am not tired. I might as well expect God to get tired as for a mother to get tired. I watch for those boys when they lay upon their breast in infancy and I am not going to forsake them now that they are dead. Interrupt me not. There stoops an eagle must drive back with my agonized cry. This is a panther I must beat back with my club."

Do you know what that scene by our road in Palestine makes me think of? It is no usual scene. Right here in these three cases by the American sea-coast, there are a thousand cases this moment worse than that. Mothers watching boys that the rum-saloon, that ar of hell, has when he comes staggering through the hall you say that young man is yet alive? No, dead. Dead to his father's entreaties. Dead to his mother's prayers. Dead to the family where he was reared. Dead to all the ambitions that once inspired him. Twice only a corpse of what he once was. Gibbeted before God and man and angels and devils. Chained in a death that will not loosen its grasp. His father is asleep, his brothers asleep, his sisters are asleep, but his mother watching him, watching him in the night. He has gone up to bed and fallen in

She looked only seven of the slain. American herhood and American wifehood, this mot are looking upon seventy of the slain, bands of the slain. Woe! Woe! Woe! In the same place where Joseph and Mary found their boy—in the temple. What do I mean by that? I mean: you do your duty toward God and toward your child, and you will find him after awhile in the kingdom of Christ. Will you say "I do not have any way of influencing my child." I answer you have the most tremendous line of influence open right before you. As you write a letter, and there are two or three routes by which it may go, but you want it to go the quickest route, and you put on it "via Southampton," or "via San Francisco," or "via Marseilles," put on your wishes about your child, "via the throne of God." "Before they call I will answer" Well, you say, I am clear discouraged about my son, and I am getting on in years, and I fear I will not live to see him converted. Perhaps not, nevertheless I think you will find him in the temple, the heavenly temple. There has not been an hour in heaven the last one hundred years when parents in glory had not had announced to them the salvation of children whom they left in this world profligate. We often have to say, "I forgot," but God has never yet once said "I forgot." It may be after the grass of thirty summers have greened the top of your grave, that in the earthly temple. It may be fifty years from now when, some morning, the towers are chiming the matins of the glorified in heaven that you shall find him in the higher temple which has "no need of candle or of sun, for the Lord God and the Lamb are the light thereof." Cheer up, Christian father and mother! Cheer up! Where Joseph and Mary found their boy you will find yours—in the temple. You see, God could not afford to do otherwise. One of the things He has positively promised in the Bible is that He will answer earnest and believing prayer. Failing to do that, He would wreck His own throne, and the foundations of His palace would give way, and the bank of heaven would suspend payment, and the dark word "repudiation," would be written across the sky, and the Eternal Government would be disbanded, and God Himself would become an exile. Keep on with your prayer, and you will yet find your child in the temple, either the temple here or the temple above.

Out on the Western prairies was a happy but isolated home. Father, mother, and child. By the sale of cattle quite a large sum of money was one night in that cabin, and the father was away. A robber who had heard of the money one night looked in at the window, and the wife and mother of that home saw him, and she was helpless. Her child by her side, she knelt down and prayed among other things for all prodigals who were wandering up and down the world. The robber heard her prayer and was overwhelmed, and entered the cabin, and knelt beside her and began to pray. He had come to rob that house, but the prayer of that woman for prodigals reminded him of his mother and her prayers before he became a vagabond, and from that hour he began a new life. Years after, that woman was in a city in a great audience, and the orator who came on the platform and plead gloriously for righteousness and God was the man who many years before had looked into the cabin on the prairie as a robber. The speaker and the auditor immediately recognized each other. After so long a time, a mother's prayers answered.

But we must hurry on, for the muleteers, and baggage-men have been ordered to pitch our tents for to-night at Bethel. It is already getting so dark that we have to give up all idea of guiding the horses, and leave them to their own sagacity. We ride down amid mud cabins and into ravines where the horses leap from depth to depth, rocks below rocks, rocks under rocks. Whoa! Whoa! We dismount in this place, memorable for many things in Bible history, the two more prominent, where of old they made ministers, and for Jacob's dream. The students of this Bethel Theological Seminary were called "Sons of the Prophets." Here the young men were fitted for the ministry, and those of us who ever had the advantage of such institutions will everlastingly be grateful, and in the calendar of saints, which I read with especial affection, are the doctors of divinity who blessed me with their care. I thank God that from these theological seminaries there is now coming forth a magnificent crop of young ministers who are taking the pulpits in all parts of the land. I hail their coming and tell these young brothers to shake off the somnolence of centuries, and get out from under the dusty shelves of theological discussions which have no practical bearing on this age, which needs to get rid of its sins and have its sorrows comforted. Many of our pulpits are dying of humdrum. People do not go to church because they cannot endure the technicalities, and profound explanations of nothing, and sermons about the "eternal generation of the Son," and the difference between sub-lapsarianism and supra-lapsarianism, and about who Melchisedec wasn't. There ought to be as much difference between the modes of presenting truth now and in olden time, as between an express rail-train and a canal-boat.

A Theological Seminary,

Theological Pin Making.

Several years ago, I went up to the door of a factory in New England. On the outside door, I saw the words "no admittance." I went in and came to another door over which were the words "no admittance." Of course I went in, and came to the third door inscribed with the words "no admittance." Having entered this, I found the people inside making pins, beautiful pins, useful pins, and nothing but pins! So over the outside door of many of the churches has been practically written the words "no admittance." Some have entered, and have come to the inside door, and found the words "no admittance." But persisting, they have come inside, and found us sounding out our little niceties of belief, pointing out our little differences of theological sentiment—making pins!

JACOB'S DREAM.

But most distinguished was Bethel for that famous dream which Jacob had, his head on a collection of stones. He had no trouble in this rocky region in finding a rocky pillow. There is hardly anything else but stone. Yet the people of those lands have a way of drawing their outer garment up over their head and face and such a pillow I suppose Jacob had under his head. The plural was used in the Bible story and you find it was not a pillow of stone, but of stones, I suppose, so that if one proved to be of uneven surface he would turn over in the night and take another stone, for with such

he would probably often change in the night. Well, that night God built in Jacob's dream a long, splendid ladder, the feet of it on either side of the tired pilgrim's pillow, and the top of it mortised in the sky. And bright immortals came out from the castles of amber and gold and put their shining feet on the shining rungs of the ladder, and they kept coming down and going up, a procession both ways.

I suppose they had wings, for the Bible almost always reports them as having wings, but this was a ladder on which they used hands and feet to encourage all those of us, who have no wings, to climb, and encouraging us to believe that, if we will use what we have, God will provide a way, and if we will employ the hand and the foot, He will furnish the ladder. Young man! Do not wait for wings. Those angels folded theirs to show you wings are not necessary. Let all the people who have hard pillows, hard for sickness or hard for poverty or hard for persecution, know that a hard pillow is the landing-place of angels. They seldom descend to pillows of eider-down. They seldom build dreams in the brain of the one who sleeps easy.

Superb Dreamers.

The greatest dream of all time was that of St. John with his head on the rocks of Patmos, and in that vision he heard the seven trumpets sounded, and saw all the pomp of heaven in procession cherubic, seraphic, archangelic. The next most memorable and glorious dream was that of John Bunyan, his pillow the cold stone of the floor of Bedford jail, from which he saw the celestial city, and so many entering it, he cried out in his dream: "I wished myself among them." The next most wonderful dream was that of Washington sleeping on the ground at Valley Forge, his head on a white pillow-case of snow, where he saw the vision of a nation emancipated. Columbus slept on a weaver's pillow, but rose on the ladder let down until he could see a new hemisphere. Demosthenes slept on a cutler's pillow, but on the ladder let down arose to see the mighty assemblages that were to be swayed by his oratory. Arkwright slept on a barber's pillow, but went up the ladder till he could see all England a-quake with the factories he set going. Akenside slept on a butcher's pillow and took the ladder up till he saw other generations helped by his scholarship. John Ashworth slept on a poor man's pillow, and until he could see his prayers and exertions bringing thousands of the destitute in England to salvation and heaven. Nearly all those who are to-day great in merchandise, in statesmanship, in law, in medicine, in art, in literature, were once at the foot of the ladder, and in their boyhood had a pillow hard as Jacob's. They who are born at the top of the ladder are apt to spend their lives in coming down, while those who are at the foot, and their head on a boulder, if they have the right kind of dream, are almost sure to rise.

Took the Ladder Up

I notice that those angels, whether in coming down or going up on Jacob's ladder, took it rung by rung. They did not leap to the bottom, nor jump to the top. So you are to rise. Faith added to faith, good deed to good deed, industry to industry, consecration to consecration, until you reach the top, rung by rung. Gradually going up from a block of granite to pillar of throne.

That night at Bethel, I stood in front of my tent and looked up and the heavens were full of ladders, first a ladder of clouds, then a ladder of stars, and all up and down the heavens were angels of beauty, angels of consolation, angels of God, ascending and descending. "Surely God is in this place," said Jacob, "and I knew it not." But to-night God is in this place, and I know it!

REDEEMING THE SLUMS.

THE NOBLE GOSPEL WORK THAT IS BEING DONE AT THE MARINERS' TEMPLE.

Pastor Avery's Call—A Strange Experience—How an Unruly Audience was Conquered—Worse than Heathendom—Outside Evangelistic Work—A Devoted Wife as a Fellow-worker—Carrying the Message of Divine Love to the Centre of Sin in New York.

THE purification of the slums and the saving of the homeless and the castaways, is the great problem of mission work in New York. Much good has been accomplished, particularly within the last ten years; but a great deal yet remains to be done. Of Gotham's 1,700,000 of population, it is estimated that there are fully 200,000 souls who, attached to no religious denomination, and careless in their lives, have no means of hearing the Gospel message except through the city missionary. One of the most vigorous agencies of the Lord among the waifs and castaways in lower New York at the present time is the Mariners' Temple, of which the Rev. J. F. Avery is pastor. The temple is situated on the corner of Henry and Oliver streets, and is a substantial-looking edifice. It is in the heart of a thickly-populated section, and almost within a stone's throw of the Bowery, Chatham Square and the Five Points.

Mr. Avery came to this city from Halifax, N. S., in October, 1887. In the latter city he had been eminently successful as a pastor, having founded and for fourteen years occupied the pulpit in the Third Baptist Tabernacle Church. A business correspondent in New York, wrote him a letter which stirred up his Christian activities in a remarkable manner, by its vivid portrayal of the moral condition of the poor in lower New York, where the criminal, the castaway, the intemperate and the ignorant were in urgent need of Gospel workers, and especially of a leader who could organize and conduct a continuous campaign against sin at its very headquarters. The proposition was a startling one, as its acceptance involved the sacrifice of a prosperous pastorate, and other sources of income attached. Still, the godly preacher did not shut his ears to the call. He talked over it with his wife and with several friends, and was at times almost dissuaded from considering it further. His congregation, too, hearing of the matter, met and emphasized their devotion to him, adding the hope that he would remain in Halifax. But it rang in his ears; it sounded like a voice from heaven that outweighed all arguments, and he decided to go to New York and look over the ground for himself.

"If these things are true," he said to his wife, before starting, "it's a question in my mind whether I am doing right in staying here in Halifax."

His friends deprecated the step. It was a foolhardy experiment, they said, and he would regret the sacrifice.

"If the Lord so willed," said the sturdy evangelist, "in forty-eight hours my family and I would be ready to go to Japan in His service."

And so it was settled. The trip convinced him of the truth of the representations. But the field was a forbidding one. He would have to work among the very dregs of the big metropolis, the waifs and strays of the slums. For, in all the city there was not a more godless district than the neighborhood of Oliver and Henry streets, where he was called to hold up the Cross to the vile and miserable creatures, who filled the low lodging-houses and rickety tenements, swarmed in the alleys and staggered along the uneven sidewalks; the brazen and bloated, the vicious frequenters of such haunts as are constantly under the eyes of the police. His Christian heroism, born of faith in God and an intense desire to be the means of bringing his fellow-men to the Saviour, alone enabled him to take up the burden he had undertaken.

"I remember," said Mr. Avery to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "that at the first Sunday service we attended, there were only thirty-five persons present. There were more in the evening.

Next Sunday, a few more came. I had been foolish enough to expect a crowd to greet a new pastor, and I was discouraged. My wife cried quietly over it. There were very few men to be got at; the change in the Maritime laws and the decline in American shipping had made them scarce in the neighborhood. I tried the lodging-houses and with some success. With my wife and secretary, I visited many of these places, and after every such visit the occupants came out in good numbers to the services. There are few church-going families in this neighborhood, yet our little temple is crowded on Sundays. On Sunday last, we had over sixty at communion, and in the evening our out-door praise meeting was attended by hundreds. Our prayer meetings have averaged one hundred for months past and our Sunday School has doubled in numbers. We have a Band of Hope between seventy and a hundred strong."

These modest statements by the pastor convey but a faint impression of the great work that is going on in the district of which the Mariners' Temple is the centre. Many have been converted by his ministrations and under God's blessing are now living as Christians and women should live, "clothed and in their right mind." A great moral improvement is visible in the locality. The lodging-houses, which were formerly the haunts of the vicious and criminals, have united in thanking Pastor Avery for his glorious crusade against vice, and especially for the fact that their patrons are no longer drunken and quarrelsome.

It is an inspiring picture, on Sunday mornings, to see the crowds flocking into the temple while the strains of the cornet come from within to attract the passer-by. Oswald and Ernest, the two young sons of the Pastor, are the cornetists.

"I used to be always saying, 'I wished we had a cornet in the temple,'" said Mr. Avery. "I believed it would help to arouse the congregation. One day I saw a German musician on the street and asked him if he could play sacred tunes. He said he could play anything; so I took him in and started him with 'Hold the Fort.' It was such a success that I kept him right along. By and by, my sons learned to play and when the cornetist went home to Germany, they took his place. They were very enthusiastic about it and quite took me by surprise when I brought a cheap cornet they had purchased in the Bowery and went on to the roof of the house to practice. They were soon efficient enough to lead in the services."

"My first experience with a temple audience," Mr. Avery continued, "was one that I am not likely to forget. The crowd was tremendous to the verge of disorderliness. Roughs were out in numbers, and after the service had fairly begun, they stamped and thrashed on the floor, walked around and made much noise that was almost deafening. One of the deacons said: 'Let me go to the Oak Street Station for a couple of policemen.' 'What for?' I asked. 'To deal with these young fellows who have gone in to have some fun.' 'Well, little,' said I, although feeling somewhat nervous. 'Don't get a policeman till I tell you then spoke to the audience. 'My friend, I am here in the Master's name, and to do as He bids. Now, I shall treat you as gentlemen and expect to be treated as a gentleman in return. I am a Christian, and if I cannot rule you by the Gospel, I certainly shall invoke the law. Thou shalt not be as big as an elephant, if he is in my way. My God, I would walk down the hall and take him by the ear, and lead him out. You stand by me, wouldn't you? All who will stand by me, hands up!' Up went every hand in the hall, and peace and order were restored in the congregation. I had no more trouble after that."

A touching incident related by Mr. Avery was the funeral of Baby Ah Lone. "A messenger came to go to Mott Street. There, opposite the Joss house, the heathen temple, we saw on the door the white emblem that a little coffin was be carried out. Up-stairs we came upon several Chinese families gathered in sympathy. The father we found was a Christian, in the little coffin lay a floral cross. Never has emblem look more beautiful, or speak such volumes as did that cross on the face of that dear little babe. The father told of his hope in Christ, and how two other ones had been called over there. He had said that Jesus was the resurrection and the life.

We longed for the gift of tongues as we Chinese, Italians, Germans, and others shed their tears of true neighborly sympathy. Avery finds time to devote himself to a great deal of effective outside work among the cabmen, the car-drivers, the homeless, the sick, the poor, and others. Many thousands of Bibles and other Christian publications are distributed monthly. An interesting field of activity is the Chinese Sunday School, connected with the temple. The record of his special mission work is published in Buds and Blossoms, a little periodical which the pastor edits. The course of his visits throughout the district meets many curious types: white women with Chinese or Japanese husbands, educated men and women who have fallen from respectability to the uttermost depths; starving families whom he supplies with bread and clothing enabled to do this by generous contributors, people who never saw a Bible, and who have heard it read. To these the Gospel message is brought with a sincerity that always secures a hearing. In this evangelistic work, Mr. Avery is greatly assisted by his accomplished wife, a most devout Christian lady, whose whole life, like his own, has been passed in the service of the Master. Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Avery given on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, together with a picture of the Mariners' Temple, and a typical group of men who have been attendants there, and of whom have shown in their reformed and upright lives, the effect of the ministrations they have enjoyed.

Many of our readers who sympathize with this effort to reach, with Gospel influence, the outcasts of the city who drift here from all parts of the world, and who would like to aid Mr. Avery with gifts of money, clothing or literature, may send their contributions to J. F. Avery, Mariners' Temple, Henry street, New York.

Preferred to Gold—Starving Little Heirs—What a Lawyer Saved in a Fire—A Romantic Story of a Picture.

Merchant's Dislike of Gold was Explained recently to a correspondent of an Indianapolis journal. He was complaining of having received payment in gold of $3,000, and vowing he would not accept any such sum in that way again. On the respondent expressing his surprise, and saying that he had always supposed that gold was preferred as a medium of exchange, the merchant explained his objections. If he had the amount in greenbacks he could have put them into his bank, and received credit without delay. Not so with gold. The bank declined to credit him with the sum because a gold coin when worn may not be worth its face value. So he took it to the Treasury and asked notes for it. The Treasury officials made the same objection and the merchant waited until while each coin was weighed. Then three hundred dollars were handed back to him marked with a stamp to indicate that they were short weight. He was told to send them to the mint where they would receive their actual value. He added that business men generally are aware of the inconvenience and loss, and prefer paper money, as is not always so. Not many years ago the gold dollar was preferred by everyone to the silver dollar, and would purchase more. But now that business men are sure that the Government is able and willing to redeem the notes, they would rather have its promise to pay than actual payment. The fact is a practical proof of their faith in the Government. Faith in God may be similarly tested. When men prefer present gain at the cost of religious principle we may be sure, whatever they profess, that their faith in God's promise is weak. (Mark 10: 29, 30.)

Three Children, Heirs to Little Fortunes, were found starving in the street in upper New York last week by a policeman. He investigated their case and took them into court where he told their story to the justice. He said they were the children of a baker who some months ago was doing a prosperous business. He had saved up $15,000 which was in a local bank. A year ago his wife acquired the habit of drinking to excess and, after he had made many efforts to reclaim her, he gave way to despair. He became so miserable that he resolved to leave the neighborhood and go West. He wrote to the cashier of the bank where his money was, requesting that the $15,000 be retained until his children came of age, when each of them was to receive $5,000. In the meantime the interest was to be applied to their support. No one seemed to have known that the father had made this provision for the children and, as the mother had deserted them, they were turned into the street and left to starve. They were in a pathetic condition—lacking the necessities of life while an income sufficient for their support was provided for them. The children were not blamable because they did not know of the money; but the same excuse cannot be made for God's children who might receive riches of grace if they would claim them at His hands. They have not "because they ask not." (James 4: 2.)

A Lawyer Made an Amusing Blunder during the great fire at Seattle, Wash. A local journal says that when the fire was raging and it became evident that the building in which a prominent lawyer had his offices must be consumed, he ran up to his office to save what he could. He had a very valuable library and some manuscript volumes which represented the hard work of many years. He rapidly gathered some that he was most anxious to save, but there were more than he could carry and he picked up first one and then another only to discard them for some that were still more precious. While he was hesitating between them, the firemen raised a cry that he must get out of the building instantly or he would lose his life. In the excitement of the moment he seized the first book within reach and ran for his life. He rushed down the stairs and did not look at the book until he was safe on the pavement. Then he looked at it and found that he had saved the city directory! His chagrin may be imagined as he thought of the valuable books that could never be replaced, left to burn, while he had brought one of little value. What he did in those moments of terrible haste, men are doing all through their lives, in securing the world's prizes that are valueless in eternity, and this in spite of Christ's warning: Seek not what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink neither be ye of doubtful mind. (Luke 12: 29, 31.)

A Romantic Story of a Picture is related by an art journal, of Boston, Mass. In describing the pictures in the last art club exhibition, it calls attention to one by Mr. J. M. Stone, and tells its history. It appears that in 1870, the artist was studying in Munich. He attended a great festival there, in which there was a procession of men and women in classic costumes. One of the girls made a deep impression on him. She was a Greek of remarkable beauty. Her costume was extremely simple, and she wore no ornaments, but a string of pearls around her neck. He made a hasty surreptitious sketch of her very roughly, but, as he supposed, sufficient to guide him in painting her picture. He set to work on the painting the next day, but he failed. Try as he would, he could not recall the peculiar charm of her beauty, and eventually he gave up the attempt. Late last year, to his astonishment, he recognized the original of his picture in a lady whom he met in Broadway, New York. He knew her in a moment and saw how his brush had failed to reproduce her features. It did not occur to him then, though it did afterward, that nearly twenty years had passed and the lady could not be the one he had tried to paint. The mystery was soon explained when he succeeded in getting an introduction to her. His Munich acquaintance had married a Hungarian noble in 1870, and she and her husband were in New York on a visit last year. The lady whom he saw on Broadway was their daughter, and she was so like her mother that the artist begged her to sit for him that he might finish the picture so long laid aside as a failure. She consented and the picture is the one now exhibited. It must be very gratifying to the daughter, if she loves her mother, to learn that she is the exact image of what her mother was at her age. A similar joy ought to be the aspiration of every Christian. The world cannot see his Father in heaven, but He in whom the Spirit dwells may hope that "reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord may be transformed into the same image" and so the world may see God in him. (II. Cor. 3: 18.)

A Man was Imprisoned in a Church at Utica, N. Y., last week. The sexton of a church in Columbia street was aroused from his bed after midnight by a young man in an excited condition. He said he had lost a friend and believed he was in the church. The sexton would not believe him; but the young man said that he and his friend had been drinking heavily, and were making their way home with difficulty when his friend suddenly disappeared. After going home and sleeping off some of the effects of the liquor, he became concerned about the companion of his debauch who lived with him. He searched for him but without success. Then he tried to recall the events of the evening, and remembered that the last he saw of the missing man, was of his trying to open the door of the church. The sexton knew that the door had been open late in the evening, so the story might be true. He went to the church and there they found the young man sitting on the altar steps. He had become partially sober and had tried to get out, but finding the door had been locked since he entered, concluded he would have to stay there all night. It cannot be said of him that he got no good by going to church; for he did get rest of body and the recovery of his senses from the stupor of intoxication, but it was not necessary to go to church to get those. As it is with so many others who do go to church decorously and at proper hours, the spiritual good which he really needed, he was not seeking and did not find. (Eccles. 5: 1.)

An Appeal by a Destitute Young Widow is under the consideration of a Baptist church in New Brunswick. About twelve years ago a deacon, who was eighty-three years old and a widower, made an offer of marriage to a young woman. As he was said to be very wealthy and had no children living, she accepted him with the expectation that she would inherit most of his fortune. She claims that she was a good and loving wife to him and during the past twelve years has waited upon him tenderly and devotedly, nursing him in his sickness and infirmity with the most patient kindness. Recently the deacon died in his ninety-fifth year and the widow expected to receive her reward. But the deacon had left no property at all. She was puzzled; but on examining the report of the Baptist church for the year 1889, she found an acknowledgement of $70,000 received from him during that year. To a charitable institution he had deeded the home in which they lived, and he had given the last $15 in money that was in the house to a charity a few days before he died. The widow contends that she is entitled to some portion of her late husband's estate and appeals to the church for restitution, as she is penniless and has received nothing for all her years of service. She has evidently been unjustly treated by the aged deacon and her appeal to the church will doubtless meet with a liberal response. Her situation should, however, be a warning to all who marry from sordid motives. Others, too, who need such a warning, are they who engage in the Lord's service in the hope of reward and not because they love Him. (Ezek. 33: 31.)

JESUS CRUCIFIED.

S. S. LESSON FOR NOV. 23, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 23 : 33-47 ; GOLDEN TEXT, ISAIAH 53 : 6.

What it is to be Crucified with Christ—Paul's Sole Reason for Glorifying—The Believer's Sins Borne to the Cross—Sin Condemned in the Flesh—Salvation from Sin Purchased—Salvation from Perdition Included—Christ's Companions in Death—A Deliberate Outrage—Magnanimity in Suffering—Pilate's Epitaph—The Last Agony.

"GOD forbid that I should glory," said St. Paul, "save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Gal. 6 : 14.) "I determined not to know anything among you," he said, writing to the polished, æsthetic, cultured Corinthians, "save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." (1. Cor. 2 : 2.) And yet, to human eyes, nothing could be more repulsive, more degrading, than to have any connection with a man who had suffered the extreme penalty of the law, and who died the death of a condemned criminal. Paul did not look at things from the outside. He spoke "not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (1. Cor. 2 : 13), and taught by the Holy Ghost, Paul esteemed that cross of Christ which awakened the scorn and derision of men, as of his position, as "a Hebrew of the Hebrews," his prestige, as a Pharisee, his very righteousness according to the law. What, then, was left to him? As Paul, nothing; as a member of Christ, more than a thousand worlds! Paul cast in his lot with a crucified Saviour, not in mere sympathy, but as being one with Him, a member "of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones." (Eph. 5 : 30.) "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me." (Gal. 2 : 20.) But how could Paul be "crucified with Christ" when Christ was already dead, and risen, and ascended to the right hand of God? By virtue of his union with Christ, Paul took His place with Jesus on the cross, as though he had been crucified, and were now a dead man; and as though another life now breathed in his body, that of Christ, to whom he referred absolutely everything.

Our beloved Lord, in coming to the cross, first bore our sins in His own body to the tree (1. Pet. 2 : 24), that He might take them away, and we who are forgiven can never forget the moment when, for the first time in our lives, we knew we were "not condemned," but pardoned by our God. But He also condemned sin in the flesh, by yielding His flesh to die, "that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." (Rom. 8 : 3, 4.)

Jesus was ever the example of all He taught. When another man, Simon the Cyrenian, was called upon to help Jesus to bear His cross, "a great company of people and of women," bewailed Him. But Jesus turning unto them, said,

"Weep Not for Me."

Every step he took was in His Father's will, and it was "meat" to Him to do the will of Him that sent Him, He needed no human sympathy. And just as soon as any of God's children know the luxury of a renounced will, human sympathy in any trial becomes not only unwelcome, but almost intolerable. Human sympathy appeals to the flesh, to the self-life in us; if that is crucified with Christ, there is nothing in us which responds to the human sympathy of others. "But weep for yourselves, and for your children." At such an hour, Jesus "knowing all things that would come upon Him," was quite free enough from His own sufferings to offer a sympathy which was not human to the daughters of Jerusalem, whose city was going to be destroyed some years later.

To add to the ignominy which they heaped on the Son of God, it was arranged by His bitter persecutors that two malefactors, real criminals, should be put to death with Him. How little they knew that, in their bitter hate, they were only confirming the proofs to be found in their Scriptures, that He whom they thus dealt with was the Messiah, the Son of God. "The Scripture was fulfilled which saith, and He was numbered with the transgressors." (Mark 15 : 23; Isa. 53 : 12.) All that man could do to class Him with evil-doers was done, judged and unjustly condemned by the civil law, led out to execution with two thieves, put upon the cross in the very place where the bones of evil-doers were whitening in the sun, so that the very place was named "the place of a skull." He "truly made His grave with the wicked in His death." (Isa. 53 : 9.) Let us not be surprised if the enemy succeeds in making men class those who "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," with the worst and most evil of men. It is enough for the disciple that "he be as his Master." (Matt. 4 : 25.)

On His way to the cross, His heart, at leisure from itself, took part with the daughters of Jerusalem; upon the cross, His compassion flowed out towards those who murdered Him. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Intense as was His physical, mental, spiritual agony, He denied Himself even at that hour, resisted not evil, even when it had come to such a length, loved His enemies even when their enmity was taking His life of blessing from the earth. "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh" as He did with the affections, and lusts or desires. Oh, who can say in the light of the cross of Jesus, "I have done this?" It was a masterpiece of divine love when, in addition to His prayer, "Father forgive them," He could add, "for they know not what they do." He who was sinned against with this diabolical murderous hate, covets and obtains the death-blow which was due to His murderers.

"Herein is Love."

"They parted His garments," and so the Scripture was fulfilled again. "And the people stood beholding"—but not understanding. Perhaps they thought it did not particularly concern them. Oh, if they had understood they would never "have crucified the Lord of glory." (1. Cor. 2 : 8; Acts 3 : 14, 15.) The rulers spiritual and temporal were "willingly ignorant," they might have known, for they had access to the Scriptures. But they carried on their fearful game to the last, and "derided Him, saying, He saved others, let Him save Himself, if He be Christ, the Chosen of God."

It was the strongest argument which the flesh could use. Every instinct of self tends to self-preservation. If this man assumes to have divine power, and a divine mission, let Him exercise it at this crisis. "But He came to practise and to teach self-renouncement. He was indeed a king, but a king of a self-renounced world, and self-renounced subjects. "My kingdom is not of this world." Flesh and blood could not inherit His kingdom, the weapons of its warfare were not carnal, and to save Himself would be to overthrow His kingdom. He could save His enemies, but not Himself. The very soldiers took up the cry, and urged it upon Him, offering Him vinegar, as though to assuage His pain, and give Him a chance to muster His strength for a mighty effort to disengage Himself. But they misunderstood Him, He tasted it,—even then He did not retaliate—but "He would not drink." (Matt. 27 : 34.)

The only accusation which Pilate would allow was the simple inscription, "This is

The King of the Jews."

His only condemnation was His just, but unacknowledged title. But it is this title which the world will never allow. What would become of the greedy selfishness of rich people's dinner-parties if Jesus reigned in the house? He would cast out the invited guests, like the buyers and sellers in the temple, and bring in the poor, the maimed and the blind. What would become of titles, places of honor, etc., in the Christian Church if Jesus reigned? Some there are who would have to take a back seat, and some little Samuel, or some Peter the fisherman, who was full of the Holy Ghost, would take the lead. What would become of the courts of law if men learned to "resist not evil?" No, world and the flesh have gone too long hand-in-hand to let Jesus of Nazareth be king.

One of the malefactors "railed on Him," catching up the popular cry, said, "If thou Christ, save thyself and us. But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds, but this Man has done nothing amiss." Oh what an illustration of the truth, "What glory is it if when ye be buffeted for your faults ye shall take it patiently; but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God. For even hereunto are ye called, because Christ was suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow His steps." (1. Pet. 2 : 20, 21.) The thief was buffeted for his faults, and took it patiently. Christ endured grief, suffering wrongfully (19,) and took it patiently as our example. The thief turned to make one appeal to Him to whom he bore witness, "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." And He who seemed so powerless, exercised there upon the cross His royal prerogative, "Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." He exercised His priestly prerogative, and at the most unlikely of moments, when, to human eye all was lost, and He saved this precious soul.

Then followed those hours of darkness, darkest of all in the soul of Him on whom all our iniquities were laid, extorting from Him the cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" But it came to an end, the tremendous transaction was accomplished, the Prince of Life yielded for a time, and for a purpose, death, "the veil of the temple was rent in the midst" by the hand of God, Jesus "gave up the ghost," and one more soul was won. The captivation, seeing what was done, "glorified God saying, Certainly this was a righteous man, truly this was the Son of God." (Matt. 27 : 54.)

KARL'S SELF-SACRIFICE.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Nov. 23 : "The Law hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Isa. 53 : 6.

ABOUT eighteen years ago a German emigrant landed in New York. He was a gloomy, taciturn young man, who had made no friends during the voyage. Usually the monotony of life at sea draws fellow-voyagers together, though they may have been strangers when they embarked; but this man avoided the passengers and crew alike and would sit silent and meditative apart. He spent but a few days in New York and then went West. He secured employment, but still continued morose and unsociable. No one knew anything of his past save the inferences they drew from his manual dexterity in his business. He lived alone and gave no one his confidence. A short time ago he died and then his secret came out. On his death-bed he sent for a Roman Catholic priest, though up to that time he had not attended church nor given anyone reason to suspect that he belonged to any church. To the priest he told the story of his past.

One night about two months before his arrival in New York he was hurrying through the streets of a town in Germany, when he heard his name called. He turned to see who spoke and was accosted by his cousin, Karl.

"O, Otto," said the latter, "I am sorry you are still visiting that house. Do, I entreat you, break that connection. Think of your aged mother and father. Disgrace is sure to come of it, and how they would suffer."

"Hush," said Otto, "you do not know that have been there. No one but you knows I have ever been. I hope you will never speak of it. I am not likely to go again."

"You have promised me that, before," said Karl, "but I am sure you have been there to-night. You would not be in this part of the town if you had not. I ought to have told your father about it, but I could not bear to see the pain it would give him. Otto, he is so fond of and so proud of you, it would break his heart to know how you live."

"Tell you I am not going again, so you need say anything about it to him or anyone else." Otto hurried on, leaving his cousin standing alone in the street.

He stood meditating a few minutes. He loved his cousin dearly. Still more did he love the uncle and aunt, Otto's parents, who had been so dear to him in his orphanhood. He was years older than Otto and had taken an interest in his welfare. He had tried to see the young man treading a path of duty and had exerted himself to reclaim him. It was a useless effort, but he could not abandon him. He thought of that white-haired couple whose hearts were bound up in their handsome, bright boy.

But if he were to make an appeal to the woman whose lures were chains binding him to crime. Surely she would be moved by the picture he could draw of the home that would be his if she continued her connection with him. He would try, at all events, what an appeal he could make, and try it at once. He retraced his steps in the direction from which Otto was going when they met, and knocked at a door in a quiet street near at hand. There was no answer. He knocked more loudly and getting no answer he tried the door. It opened and he entered. All was silent and he went into a room where he saw a light burning. He fled from it in terror; for on the floor lay the dead body of a man. A ghastly wound showed that he had been murdered.

The first impulse was to give an alarm and call on the police; but how could he account for being in the house without putting Otto on his guard. That Otto had been discovered by the police, that they had fought and Otto had been killed, Karl felt sure. That would account for the embarrassment just now, and his repeated injunctions of secrecy. He had been making an appeal to the policeman at the corner of the street when these thoughts occurred to him; he turned aside. The officer, however, had seen him coming and waited. Karl passed on and the policeman wondered at his strange behavior and quietly followed him to his home. The crime was not discovered until the next day, but the policeman had not forgotten the circumstance. He reported it and Karl was arrested.

All who knew him expected that he would easily vindicate himself. No one but the police believed him guilty. His character was so good, there was such an utter absence of anything that his guilt was incredible. But why was he in that house? He must explain that. To the surprise of everyone, Karl would give no defence. He pleaded, "not guilty," and would give no explanation of his presence at the scene of the crime. His uncle, his father, went to see him in the prison and expostulated with him, but without avail. He began to speak of him as of one who had deceived them. He had been leading a double life, they said; his irreproachable character had only been a cloak to hide his vices. Heard of their words and his heart quailed, his lips were sealed. Better, he thought, to suffer than that he should save himself by telling all he knew, when the words alone could deliver him and would break the hearts of that aged couple whom he loved.

He opened manly bearing, his unflinching face impressed the judge, who suggested that he was shielding the real culprit. He told him to tell all he knew. But Karl was silent and he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for life. Since that time he has lived in silence. Otto unable to bear the reproaches of conscience, yet lacking courage to throw himself up, and fearing that by some intimation he might betray his guilt, came to the end, leaving his cousin to suffer. His confession was not made until death was near at hand.

It has been forwarded to Germany in the hope that the innocent man may be released. These eighteen years Karl has borne the punishment of his cousin's crime. What the aggregate suffering of those dreary years must have been, none but he knows. Yet even that could save Otto only from imprisonment. It could not save him from the tortures of remorse, and the judgment of God. It was a fuller atonement that was needed by a sin-burdened world. That, too, has been wrought, but what must have been the suffering it entailed upon Him of whom we read, "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all"?

THE JUDGMENT OF THE LIVING.

A PREMILLENNIAL ASSIZE OF THOSE WHO WILL BE ALIVE AT CHRIST'S COMING.

Why Christ's Coming is Delayed—The Fruits of the Victory of Armageddon—A Multitude Divided Into Two Parties—The Throng Bearing Antichrist's Mark—The Test—The Reward and the Doom.

BY REV. W. EASLAW, M. A.

THE victory to be gained by the Lord over Antichrist and his armies at His glorious appearing will not be merely for just vengeance, but also for the establishment of His kingdom and His throne upon earth. Satan, as the god of this world, has for a long time been blinding the minds of those who will not believe. (See II. Cor. 4: 4.) Now his power is to be destroyed, and the Lord is to come as the Second Adam, to take to Himself His kingdom and to reign. For this He has waited; not because He could not have taken it before; but because in long-suffering and patience He delayed in order to give men time and opportunity for repentance.

The Lord Jesus Christ came into the world to be a King. To this end was He born: as He Himself said to Pilate, "For this cause came I into the world." (John 18: 37.) The great Lord is fully entitled to His kingdom and glory; therefore we see Him proceeding to perform before He sits down. Then He will reign, and not by Himself alone, but with His fellow-heirs, and others who are to be partners of His dominion. At the time of the Lord's victory at Armageddon, He was followed by the armies of heaven on white horses. They had no swords with them, neither did they fight; but were partakers of the victory which their champion gained. As David conquered Goliath, and the Israelites entered into his triumph—so these followers of the Lord Jesus overcome because He overcame.

Now we see the same Lord going forth to execute judgment. Again He is doing this work alone; His followers will partake of the triumph with Him; though subsequently, when His kingdom is established, some of them will sit upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Some, we are told, will have rule over ten cities; some over five; and some over two. Next we have the Lord proceeding to the valley of Jehoshaphat, or the Valley of Decision. There He shall sit upon the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all nations.*

Be it observed that the numbers here assembled are called in Scripture "nations"; and notice also that there is no resurrection of dead to swell the number of this multitude. They are merely "the quick," that is, living persons who were there at the time. They no doubt witnessed some of which were manifested on the great day of the Lord. They must have felt the solemn gloom of darkness which overspread the heavens when "the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood." (Rev. 6: 12.) They saw the flashing forth of the glory of the Lord at His appearing over Jerusalem. Perhaps they had heard also of the sudden destruction which had fallen upon the armies round Jerusalem, and how Antichrist, the leader of them, and the

The Tremendous Signs

* All the nations were gathered to Armageddon by the imperial command of Antichrist. This great plain was not so much a battlefield, as a gathering-place for kings and nations. From these vast numbers we understand the military men were taken out for the siege and battle at Jerusalem. The remainder, whom we may designate as civilians, were still remaining there.

False Prophet, had been captured and cast into the burning pit. Solemnized and awaiting other ominous events, they must have remained in trembling suspense.

This multitude is composed of persons who under Antichrist's late rule were

Divided into Two Classes

of two kinds: those who were for him and bore his mark—and those who would not take his mark because they believed in the true Messiah. The latter were a remnant of believers gathered under the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom. Multitudes of such believers had been martyred, it is true; but still it would appear that multitudes also remained through the days of the Tribulation, and through the solemn time when the Lord was pouring out His wrath upon Palestine and the Lands of the Gentiles.

Be this as it may, here are gathered two kinds of people—those who are on Antichrist's side and those who are for the true Messiah. The former took part with their master in persecuting the Jews; and the latter (on the Lord's side) protested against this tyrannical and unjust persecution. They either openly or secretly helped the people of God who were hungered, or sick, or in prison. These are the people who are summoned before the Lord when He comes to sit upon the Throne of His Glory.

This throne is not the same as the throne of David, which is to be in the temple at Jerusalem; nor is it to be confused with the Great White Throne, which will not be set until the end of the Millennium, or a thousand years after this time. It is a particular throne for a particular purpose, namely for judging the "quick;" and they are only Gentiles. They are readily divided by the all-searching eye of the Judge upon His throne.

We read that "when the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory: and before Him shall be gathered all nations; and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: and He shall set the sheep on His right hand; but the goats on the left." Etc. (Matt. 25: 31-45.)

The Test

The righteous here are admitted to the joy of the Lord; but not for His finished work upon the cross, as we are in our dispensation: but for works of kindness which they have done to the Lord's brethren, the Jews; and, in them, to Himself. They are saved by Christ for their work, and for enduring to the end. Those on the left hand are condemned for rejecting the true Messiah and following the false one, and, on his behalf, persecuting the Jews. The accepted ones on the right hand, like other believers under the Gospel of the Kingdom, enter into the joys of their Lord in the Millennium. Those of them who had been martyred will reign with Him; and the remainder will enter into this kingdom of joy and liberty as subjects, to behold the glory of their King.

The Sentence.

Those on the left hand are consigned to everlasting punishment in the lake of fire. The Devil himself is not yet cast into that dreadful place; neither do we suppose that those who are here condemned are sent thither at once. The sentence is final; but it may not be fully carried out until the Great White Throne is set when the wicked dead of all kinds are to be judged. In the meantime, those who are so condemned will be put to death, like the other rebels round Jerusalem. They will then be reserved in Hades, until the Judgment-day.

Such is the judgment of the "quick," as far as I have been able to gather from Scripture. The view I have presented of it may be new and strange to some of my readers; but I am sure that it will bear investigation and inquiry. Moreover, I am convinced that it will be found in harmony with the Word of God; though it may be different from what is generally accepted.

FUNERAL OF THE FLOWERS.

IT was on a long slope, which at one side dipped into the warm valleys, and on the other side arose very high into the frosty air, so that on one boundary line lived Cactus and Orange-blossom and Camellia, and on the other resided Balsam-pine and Alpine Strawberry, and all kinds of growths between, that the Funeral of the Flowers occurred. Living midway in that slope of land there was a Rose, that in common parlance we called "Giant of Battle." It was red and fiery-looking, as if it had stood on fields of carnage where the blood dashed to the lip. It was a hero among flowers. Many of the grasses of the field worshipped it as a god; the Mignonette burning incense beneath it, the Marigold throwing its glittering coin of beauty before it, the Mistletoe crawling at its feet. The fame of this Giant of Battle was world-wide, and some said that its ancestors on the father's side had stood on the plains of Waterloo, and on its mother's side, at Magenta, and drank themselves drunk on human gore. But children are not to blame for what their ancestors do, and this Rose, called Giant of Battle, was universally adored. But the Giant got sick. Whether it was from the poisonous breath of the Nightshade that had insolently kissed him, or from grief at the loss of a Damask-rose that had first won his heart by her blushes and then died, we know not, but the Giant of Battle was passing rapidly away. There was great excitement up and down the slopes.

A consultation of botanical physicians was called and Dr. Eglantine came and thrust a thorn for a lancet into the Giant's veins, on the principle that he had too much blood and was apoplectic; and Dr. Balm-of-Gilead attempted to heal the pain by poultices; but still the Giant grew worse and worse. The Primrose called in the evening to see how the dying hero was, and the Morning-glory stopped before breakfast to see if he could do any good. Every flower or grass that called had a prescription for him that would surely cure. Neighbor Horsesorrel suggested acids, and Honeysuckle proposed sugars, and Myrrh suggested bitters; and Lady-slipper, having taken off her shoes, said that all the patient wanted was more quiet about the room. But too much changing of medicine only made the Giant more and more sick, and one afternoon, while sitting up in bed with the cup of honeysuckle to his lips and with the fan of the south wind fluttering in his face, his head dropped and he died. As the breath went out of him, a Clematis that had been overlooking the sad scene, said, "What time is it?" and cluster of Four-o'clocks answered, "A little past the middle of the afternoon." The next morning the funeral bells all rang: the Blue-bells and the Canterbury-bells, and the Foxglove-bells and Hare-bells, and all Flowerdom, came to the obsequies of the Giant of Battle. He was laid out on a trellis and on a catafalque, such as dead monarch never had, of Dahlia and Phlox and Magnolia and Geranium and Gladiola. There was a great audience of flowers. Solemnity came down upon them. Even the Cockscomb stopped strutting, the Larkspur ceased her fickleness, and Snapdragon looked gentle, and Snowdrop seemed to melt, and Bachelor's-button wished it had some one to express its grief to. The Passion-flower came in and threw herself on the pale cheek of the Giant with most ardent demonstration of affection. Amaranth and Hydrangea and Daffodil and Spiderwort and Spirea, having come far through the night and dew, stood around with their eyes full of tears. The funeral services began. Rose-of-Sharon and Lily-of-the-valley took part in them. The Star-of-Bethlehem sang a hymn to the tune of "Bonny Doon." A Forget-me-not said a few words of commemoration. The Heartsease arose, with words of comfort, and read the lesson of the day: "As a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more." And all the bells, Foxglove-bells and Blue-bells and Canterbury-bells and Hare-bells, prolonged the strain through all that day, tolling and tolling out, "No more!" "No more!" And thus ended the Funeral of the Flowers.

POOR STYLES OF HEAVEN.

WHERE is heaven? It is the question which every intelligent Christian asks, and he especially asks it in time of bereavement. When his loved ones go away from him, you say they are in heaven; but he says: "Where is heaven?" You know there are a great many theories in regard to it. The Mohammedans think that the good Moslems, as soon as they leave this life, come to a fragrant pool of water fed by streams from Paradise. They drink out of that fragrant pool, and their thirst is assuaged. Then they go into Paradise, and the trees have bells hanging on the branches, chiming whenever the air strikes them. They gaze upon the tree of life, which they say has so broad a shadow that it takes a swift horse one hundred years to race across it. They think that there is a river made up of wine and honey, flowing between banks of camphor, over beds of musk. They suppose that every spirit that goes into the future world has many attendants, with baskets and with chalices of pure gold. They suppose that the inhabitant of the future world sits down to a great banquet without any satiety, so that after a hundred years of eating and drinking the appetite is as good as at the moment the soul sat down. That is the Mohammedan heaven.

The Hindoo thinks that heaven is all about—merely a change of body. A vulture dies and his spirit enters a man. The man dies and his spirit enters the vulture; and so a great many transmigrations of the soul, absorbed in the spirit of the great Brahm.

The aborigines of America think heaven be situated beyond the great mountains. As you get beyond the great mountains there is a great river, and after you have passed that great river, there is a vast country, and as you have passed that wide country, there is a world of water, and in that world of water there are a thousand isles, beautiful with streams and trees, and there are buffalo and deer there; and all the departed red man has to do is to whip up his dogs, and go a-shooting to all eternity. The only kind of heaven worth going to, or to spend eternity in, is the Bible heaven. After reading the above account of the heaven guessed out by human ingenuity, turn to the Bible heaven, and read of the glorious destination of all those who love and serve the Lord. Through the pardon and mercy of Christ may all our readers get there!

BRIEF NOTES.

The American Bible Society has decided to issue New Testament in Hebrew for circulation among Jews.

The daily business men's prayer meeting, established in Bridgeport, Ct., last May is increasing in attendance and interest.

The cost of the liquor consumed in Great Britain during the past year was over $600,000,000, an average of $85 a family.

The first Protestant missionary landed in Japan 1854, and now the membership is over 25,000, with over 16,000 children in their Sunday Schools.

Sister Rapse Gertrude, the young Englishwoman, went to nurse the lepers at Molokai after Father Damien's death, has resigned. In a letter to friends, in Brooklyn she expresses disappointment at the failure of her mission.

The Chicago Christian Endeavor Union propose to have a building of their own at the World's Fair in 1896. This project was started by the Society connected with the Union Park Church, and receives the hearty approval of the pastor, Dr. Noble, and the other pastors of the city.

A Conference on Moral Instruction in Public Schools will be held in New York November 17, 18th, by about hundred accredited representatives of nine Protestant denominations. The object is to decide on measures to influence public opinion so as to lead to sound moral teaching being imparted in the common schools throughout the State.

A conference of persons favoring a Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution of New York, was called by the Committee appointed by the State Convention held in Syracuse in May last. The conference will be held November 11, in the Union Tabernacle Church, west 35th street, near Broadway. Church and Temperance organizations are requested to send delegates.

An English trading syndicate for Palestine has been authorized by the Sultan of Turkey who has granted a commission to a London syndicate, having at its head Lieut.-General Sir Andrew Clarke, for trading and constructing railway, etc., in certain parts of Asia, including Palestine. The development of the resources of Holy Land will form a prominent feature in the programme of the company.

There are now twenty-three bands called The Excelsior Band. The idea was started by Mr. F. Wilkins, of Newton Centre, Mass., with the object of helping the home and foreign work of the Congregational Church. He pointed out several ways by which one cent a day could be saved from ordinary expenses and persuaded about forty Christian people to make a band, each of whom was pledged to save a cent a day for a fund to be equally divided between the boards of home and foreign missions.

Col. Elliott F. Shepard and Mr. Augustus D. Shepard of New York, placed in the hands of the American Bible Society at its meeting on November 6th, bonds and other securities of the par value of $52,893.64, intended to be the beginning of a memorial fund of $100,000 in honor of their father, the late Fitch Shepard, income of which eventually is to be used to promote charitable purposes of the American Bible Society. Board of Managers passed a vote of thanks to the Messrs. Shepard for their generous gift.

CURRENT EVENTS.

November Elections—Gen. Booth's Reformatory Scheme—Secret Diplomatic History—Succi the Faster—the Pole by Balloon—A Negro Migration.

The Elections have been full of Surprises, all along the line, to the political parties. The House of Representatives is overwhelmingly democratic, that party having 154 majority, according to the latest calculations. A majority of the States showed democratic gains. Massachusetts elected Russell, (dem.) Governor; Pennsylvania elected Pattison, the gubernatorial candidate, of the same party. Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, New Jersey, Minnesota, Nebraska, Indiana, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, Connecticut, and New York, all show democratic gains in Congressmen. In Kansas in South Carolina the Alliance candidates Governor were elected. In New York, the legislature is now democratic. In the metropolis, Tammany triumphed over the Fusionist. Probably the most significant features of the contest were the defeat of Congressman McKinley, father of the new Tariff, by J. G. Warwick (see portrait in this column), by a very slight majority, and Delamater (rep.) by Pattison, for Governor of Pennsylvania by less than 5,000 majority. The vote in Illinois will send Palmer to the U. S. Senate to succeed Farwell. Nebraska gave a majority against Prohibition, the republicans losing all their Congressmen. Texas went to the front with the biggest majority of 100 for the democrats. The Speakership of the next House of Representatives will now fall to the latter party, and Lockwood (New York), (Texas), Bynum (Indiana), and McMillan (Tennessee), are spoken of in connection with office. In several eastern States the new law went into operation at the polls and proved satisfactory. Political observers claim the tariff had a great influence on the result all over the country this year.

General Booth of the Salvation Army has ended upon the greatest task of his life in the endeavor to redeem the unfortunate masses of England. He has purchased an old brewery at Redditch, London, and fitted it up as a school industry. He proposes to establish other centres of the work in different parts of the country, and afterward to extend it all over the United Kingdom. Funds have poured in upon him, together with valuable suggestions from friends of the poor and unfortunate and experiment has created a good impression the outset. The initial experiment has involved an outlay of nearly $40,000.

Chapter of Secret Diplomatic History has come to light in Europe, revealing, if it be true, a dire peril to which France was subjected during the last decade, but which, fortunately the peace of mind of that nation, its people dreamed of. During a visit to Paris, while Mahon was President, the Prince of Wales informed him that it was the purpose of Germany to make a second war on France, with a view to reducing it to a condition from which recuperation was well-nigh impossible. This startling piece of news was entrusted to an envoy who carried it to the Czar at St. Petersburg, and that ruler succeeded in dissuading the Emperor from carrying out his plan. Still, although the peril was thus averted, France has not forgotten the incident, and whenever Germany has strengthened her armies, her rival has also added to her military strength. This rivalry between these two nations is now costing them over five hundred million francs annually; once believing herself bound to add to her armament so as not to be caught napping by her enemy. It is almost inevitable that such a rivalry of affairs must yet deluge both countries with blood.

A Plan to Enable Even the Poorest Preacher to eloquent has been suggested by Rev. Dr.

Parker, the celebrated pastor of the Temple in London. In an address a few days ago, before the London Congregational Union, he advocated shorter discourses and the employment of the sermons of such distinguished orators as Chalmers, Spurgeon and others, so that the people might not be wearied by tedious preaching, but might hear something that would command their attention. He suggested the formation of a National Institute, open to preachers of all communions, as a supplement to their college education. The subject is attracting considerable attention abroad at the present time.

A Very Extraordinary Migration of Negroes is reported from Brazil and Havana. Last August a delegation of West Indian negroes appeared unexpectedly in Lagos, West Africa, and informed the British Governor of that province that that country was the home of their forefathers who had been kidnapped and taken to the New World as slaves. They were there as a committee to arrange for the return to their native land of many of their people. They spoke the language of Lagos imperfectly, yet clearly enough to establish their origin. They represented that thousands of negroes were ready to migrate thither, and leave the land where they had been slaves.

To Reach the North Pole by Balloon is the programme announced by two well-known French scientists, M. Besancon, an aeronaut and M. Hermite, an astronomer. They propose to start early next May in an enormous airship that will carry four tons, and which will be fully equipped with scientific apparatus, besides eight dogs, a sledge, a canoe warranted unsinkable and an abundance of provisions. They will start from Spitzbergen, cross the Pole and expect to reach some point of safety in America or Asia in ten days. They will take photographs en route. The Paris College of Aerial Navigation is backing the scheme with a degree of confidence in its practicability.

There are Signs of a Coming War Between the Western Union Telegraphers' Brotherhood, one of the most powerful and best organized labor organizations in the United States. There are fully 10,000 members of the Brotherhood, in good standing, and it has branches in every city in America. Certain recent discharges of employees by the Western Union Company have given rise to the rumor that the company is endeavoring to break up the Brotherhood and this has aroused the operators to the necessity of action. Although the Brotherhood, as a body, is on record as opposing strikes except as a last resort, it is now said to be laying plans with a view to a strike on a most extensive scale, should the circumstances warrant such a course. Strikes have already taken place at a few points, but they were purely for local reasons, and the places of the strikers were quickly supplied.

A Test of the Validity of the New Tariff Law is now being made by the importers of New York city, many of whom assert that there was not a quorum present when the bill was passed in Congress. The suit is brought in the United States Circuit Court by Ballin, Joseph & Co., the immediate point in dispute being the imposition of increased duties on consignments of cloth from abroad, the tax on which is nearly 30 per cent. higher under the new bill. Importers are watching the suit with interest, although it is not expected that the objections to the Tariff Bill will be sustained by any of the courts.

One of the Most Important Discoveries of the age, in an industrial sense, has just been made by a Chicago chemist named Hirsch, who has found a method of extracting aluminum from clay, at an expense of fifteen cents per pound. Aluminum, which possesses the strength and durability of iron, and is only one-fourth the weight of that metal, now costs five dollars per pound. The discovery may revolutionize the world of mechanics, as the new metal would, owing to its wonderful lightness and flexibility, be preferred to iron for the fronts of buildings, suspension bridge cables, steamships, telegraph lines, and a thousand other things. At present, iron costs something over four cents a pound; but aluminum, owing to its lightness and flexibility, would be as cheap for ordinary purposes.

To Live Forty-five Days without Food is what Giovanni Succi, the Italian faster has undertaken to do in New York City. He began his long fast on Wednesday last, and he is watched by physicians day and night to see that no food passes his lips. All the nourishment he receives will be what is derived from water and a cordial of his own concocting, which the doctors have agreed is not in the nature of nutriment. Succi is naturally a hearty eater, although during a long experience in the African deserts he learned to go without food many days at a time—once, it is said, being sixty days without nourishment. He is tall and sallow and loosely built, presenting a rather weak appearance, physically. A portrait of Succi is given in this column.

AMONG THE CHURCHES.

Dr. Gregg, of Boston, Mass., has accepted the invitation of the Lafayette Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, to succeed Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

Evangelist E. W. Bliss has conducted a successful series of services in Moline, Ill. He is now preaching at Grace M. E. Church, Boston, Mass.

The China Inland Mission has now 383 missionaries in China, of whom 35 went out during the past year. The income of the society last year was $257,420.

Forty-three young ladies of New Orleans, members of different religious bodies, are carrying on Christian work among the Chinese in that city.

We are glad to learn that Mr. James McGranahan, who has been so long disabled by sickness, is improving in health and that the prospect is good that he will be fully restored.

There is now a Christian Endeavor Society among the Dakota Indians. The name of the Society in the Dakota language is "Jesus Htakiniwacinskanpi Okokaciye."

Meetings held by Messrs. Stevenson and Bell in DuPage and Blendensville, Ill., have resulted in many conversions; thence they went to Sherbrooke, Canada, at the invitation of the churches of that place.

Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt has been holding meetings at Chicopee Falls, Mass., assisted by Professor and Mrs. D. B. Towner, thence they went to Scotch Plains, N. J. Afterwards they have promised to go to Howell, Mich.

The "Floating Society of Christian Endeavor" is doing good work among sailors. Many have signed the Endeavor pledge, slightly modified to meet the needs of the sailors, and the good effects of it are already seen on several of the revenue cutters and other vessels.

The next General Conference of Christians of all nations, convened by the Evangelistic Alliance, will be held in Florence, Italy, immediately after Easter, in April, 1891. The expenses, amounting to about $5,000 will be defrayed by the British and American Alliance.

The Ninth Annual Baptist Congress will be held November 11-13th, in New Haven, Conn. Among the speakers are the following: Revs. C. D'W. Bridgman, D.D., T. T. Eaton, D.D., Francis Bellamy, Leighton Williams, E. A. Woods, D.D., Warren Randolph, D.D., Prof. S. Burnham, John Humpstone, D.D., and A. H. Strong, D.D.

Rev. Somerset Gardiner's services, at Paterson, N. J., are being much blessed. Dr. Thomas Hall, in whose church the meetings are being held, writes that they are growing in interest and in the number of hearers. "A number of persons have been deeply awakened, and there have been some decided cases of conversion."

Another Missionary Society finds itself crippled in its work in India, by the effects of the Silver Bill, passed at the last session of Congress. The Baptist Missionary Union, of Boston, will require $53,000 more this year than last to do the same work. They get 2500 rupees for $1000, whereas formerly they could get 2800 for it.

Mr. D. L. Moody will open a series of meetings in Chicago on November 23d, in connection with his Bible Institute work. He will be followed by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, who is to remain through January, and possibly longer. Mr. Moody sends out a cordial invitation to all interested in Bible study and Christian work, who wish a new inspiration in the study of the Word of God to attend the Institute for such a period as they find convenient. As far as possible they will be accommodated in the Institute Buildings. Those who desire accommodations or further information should write at once to R. A. Torrey, Superintendent, 80 W. Pearson street, Chicago, or to Mrs. S. B. Capron, Superintendent of the Ladies' Department, 232 La Salle avenue, Chicago.

"If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious."—

1. Peter 2:3.

I THINK there can be very little doubt that Peter is here quoting from Psalm 34:8, "O taste and see that the Lord is good." The passage actually runs—"O taste and see that Jehovah is good:" and Peter does not hesitate for a moment to apply the passage to the Lord Jesus. Evidently to Peter the Lord Jesus was Lord and God. He remembered the voice which he heard in the holy mount, when he was an eye-witness of His majesty: "For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Let us continually pay divine honor to our Lord Jesus Christ.

Peter's Special Knowledge.

Peter had special knowledge of his Lord; for you remember that, on one occasion, he said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." (Matthew 16:16, 17.) That he should speak of His graciousness is also very natural; for he had himself tasted of His grace. This same Peter had denied his Master with oaths and cursings; and when, after his Lord was risen, He sent a message to him by Magdalene, then he tasted that the Lord is gracious.

Taking these words out of the mouth of Peter, I shall ask you, my brethren and sisters, have you tasted that the Lord is gracious? No doubt is meant to be insinuated by Peter's use of the "if," for he believed that those to whom he wrote had feasted upon the love of the Lord Jesus. Assuredly I would suggest no doubt concerning my brethren by the use of the same words; yet I would put you upon a search, to make assurance doubly sure. Dear friends, have you tasted that the Lord is gracious? Is this fact past conjecture? Can you say positively, "We know in our own hearts the grace of our Lord Jesus?"

I. First, then, here is A Royal Dainty.

"The Lord is gracious." Jesus is full of grace. in His person, nature, and character. He would never have been Immanuel, God with us, if He had not been gracious. What brought him from above to take upon Him our frail humanity? What held Him here while He endured "such contradiction of sinners against Himself?" What but His natural and innate graciousness as "the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth?" What did He here that was not gracious? Was He not always feeding the hungry, healing the sick, teaching the ignorant, comforting the mourners, or raising the dead? If you read His life—take which you will of the four evangelists—you cannot help feeling that you have beheld the face of One who was altogether love, goodness, graciousness. "He went about doing good." From His lips poured gracious words, and from His hands streamed gracious deeds.

But, beloved, we have found Him exceeding gracious in the manner of dispensing his salvation. When we were His enemies, He reconciled us to God by His blood; and when we had neither thought nor wish to come to Him for salvation, He came to us with salvation. Many of us are living trophies of His conquering grace—grace unsought, and utterly undeserved. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Though we now love the Lord our God, we cheerfully confess that "we love Him because He first loved us."

Since we have come to know our Lord, how gracious have we found him to be! "He giveth more grace." No word can express all that Jesus has been to us; but this word "gracious" goes some way towards it. We have had many inward struggles and conflicts, and much we have needed grace; but as our need such has been our supply. It has sometimes gone hard with us, my brethren, while pressing on to God; but whenever we have been ready to slip with our feet, the Lord has held us up, for His mercy endureth forever. Ay, and when we have stumbled, He has set us on our feet again, for He is always gracious.

The Lord is gracious, for

He Hears Prayer.

Our course is set with memorials of the Lord's answering our pleadings. That bedside of ours is a witness that the Lord is good. That old arm-chair, where you are wont to kneel, could tell strange stories of what you have sought and found. Everything has gone cross with you in business, but you have bowed the knee and found grace to help in time of need. You cried unto the Lord when the child was sick, and you were comforted. You sought the Lord when the dear one was dead in the house, and you found the living God to be your consolation as you went to the open grave. When your wounds were bleeding through bereavement they were stanching in answer to prayer. When your soul's windows were darkened, grace was the sun which came shining into your gloom. You have knelt before the Lord at times when you have been weighed down with a heaviness which you could not explain, and none could remove; but you have not knelt in vain. You came forth from the closet rejoicing, for the Lord was gracious to you, and had put off your sackcloth, and girded you with gladness.

Special Feasts.

I hardly need remind you of these things, because they must be ever present with your soul. The Lord has been gracious, very gracious to you. Beloved, some of you have been favored with choice times, "as the days of heaven upon the earth." You have climbed the mount and been alone with God; and there you have seen your Lord and heard His voice in your soul. Oh, the rapture of intimate fellowship with God! Those to whom the Lord is gracious often enjoy an experience which they would not dare to tell, lest they should seem too familiar.

But you do not know, and I do not know, to the full, how gracious the Lord is. Remember that He is preparing us for a glory inconceivable. Everything is working out His perfect design. Here in this world we look upon the wrong side of the fabric that is being woven in the loom of Providence. When we ascend to heaven we shall see the true pattern to which Christ is working by all His dealings with us, and then we shall perceive that He was carrying out a plan of grace by which we were made meet for glory.

II. But now let us think of

A Special Sense

which is exercised in tasting that the Lord is gracious. Faith is the soul's eye by which it sees the Lord. Faith is the soul's ear by which we hear what God the Lord will speak. Faith is the spiritual hand which touches and grasps the things not seen as yet. Faith is the spiritual nostril which perceives the precious perfume of our Lord's garments, which smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia. Faith is also the soul's taste by which we perceive the sweetness of our Lord, and enjoy it for ourselves. Taste is an inward sense, a private, personal appreciation. To taste is to know a thing in the essence, outcome and enjoyment of it. To taste is to exercise discernment, to make discovery, and to gain assured knowledge of a thing. Apply this to the fact that the Lord is gracious, and what a weighty matter it is to taste!

In order to spiritual taste, there must be apprehension. After apprehension must come appropriation. Martin Luther saith: "And this I call tasting, when I do with my very heart believe that Christ hath given Himself unto me, and that I have my full interest in Him, that He beareth and answereth for all my sins, transgressions, and harms, and that His life is my life. When this persuasion is thoroughly settled in my heart, it yieldeth wonderful and incredible good taste." In order to taste we must make a very close appropriation. "O taste and see that the Lord is good." Take to yourselves the blessings of His grace. Appropriate Christ, I pray you. Let each one take Him to himself, and then you will know what tasting means.

But taste further means appreciation. Have you ever enjoyed the truth that the Lord is gracious? "Oh," say you, "not as I should like to do." You have well spoken; but I only asked about a taste, I did not inquire about feasting to the full. "To be filled with all the fulness of God" is our inheritance; but just now it will suffice if we so taste as to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. Have you found all fulness dwelling in Him? There is no grace like the grace which comes from a dying Christ, a risen Christ, a reigning Christ, a coming Christ. Jesus is all in all to all who are in Him.

III. So, having considered the spiritual sense which tasteth heavenly meat, I now come to press upon you

A Searching Question.

"If so be that ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." Dear friends, this is a very simple elementary question. I may not know what a dish is made of; but I may have tasted it, for all that. I may be grossly ignorant of the mysteries of cookery, but I can tell whether a dish is sweet to my taste. Our self-inquiry is about a primary matter, in which even new-born babes in grace are concerned.

However simple is the question, it goes to the root of the matter; it takes in the whole case of a man's soul. If you only know the Lord Jesus in the book; if you only know Him by the ear through the preacher; what do you know to purpose? You are sick, and there is the medicine; you can interpret the doctor's Latin, and so you ascertain every drug in the mixture. Will this heal you? No; you must taste the medicine, you must receive it into your inward parts, or you will derive no benefit from it. Suppose you are hungry, and before you is spread a meal. There is the menu, and you read it through. Yes, you approve of every course. Will this satisfy you? No; you must sit down and handle that knife and fork and get to work, or you will remain hungry. I do not need to press you: you are a willing guest at the table. But when I set forth the truth that the Lord is gracious, many of you are content to hear about it, and do not proceed to make the test and taste that the Lord is good. Oh, that you would Come to the Feast!

Those who rejoice that they have tasted that the Lord is gracious, yet confess it with a deep blush, because they have only tasted. Still there is a great deal in the tasting, for he that can taste will desire more. I fear the most of us must confess that we have only tasted that the Lord is gracious, whereas we might have been sitting in His banqueting-house, having our souls satisfied with the rich provisions.

Yet, blessed be the Lord, we have tasted. There is no getting this truth out of our soul's creed: we are sure of it. If a man has tasted a thing, he knows the flavor of it, and is not to be argued out of his knowledge. I have eaten sugar, and I find it sweet. Here comes a philosopher, and declares that it is sour. Go on, philosopher, and philosophize as long and as much as you like; but my palate defies your philosophy. When last I took quinine I held very dogmatic views as to its bitterness. Men who have tasted are inclined to be positive. But, cries one, "It must be wrong to be dogmatic." I care nothing about hard words: I will be dogmatic about what I positively know. When a man is sure of things, why should he pretend to be undecided? There are some matters about which I am past argument, past the power to doubt;

the graciousness of my God is one of these. This I have seen, and handled, and ; from henceforth let no man trouble me die is cast.

me tell you when we have tasted the busness of the Lord. When a man is ill, en loses his taste. The most delicious s nauseous to him. "His soul abhorreth inner of meat." But such is the flavor of uth that the Lord is gracious, that it is pleasant to us when we are sick than at other time. The love of Christ is a de-a refreshment for a sufferer. When our multiply and our spirits are depressed, s a gracious Christ more precious to us n the day of health and joy.

Lasts to Old Age.

en a man grows old he sometimes loses ower of taste. But the natural law is not e the spiritual world; for the older we get ore do we relish the grace of our Lord Christ. Believers grow more heavenly as get nearer to heaven; or at least, they d do so. As earth goes, Christ comes. t is very choice to us when we are young, hen we are gray-headed He is sweetness

We realize our Saviour more than ever, ve have a keener perception of the grace He has manifested towards us. Shortly all be with Him where He is, and shall be-and share His glory: then will He be sur-ingly delightful to our perfected taste. I put the question—Do you know any- about it? I fear that some of you are at sea as to what I mean. You know the of fine old port, or sparkling champagne; now the delicacies of the season: but you never tasted that the Lord is gracious, and mile as you hear the question; for it seems u too absurd. The Lord quicken you! ou this morning find Christ, who is the rection and the life!

So we come to a series of

e text puts it, "Desire the sincere milk of ord." If you have tasted it, long for more Do not hanker after the dilutions and ctions of "modern thought," which you nd vended in many a pulpit. Beware of erous foods, compounded of speculations esies. If you have ever tasted the true of the Word, you will not desire any other; ere is none like it. When the other foods into the market, say to yourself, "The s good enough for me, and Christ Jesus is est of the best."

rt, expect to grow, and pray that you may You, dear friends, have tasted that the is gracious; and now you desire to be shed up in sound doctrine, that your e nature may be developed. How do Chris-grow? If they grow aright, they grow all Some grow in knowledge, but they do not in virtue: this is as if a child's head should gger and bigger, and the rest of his body d remain as it was: he will become a hid-creature, or will die of water on the brain. say they will make their hearts grow, and e mind their heads. This also will not do. ust grow up in Christ in all things. How? by drinking in the unadulterated milk of the l. The Gospel is ne soul; but if it is adulterated, it may con- spiritual disease and death into the soul. mischief can be done by the pulpit than by her agencies put together. Brethren, pray inisters; for if they preach the Gospel and , so that the Gospel loses its power; or if preach the Gospel and poison, so that it s to be pure truth, then the people cannot , nor even live.

xt, "if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is ous," abhor the garlic flavor of the world's I mean those alluded to in the first —malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and il speaking." If the Lord is gracious to be gracious to others. If you have tasted the Lord is gracious, do not carry about you the bitterness of malice, or the sour-ness of envy. Have no savor of cunning about you, nor the least taint of hypocrisy, nor the foul fang of evil speaking. A man that has tasted that the Lord is gracious ought to have a sweet mind, and a sweet mouth; he should judge charitably, and speak kindly of others. If you do not do so, I advise you to taste again and again that the Lord is gracious, till the powerful flavor of grace shall abide in the mouth, and cast out all the noisome savors of hate.

A Purifying Taste.

I want you, also, dear friends, if you have tasted that the Lord is gracious, to lose taste for all earthy trifles. Some amusements we are supposed to condemn; but we have not condemned them indiscriminately. We have nothing to say about their suitability for those who can be satisfied with them. Many diversions may be suited to those whose natures can be gratified with them. As to the children of God, we judge for them by quite another rule. Let the ox have its grass and the horse its hay; but souls must feed on spiritual meat. A farmer takes me over his farm. I see that he keeps swine, and I see the men bring out for them barley-meal and wash. The farmer asks me what I think of it. I think it is capital stuff for those for whom it is prepared. I do not condemn the swine for enjoying it, nor the farmer for providing it for them. But if he asks me whether I will have some of the wash, I am quick at answering, "No, farmer, not I." "Why not?" "Well, I have other tastes. In your own house I have eaten bread and beef, and other foods are not what I hunger for." That is all I say. Those who want vain amusements may but if we have tasted that the Lord is gracious, our tastes are henceforth spoiled for the world's impure delights. To dispute about tastes is acknowledged to be unwise; and when sin and holiness become matters of taste with men, we shall soon see what manner of men they are. The taste of the world will never be our taste. If it were we should have grave cause to fear that we were of the world.

Judge Themselves by Their Likings;

Lastly, if you have tasted that the Lord is gracious, taste again. There is no stint at my Lord's table, and you need not restrain yourself from fear of surfeit or sickness. You can never partake too freely of the grace of Christ Jesus your Lord. No man was ever made ill by feeding too freely upon heavenly things. No, the dainties of heaven create an expansion of soul, and as we receive, we gain capacity to receive yet more holy gifts. We feast on when once we have tasted that the Lord is gracious. The Lord feed you to the full, for Jesus' sake!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Consul Prebensen of Vardoe.*

TO chronicle all the arts by which Mr. Prebenson had risen to his present eminence, would make a considerable story in itself. Suffice it to say that he had not been scrupulous in his choice of means. Having secured the Lapp trade, he began to throw out his toils in other directions. The house of Vang, though greatly hampered by want of resources, had yet a considerable income from its ships that sailed every spring on sealing and whaling expeditions into the Arctic Ocean; but to equip those expeditions required capital and two bad fishing seasons brought Prebensen his opportunity. He rarely gave credit, except in return for a mortgage. If the mortgage was overdue, he foreclosed without mercy. The bad seasons, thus, instead of reducing his income, rather increased it; for it enabled him to sell out a lot of his customers, who henceforth became his tenants and depended upon him for their food and the roof over their heads.

Like a big spider, he sat in his office and threw his toils over the town, until there was scarcely anybody outside of the circle of government officials who was not more or less involved in his web. For the members of the government he professed the greatest respect. When he had moved away from the back street and established himself in roomier quarters, he went south to Bergen, and returned with a wife whose family had extensive connections in the whaling and sealing trade.

He now began a social campaign, which ended with the surrender of the pastor, the major commanding the fortress, and all others who belonged to the official circles. They had formerly looked down upon him, and had taken the part of Mr. Vang, who was certainly a gentleman, and whose dinner-parties and balls had in earlier days, been the great events of the winter. But now Mr. Vang had all he could do to stand upon his legs. He could no longer afford to give balls and dinner-parties; and as Prebensen could, the people of quality who loved amusement, gradually deserted from the one to the other. . . . Prebensen was now the rich man of the town. He was richer than all the rest put together. Vang had been pushed to the wall; he had failed, lost every thing he had, and now carried on a modest little business as a junk-dealer and provisioner of ships.

Dead Among His Money-bags.

Prebensen saw in the distance the furious mob approaching. He grew suddenly pale as a ghost.

"Hansen! Jensen! Olsen!" he cried to the clerks; "bar the doors! Put up the iron shutters, quick! For God's sake, hurry!"

Swift as an arrow, he darted toward the money-drawer, which he pulled out, and rushed into the inner office, the door of which he closed behind him. The most conspicuous object there was a great safe, like that of a bank, which was built into the wall. . . . Emptying the contents of the drawer with nervous haste into a linen bag, and quickly collecting all papers of value on the desk, the consul, casting a terrified glance toward the window which the clerks were darkening with the huge shutters, unlocked the two heavily-bolted doors of the safe and stepped into the vault.

His son entered the room. Flinging himself against the huge door, with his whole weight, he slammed it and, beside himself with fear, yelled to the clerks to arm themselves with pistols and harpoons, or anything they could lay hold of. He did not hear the smothered shriek from within the safe; for he was about half way up the stairs, carrying an old rifle with a bayonet Prebensen had purposely had his safe so made that it could be hastily locked without the use of the elaborate combination. The inner bolts were supplied with springs Suspicious as he was, he had always been afraid that any one should discover how rich he was, and it had been his custom to quickly slam the door of the safe before admitting any one to the office. Now he stood within this narrow vault, numb with terror, pulling desperately at the heavy steel bars, which mocked his feeble efforts. The wealth he had labored for since his earliest years—for the sake of which he had sacrificed friendship, gratitude and affection, nay, his very soul—was round about him. Bags heavy with gold and silver coin, drawers full of precious securities—English consols, United States bonds, Prussian funds—all that was safest and best in the world of finance—all these things for which he had hungered, and for the sake of which he had loaded his name with curses, were within the grasp of his hand; but alas! how worthless were they to him now! A breath of vital air—would be a thousand times more precious . . . The consul, with a wild despair, grabs the steel bars of this door; but it is all in vain. A white mist swims about him; his blood throbs, and hammers in his temples; faint red flames dance before his eyes; an oppressive weariness steals over him; his limbs feel as heavy as lead. Wild, faint noises, through which pierce cries of terror: yes, he knows now what it means. His house is being plundered by the mob! So this is to be the end of all his ambition!

His faintness grew upon him, and out of it he gradually glided into the deeper unconsciousness of the long, long night.

Facing a Furious Mob.

Tobias, at the head of the angry mob, was pounding with a sledge-hammer at the door of Prebensen's mansion. In two minutes the whole door was broken into splinters. Tobias burst into the house with the crowd following after him.

"Where is Prebensen?" they yelled. "Let's find Prebensen."

At the head of the stairs stood a tall young girl of sixteen with an old unloaded rifle, with a make-anet at the end.

"Stand back!" she cried. "The first one who tries to pass is a dead man!"

A chorus of jeers came from the crowd.

Tobias, judging from the bayonet that the rifle was not loaded, raised his sledge and was about to knock it out of her hands, when some one broke wildly through the crowd and shouted: "Don't dare to touch her!"

The next moment Ingomar, had wrested the hammer out of the mate's grasp and lifted it threateningly over his head.

"Fall back!" he commanded. "Which of you is such a coward as to molest a lady?"

"We want Prebensen! We want Prebensen!" yelled a hundred voices.

"I beg of you friends to leave this house and not disgrace yourselves by further violence."

He stood now at Ragna's side, barring the way, so that no one could pass. He was confident too, that no one would attack him and Tobias least of all.

Within an hour the crowd had dispersed, and the Prebensen mansion was saved.

MR. AND MRS. H. M. STANLEY.

HOW the citizens of this country value heroic achievement will be seen during the next few months in the reception that will be accorded to Mr. H. M. Stanley, who arrived in New York on Thursday last with his bride, a portrait of whom is here given. That his reception will be enthusiastic almost beyond precedent is certain. In this country we feel a part proprietorship in Mr. Stanley. Though born a British subject, he became early in life an American citizen, and it was here that he received the training which fitted him for the magnificent work that he has done. As a soldier in the field during the war, and as the war-correspondent of a great journal, he proved his possession of the qualities which enabled him to carry out his formidable undertakings, and it was in that field that they were developed.

And what splendid achievements his have been! No man of our day has equal claims to the applause of the world. By sheer grit—the quality which we above other peoples admire most—he has overcome obstacles and pushed his way through difficulties that other men of no mean powers have deemed insurmountable. Taking up the work of exploration which Livingstone left unfinished at his death, he circumnavigated the great African lakes, fighting his way through hordes of savage cannibals and completing his work by a combination of the qualities of a military general with those of a scientific geographical explorer. He had to inspire his timid native followers with his own courage and with confidence in himself; to face the dangers of an unknown land peopled with unknown tribes, to navigate rivers in leaky boats, to shoot cataracts, to make a path through trackless forests, to conciliate savage potentates, to feed and control a large company of treacherous native carriers and to keep daily note of his observations. Beside these labors, incident to all his journeys, Mr. Stanley has founded the great Congo Free State in which he has displayed ability as an administrator and organizer of a rare order. He comes back to us now from the most difficult of all his exploits—the rescue of Emin Pasha. The thrilling incidents of that wonderful march and the new discoveries he made will probably be described in the lectures he will give during his visit.

Mrs. Stanley, whose portrait is here given, and to whom Mr. Stanley was married on July 12 in Westminster Abbey, is a lady well known in England. She is a friend of the philanthropist Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and is herself distinguished as the friend and teacher of ragged, homeless children. She has also gained reputation in art circles as the painter of exquisite pictures which have been exhibited at the Royal Academy.

JERUSALEM FROM OLIVET.

IN following the footsteps of Dr. Talmage to the Holy Land, as described by him in recent sermons at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD services in New York, we have published pictures of the various scenes in and about Jerusalem as he referred to them; we now give a picture of the city as a whole, as it appears from the Mount of Olives. From that vantage ground the spectator gets a panoramic view of the most interesting of all cities. Looking across the valley, he sees it spread out before him like a rug on the crest of the central hill. It was from that elevation that our Saviour looked upon the city and wept over it, as a mother weeps over a beautiful child persistent in evil courses. It was a fairer city than this that He saw in His childhood. Then the Temple was its most conspicuous feature, reflecting from its marble and gold the rays of the sun; now the mosque of the prophet rears its dome in its place and the Christian visitor, standing on the spot hallowed by our Saviour's tears, as he sees the profanation, has to weep, too. It was with pride that His disciples had pointed out to Him the beauties of the building, but the architectural grandeur could not blind His eyes to the unbelief, hypocrisy that made the Temple and its gorgeous ritual a mockery, nor shut out the scene that a prophetic vision spread before Him of the coming desolation, when one stone would not remain upon another. He saw the process of decay and its inevitable result, as He sees now under the decorous exterior of many a life the envelopment and result of a hideous moral deformity, and His gentle spirit still grieves though He would gather men together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings that will not.

There stands the city still, "beautiful for situation" as when the Psalmist wrote of it, and he bade her citizens: "Walk about Zion and and about her; the towers reof. Mark well bulwarks, coner her palaces tell it to the genon following." the glory is deted; her proud ritual eminence the dwellingce of the living i is taken from; and she is trod under foot of n until the time nes when she all look upon Him om she pierced l mourn. Then all she hear the d words: "Comt ye, comfort ye people, saith ur God. Speak comfortably to usaleam, and cry to her that her rfare is accomshed, that her inuity is pardoned: r she hath receiv of the Lord's nd double for all r sins." "And esons of strangs shall build thy ills and their kings all minister unto ee: for in my ath I smote thee, it in my favor have I had mercy on thee. . . and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.
BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

RICHARD MANSFORD proceeded to gather all his available resources for the defence of his "castle," and every member of the little corps was armed in some fashion. The two quatters took possession of a couple of rifles; Donald McLean handled his favorite and familiar pistol a little too fondly and lovingly for his consistency as a man of peace; Loonie was armed with an old blunderbuss, unloaded for the sake of his own safety, but capable of being of some service if matters came to close quarters. Phelim McGrath disdained all weapons save and except a shillelagh of the true Tipperary pattern, which he had brought with him from "Ould Oireland," and two others of less scientific shape but sufficient weight, to be used in circumstances might direct and require. "Av ye can't get a chance to spake for yourself," said Phelim, as he handled them, "shure nd it's wise to send a messenger that understands your maning."

The little garrison waited with patience the coming of the reckless and daring outlaws, who, in their hunt for plunder, knew neither mercy nor compunction, but with ruthless hand made steel or bullet the swift henchman of grim death.

Around the homestead the stately pines stood tall and dense, at other times a shelter and an ornament, but now a too effective screen to guard and cover the advance of these evil pilgrims of the night. From out their recesses came now and again some night-bird's shrill and startled cry, all the more startling on account of the tight-strung nerves of the inmates.

A little past the "witching hour of night" the dogs upon the farmstead seemed to scent some mischief in the air, and first one and then the other woke the echoes of the night by a loud, sharp bark. The Scotchman, who was standing by an open jalousie, peering into the darkness without, could not repress a growl. "Noo for it!" said he, looking to the priming of his pistol. "Dinna ye hear Douce and Pawkie? They wadna bark at auld Cloutie hissel' till they ken'd a glint o' his ee! Here they are!"

Sure enough they were, and a considerable gang of them, too. After a short survey, they proceeded to make arrangements for the attack in so calm and leisurely a fashion that it was evident that they thought their visit quite unexpected and unprepared for. Their illusion was rapidly dissipated, when at Marcus Little's word of command a smart fire was opened on them from the house. A rapid movement was made to the cover of the pines, and the consultation that followed was of such a length that Richard Mansford began to think they had retired for good. The gang was evidently dismayed by the presence of so large a force, but urged on doubtless by the bolder spirits among them, they decided to make one bold determined effort for the prize.

So a sudden rush was made for the door, and a desperate effort made to force it. The attempt was unsuccessful, and though it was rather awkward for the inmates to get a good shot at them, yet this position was altogether too warm to be pleasant. One of Phelim McGrath's supernumerary shillelaghs was flung at the head of a tall rascal who seemed to be the leader of the gang; at that moment Phelim himself got a smart crack from some missile or other to which he responded by howling such a marrow-piercing war-whoop as would have daunted and dismayed a whole faction at Donnybrook Green.

At length the attacking party had enough of it, and with a curse and a parting volley they gave way, and made off in anything but good order. The silence which immediately succeeded was broken by a deep groan from the lips of Richard Mansford, as he fell heavily to the floor.

Phelim, roused beyond all endurance by this sad catastrophe, leaped across the veranda and followed by Loonie and two or three of the men, gave chase, but the assailants, had cleared completely from the field. As they returned to the house, Phelim caught sight of a human form crawling along in the shadows of the garden palings, and pouncing on him as a cat springs at a mouse, he recognized the big ruffian whose yere weecked face. Tak' gude care o' him, Phelim. It's mair likely her Majestie may want a word wi' him. Lock him up and gi'e him somatt to eat."

"An' shure your hanner, an' wouldn't it be better to string him up, an' save the mate for an honest stomach?" said Phelim.

Richard Mansford had received a severe wound in the shoulder, and was unable at the time to see the man; but on discovering that it was he whom the Scotchman had seen running away from the spot where Rupert lay wounded unto death, and that he had now been leading a gang of robbers, it is not to be wondered at that he was anxious to guard him safely. He was confined in a roomy building of framed wood, in which the squatter usually kept his supplies of seed grain. A deep, angry-looking cut just above the temple gave proof enough of the Irishman's strength of muscle and exactness of aim. That cut when healed would surely leave a notable scar for life. As he sat there, sulky and silent, upon a bed of straw, it was easy to see, from the set of his lips, the lowering brows which thickly shaded a keen and piercing eye, that he was a man of determined purpose and no small strength of will. His features were regular and proportionate, and had it not been for the ineradicable stamp of devilry on his face, he might have been called handsome. He wore a curly black-brown beard and whiskers, short, but dense as brushwood, and this added a look of ferocity to his appearance. He had a remarkably good forehead denoting considerable mental powers, but these must have been sadly prostituted during his career of wrong and crime that had brought him to such a condition.

This was the man at whose hands Rupert Mansford had met his death. They had been companions in a life of sin, and his murder was an instance of the old adage concerning "honor among thieves." When Rupert Mansford had discovered that the man to be attacked was his own brother, he remonstrated with the "captain," and when he found that Richard's identity had been known to him, he lost control of himself, and they parted in anger. Having failed to change the "captain's" plan, there head he had broken with his shillelagh.

"By the bones of the blessed Patrick," said he, "he's understood the manm' I intended."

The capture was not made without much difficulty, for the fellow struggled hard, and it was not until one or two of Phelim's helpers had suffered in the strife that the man was brought to submit to the inevitable. No sooner had Phelim McGrath conducted his prisoner of war into the kitchen, where McLean was standing talking to Marcus Little, than he again attempted to escape, trying his best to keep his face away from the Scotchman's sight. This naturally aroused his curiosity, and after a careful look at the man he said, "Ah, I see, ye're the ugly varmint that did for that pair callant by the brook, nae wunner ye're shamed o'

was nothing left but to warn his brother. The result is known to my readers. The villain imagined he had effectually silenced Rupert's tongue, and hence his surprise when he found the farmstead armed and ready for his coming.

Mr. Little concluded to return home about sunset, as his stay overnight was altogether unpremeditated, and there was no telling what rumors of disaster and death might reach his place before him. True, he hardly expected that the bushrangers would try his place that night, as he had been led to believe, especially if their head man was in captivity. Nevertheless, he felt that he ought to be at home. He had some experience of gunshot wounds, and was of opinion that the one in Mansford's shoulder was not one to cause much anxiety. This opinion was not shared by McLean and the rest of them, and they waited in anxious dread the arrival of the prison doctor who had been sent for earlier in the day.

Now it so happened that the prisoner, thinking from what he heard that he had killed Mansford, and that his crime meant the rope for him without a shadow of doubt, set his wits to work to effect his escape. A search among the loose straw, which was strewed about the floor, was rewarded by the discovery of a broken scythe blade. He managed to get it between his teeth and then by dint of running his bound hands along the edge he eventually succeeded in severing the cord that bound them.

When his supper was brought, he still held them together, so as to elude suspicion; and at nightfall he employed the same weapon to saw a hole in the wooden wall of the granary large enough for him to creep through, and when morning dawned Phelim was aghast and speechless to find that the prisoner had fled!

"Misther McLean," said he "the murderin' spalpeen's made a big hole in the granary!"

"Weel, weel," said Donald, "and what then?"

"Why, then, yer hanner, he's just put his thievish carcase through it, an' gone off widout lave, takin' the mate in the inside av im!" the man replied.

Not long after the discovery of his flight, the prison doctor and a couple of officers arrived. While the doctor was attending Richard Mansford, the officers proposed to take the captive in charge, for they had recognized him as an escaped and much-wanted convict, from the description the messenger had given of him. Their chagrin may be imagined, when they were informed that he had again given them the slip.

As Mr. Little had imagined, the doctor was able to assure them that Mansford's wound was by no means serious, and that he would be about in a very little while. Before he left the house, McLean took him to see the dead body of Rupert Mansford, the stranger (for Richard had informed no one of the relationship), informing him beforehand how and at whose hand he had met his death.

The doctor recognized the corpse at once as that of convict No. 240, but was altogether at a loss to assign a reason for the crime, for, as far as he knew, the two men were friends, had been transported and escaped together. He gave the necessary orders for his burial, simply putting another count in the indictment of the bigger villain.

Richard Mansford was longer in getting about than the doctor had led them to believe would be the case, but the doctor was not at fault. The fact is, that the intense longing for home, well called home-sickness, as only those who have suffered from it know, grew on him strongly day by day; so much so that the worry retarded his recovery. His desire was the more keen because of some broken sentences in which Rupert had revealed somewhat of his life-career to him. "I left them to starve," he had said, and those words rang in his ears night and day. Anice starving! Fighting the grim demon of poverty and want!

His thoughts at last became too much for him, and finally he determined to go, sick or well. "Donald," said he to the Scotchman, soon after he had come to this determination, "I'm off to England next week. It's no good pining away like this, and very likely the sea voyage will set me right. You must look after things for me, my good fellow, till I come back. I don't expect to be away long, that is, if God sets me on my feet again; but, in any case, if you don't hear from me or see me in the flesh within three years, then the place will be yours entirely; as it is, you must consider yourself my partner."

The honest Scotchman was greatly moved by this emphatic mark of the regard and confidence of his master and friend. He had not much to say; at such times souls that are good and honest and true do not deal largely in words; but the grip of his hand as he thanked Richard Mansford, was quite sufficient.

This decision seemed to work wonders for Richard Mansford. The work of getting ready and leaving things straight, took his mind away from his gloomy thoughts, and so gave the wound a chance to heal, of which it speedily availed itself, and thus it came about that the breezes of the sea had a fair opportunity of completing his recovery. He took Phelim McGrath with him, so that in case he should need assistance, he should not be dependent on the care of strangers, though, to be sure, if Phelim had conveyed his "manin'" as impressively as a nurse as he did at Ooramarra, I fancy the hands of strangers would have been preferable. Fortunately, his valuable help in this line was not called for.

After a very pleasant passage, Richard Mansford, browned by the sea-air, even browner than by the Australian sun, and Phelim, were safely landed on the shores of England.

Mansford started at once to pick up the forgotten clues that his youthful memory left him, in order to achieve his purpose. We, however, cannot follow him through his saddening visits to his old-time haunts. As my readers know, his search for Anice was of necessity fruitless. He learnt, however, that Nora, her only daughter, had gone to stay with Har-dale, her uncle, at Settleworth. That town lay nearest to Hazelcroft, his father's place, which, by the way, he remembered, ought to be his place now, if his father were not living. Who owned it now? Why hadn't he heard from the lawyers? Of course they didn't know where he had gone to, but surely they might have found out if they had wanted to. He was not in hiding.

Then, too, he wanted to see what Nora was like; whether she resembled Anice at all. He was glad she was not likely to feel the pinch of poverty where she was. He concluded to make all his intended observations under cover; a well-to-do uncle from Australia might not see the genuine self—in fact, most likely otherwise. Thus it was that a stranger came to the Hermitage.

The place not only suited him in his plans, but had an added attraction in the fact that it was one of the few places that remained just as he remembered it in his youth and early manhood. So he took it in McGrath's name, and duly installed himself and Phelim therein. The latter was not to be despised as a general cook, and in this quiet corner we may for a while leave Richard Mansford and turn our attention elsewhere.
